First. God's controversy with Babylon. We will begin with that, for there all the calamity begins. She hath made God her enemy, and then who can befriend her? Let her know that the righteous Judge to whom vengeance belongs, hath said, ver. 3, "I will take vengeance." She has provoked God, and shall be reckoned with for it, when the measure of her iniquities is full. Woe to those on whom God comes to take vengeance; for "who knows the power of his anger," and what a fearful thing it is to fall into his hands? Were it a man like ourselves that would be revenged on us, we might hope to be a match for him, either to make our escape from him or to make our part good with him; but he saith, "I will not meet thee as a man," not with the compassions of a man; but I will be unto thee as a lion, and a young lion, Hos. v. 14; or rather, not with the strength of a man, which is easily resisted, but with the power of a God which cannot be resisted. Not with the justice of a man, which may be bribed or biassed, or mollified by a foolish pity, but with the justice of a God, which is strict and severe, and can never be evaded. As in pardoning the penitent, so in punishing the impenitent, he is God and not man, Hos. xi. 9.

Secondly. The particular ground of this controversy. We are sure there is cause for it, and it is a just cause; it is the vengeance of his temple, Jer. l. 28; it is for violence done to Zion, Jer. li. 35. God will plead his people's cause against them. It is acknowledged, ver. 6, that God had in wrath delivered his people into the hands of the Babylonians; had made use of them for the correction of his children, and had by their means polluted his inheritance; had left his peculiar people exposed to suffer in common with the rest of the nations; had suffered the heathen, who should have been kept at a distance, to come into his sanctuary, and defile his temple, Ps. lxxix. 1. Herein God was righteous, but the Babylonians carried the matter too far; and when they had them in their hands, triumphing to see a people that had been so much in reputation for wisdom, holiness, and honour, brought thus low, with a base and servile spirit they trampled upon them, and shewed them no mercy; no, not the common instances of humanity, which the miserable are entitled to purely by their misery. They used them barbarously, and with an air of contempt, nay, and of complacency in their calamities. They were brought under the yoke; but, as if that were not enough, they laid the yoke on very heavily, adding affliction to the afflicted. Nay, they laid it on the ancient, the elders in years, who were past their labour, and must sink under a yoke which those in their youthful strength would easily bear. The elders in office, those that had been judges and magistrates, and persons of the first rank, they took a pride in putting them to the meanest, hardest drudgery; Jeremiah laments this, that the faces of elders were not honoured, Lam. v. 12. Nothing brings a surer and sorer ruin upon any people than cruelty, especially to God's Israel.

Thirdly. The terror of this controversy. She has reason to tremble, when she is told who it is that has this quarrel with her, ver. 4. As for our Redeemer, our God, that undertakes to plead our cause, as the avenger of our blood, he hath two names which speak not only comfort to us, but terror to our adversaries. 1. He is the Lord of hosts, that has all the creatures at his command, and therefore has all power both in heaven and in earth. Woe to those against whom the Lord fights, for the whole creation is at war with them. 2. He is the Holy One of Israel, a God in covenant with us, who has his residence among us, and will faithfully perform all the promises he hath made to us. God's power and holiness are engaged against Babylon, and for Zion. This may fitly be applied to Christ, our great Redeemer; he is both Lord of hosts and the Holy One of Israel.

Fourthly. The consequences of it to Babylon. She is called a virgin, because so she thought herself, though she was "the mother of harlots;" beautiful as a virgin, and courted by all about her; she had been called "tender and delicate," ver. 1; and "the lady of kingdoms," ver. 5; but now the case is altered.

1. Her honour is gone, and she must bid farewell to all her dignity. She that had sat at the upper end of the world, sat in state, and sat at ease, must now "come down, and sit in the dust," as very mean, and a deep mourner; "must sit on the ground," for she shall be so emptied and impoverished that she shall not have a seat left her to sit upon.

2. Her power is gone, and she must bid farewell to all her dominion. She shall rule no more as she has done, nor give law as she has done to her neighbours; "There is no throne," none for thee, "O daughter of the Chaldeans." Note, Those that abuse their honour and power provoke God to deprive them of it, and to make them "come down and sit in the dust."

3. Her ease and pleasure is gone. She shall "no more be called tender and delicate," as she has been, for she shall not only be deprived of all those things with which she pampered herself, but shall be put to hard service, and made to feel both want and pain, which should be more than doubly grievous to her that when time was "would not venture to set so much as the sole of her foot to the ground for tenderness and for delicacy," Deu. xxviii. 56. It is our wisdom not to use ourselves to be tender and delicate, because we know not how hardly others may use us before we die, nor what straits we may be reduced to.

4. Her liberty is gone, and she is brought into a state of servitude, and as sore a bondage as she in her prosperity had brought others to. Even the great men of Babylon must now receive the same law from the conquerors that they used to give to the conquered; "take the millstones, and grind meal," ver. 2. Set to work, to hard labour, like beating hemp in Bridewell, which will make thee sweat so as that thou must throw of all thy head dresses, and "uncover thy locks." When they were driven from one place to another, at the capricious humour of their masters, they must be forced to wade up to the middle through the waters; to "make bare the leg and uncover the thigh," that they might "pass over the rivers," which would be a great mortification to them that used to ride in state. But let them not complain, for when time was, just thus they had used their captives; and "with what measure they then meted, it is now measured to them again." Let those that have power use it with temper and moderation, considering that the spoke that is uppermost will be under.

5. All her glory, and all her glorying, is gone. Instead of glory, she has ignominy; ver. 3; "Thy nakedness shall be uncovered, and thy shame shall be seen," according to the base and barbarous usage they commonly gave their captives, to whom, for covetousness of their clothes, they did not leave rags sufficient to cover their nakedness, so void were they of the modesty, as well as of the pity, due to the human nature. Instead of glorying, she sits silent, and gets into darkness, ver. 5; ashamed to shew her face, for she has quite lost her credit, and "shall no more be called the lady of kingdoms." Note, God can make those sit silent that used to make the greatest noise in the world; and send those into darkness that used to make the greatest figure. Let him that glories therefore glory in a God that changeth not, and not in any worldly wealth, pleasure, or honour, which is subject to change.

7 And thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever:
So that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart,
Neither didst remember the latter end of it.
8 Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures,
That dwellest carelessly,
That sayest in thine heart,
I am, and none else beside me;
I shall not sit as a widow,
Neither shall I know the loss of children:
9 But these two things shall come to thee in a moment in one day,
The loss of children, and widowhood:
They shall come upon thee in their perfection
For the multitude of thy sorceries,
And for the great abundance of thine enchantments.
10 For thou hast trusted in thy wickedness:
Thou hast said, None seeth me.
Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee;
And thou hast said in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me.
11 Therefore shall evil come upon thee;
Thou shalt not know from whence it riseth:
And mischief shall fall upon thee;
Thou shalt not be able to put it off:
And desolation shall come upon thee suddenly, which thou shalt not know.
12 Stand now with thine enchantments,
And with the multitude of thy sorceries,
Wherein thou hast laboured from thy youth;
If so be thou shalt be able to profit,
If so be thou mayest prevail.
13 Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels.
Let now the astrologers, the stargazers,
The monthly prognosticators,
Stand up, and save thee
From these things that shall come upon thee.
14 Behold, they shall be as stubble;
The fire shall burn them;
They shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame:
There shall not be a coal to warm at,
Nor fire to sit before it.
15 Thus shall they be unto thee with whom thou hast laboured,
Even thy merchants, from thy youth:
They shall wander every one to his quarter;
None shall save thee.

Babylon, now doomed to ruin, is here justly upbraided with her pride, luxury, and security in the day of her prosperity, and the confidence she had in her own wisdom and forecast, and particularly in the prognostications and counsels of the astrologers. And these things are mentioned both to justify God in bringing these judgments upon her, and to mortify her, and put her to so much the greater shame under these judgments; for when God comes forth to take vengeance, glory belongs to him, but confusion to the sinner.

First. The Babylonians are here upbraided with their pride and haughtiness, and the mighty conceit they had of themselves, because of their wealth and power, and the vast extent of their dominion. It was the language, both of the government and of the body of the people, "Thou sayest in thine heart," and God, who searcheth all hearts, can tell men what they say there, though they never speak it out,) "I am, and none else besides me," ver. 8; and the same again, ver. 10. The repetition of this part of the charge intimates, that they said it often, and that it was very offensive to God. It is the very word that God had often said concerning himself; "I am, and none else besides me;" speaking his self-existence, his infinite and incomparable perfections, and his sole supremacy; and all this Babylon pretends to. And no wonder, if she that assumed a power to make what gods and goddesses she pleased, for the people to worship, made herself one among the rest. It is presumption to say of any creature, It is, and there is not its like, there is none besides it; for creatures stand pretty much upon a level with one another. But it is insufferable arrogance for any to say so of themselves, and an evidence of their self-ignorance.

Secondly. They are upbraided with their luxury and love of ease; ver. 8, "Thou that art given to pleasures," art a slave to them, art in them as in thine element; and that thou mayest enjoy them without disturbance or interruption, "dwellest carelessly," and layest nothing to heart. Great wealth and plenty is a great temptation to sensuality; and where there is fulness of bread there is commonly abundance of idleness. But if those that are given to pleasures, and dwell carelessly, would but hear this, that for all these things God shall bring them into judgment, it would be a damp to their mirth, an allay to their pleasure, and would find them something to be in care about.

Thirdly. They are upbraided with their carnal security, and their vain confidence of the perpetuity of their pomps and pleasures. This is much insisted on here. Observe,

1. The cause of their security. They therefore thought themselves safe and out of danger; not because they were ignorant of the uncertainty of all earthly enjoyments, and the inevitable fate that attends states and kingdoms as well as particular persons, but because "they did not lay this to heart," did not apply it to themselves, nor give it a due consideration. They lulled themselves asleep in ease and pleasure, and dreamt of nothing else but that "to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant." They did not remember the latter end of it; not the latter end of their prosperity, that that is a fading flower, and will wither; not the latter end of their iniquity, that it will be bitterness; that the day will come, when their injustice and oppression must be reckoned for and punished. She did not remember her latter end, so some read it; she forgat that her day will come to fall, and what would be in the end hereof. It was the ruin of Jerusalem, Lam. i. 9, "She remembered not her last end, therefore she came down wonderfully;" and it was Babylon's ruin too. Therefore the children of men are easy, and think themselves safe in their sinful ways, because they never think of death and judgment, and their future state.

2. The ground of their security. They trusted in their wickedness, and in their wisdom, ver. 10. 1st. Their power and wealth, which they had gotten by fraud and oppression, was their confidence. Thou hast trusted in thy wickedness, as Doeg, Ps. lii. 7. Many have so debauched their own consciences, and are got to such a pitch of daring wickedness, that they stick at nothing; and this they trust to carry them through those difficulties which embarrass men that make conscience of what they say and do. They doubt not but they shall be too hard for all their enemies, because they dare lie, and kill, and forswear themselves, and do any thing for their interest. Thus they trust in their wickedness to secure them, which is the only thing that will ruin them. 2nd. Their policy and craft, which they called their wisdom, was their confidence. They thought they could outwit all mankind, and therefore might set all their enemies at defiance; but their wisdom and knowledge perverted them, and turned them out of the way; made them forget themselves, and the preparation necessary to be made for hereafter.

3. The expressions of their security. Three things this proud and haughty monarchy said, in her security: 1st. "I shall be a lady for ever." She looked upon the patent of her honour to be, not during the pleasure of the Sovereign Lord, the fountain of honour, or during her own good behaviour, but to be perpetual to the present generation, and their heirs and successors for ever. She is not only proud that she is a lady, but confident she "shall be a lady for ever." Thus the New-Testament Babylon saith, "I sit as a queen, and shall see no sorrow," Rev. xviii. 7. Those ladies mistake themselves, and consider not their latter end, who think they shall be ladies for ever; for death will shortly lay their honour with them in the dust. Saints shall be saints for ever, but lords and ladies will not be so for ever. 2nd. "I shall not sit as a widow," in solitude and sorrow; shall never lose that power and wealth I am thus wedded to. The monarchy shall never want a monarch to espouse and protect it, and be a husband to the state; nor shall I "know the loss of children." She was as confident of the continuance of the numbers of her people, as of the dignity of her prince; and had no fear of being either deposed or depopulated. Those that are in a height of prosperity are apt to fancy themselves out of the reach of adverse fate. 3rd. None seeth me when I do amiss; and therefore there will be none to call me to an account. It is common for sinners to promise themselves impunity, because they promise themselves secrecy in their wicked ways. They trust to their wicked arts and designs to stand them in stead; because they think they have carried them on so plausibly, as that none can discern the wickedness and deceit of them.

4. The punishment of their security. It shall be their ruin; and it will be, 1st. A complete ruin, the ruin of all their comforts and confidences; "These two things shall come upon thee," the very two things that thou didst set at defiance, "loss of children and widowhood." Both thy princes and thy people shall be cut off, so that thou shalt be no more a government, no more a nation. Note, God often brings upon secure sinners those very mischiefs which they least feared, and thought themselves in least danger of. They shall come upon thee in their perfection, with all their aggravating circumstances, and without any thing to allay or mitigate them. Afflictions to God's children are not afflictions in perfection; widowhood is not to them a calamity in perfection, for they have this to comfort themselves with, that their Maker is their husband. Loss of children is not, for he is better to them than ten sons. But on his enemies they come in perfection. Widowhood and loss of children are either of them great griefs, but both together great indeed. Naomi thinks she may well be called Marah, when she is left both of her sons and of her husband, Ru. i. 5. And yet on her these evils did not come in perfection, for she had two daughters-in-law left, that were comforts to her. But on Babylon they come in perfection; she has no comfort remaining. 2nd. It shall be a sudden and surprising ruin. The evil shall come in one day, nay, in a moment; which will make it much the more terrible, especially to those that were so very secure. "Evil shall come upon thee," and thou shalt neither have time nor way to provide against it, or to prepare for it; for "thou shalt not know from whence it riseth," and therefore shalt not know where to stand upon thy guard. 'Thou shalt not know the morning thereof,' so the Hebrew phrase is; we know just when and where the day will break, and the sun rise, but we know not what the day when it is come will bring forth, nor when or where trouble will arise. Perhaps the storm may come from that point of the compass which we little thought of. Babylon pretended to great wisdom and knowledge, ver. 10, but with all her knowledge cannot foresee, nor with all her wisdom prevent, the ruin threatened. "Desolation shall come upon thee suddenly" as a thief in the night, "which thou shalt not know;" that is, which thou little thought of. Fair warning was indeed given them by this and other prophets of the Lord, of this desolation; but they slighted that notice, and would give no credit to it; and therefore justly is it so ordered that they should have no other notice of it, but that, partly through their own security, and partly through the swiftness and subtlety of the enemy, when it came, it should be a perfect surprise to them. Those that slight the warnings of the written word let them not expect any other premonitions. 3rd. It shall be an irresistible ruin, and such as they should have no fence against; "Mischief shall come upon thee" so suddenly, that thou shalt have no time to turn thee in; so strongly, that "thou shalt not be able" to make head against it, and "to put it off," and save thyself. There is no opposing the judgments of God, when they come with commission. Babylon herself, with all her wealth, and power, and multitude, is not able to put off the mischief that comes.

Fourthly. They are upbraided with their divinations, their magical and astrological arts and sciences; which the Chaldeans, above any other nation, were notorious for, and from them other nations borrowed all their learning of that kind.

1. This is here spoken of as one of their provoking sins, which would bring the judgments of God upon them, ver. 9. These evils shall come upon thee, to punish thee "for the multitude of thy sorceries, and the great abundance of thine enchantments." Witchcraft is a sin in its own nature exceeding heinous; it is giving that honour to the devil, which is due to God only; making God's enemy our guide, and the father of lies our oracle. In Babylon it was a national sin, and had the protection and countenance of the government. Conjurors, for aught appears, were their privy counsellors and prime ministers of state. And shall not God visit for these things? Observe what a multitude, what a great abundance, of sorceries and enchantments there were among them. Such a bewitching sin this was, that when it was once admitted it spread like wildfire, and they never knew any end of it. The deceived and the deceivers both increased strangely.

2. It is here spoken of as one of their vain confidences, which they relied much upon, but should be deceived in, for it would not serve so much as to give them notice of the judgments coming, much less to guard against them.

1st. They are here upbraided with the mighty pains they had taken about their sorceries and enchantments. Thou hast "laboured in them from thy youth." They trained up their young men in these studies; and those that applied themselves to them were indefatigable in their labours about them, reading books, making observations, trying experiments. Well, let them "stand up now with their enchantments," and try their skill in the critical moment. Let them make a stand, if they can, in opposition to the invading enemy. Let them stand to offer their service to their country; but to what purpose? "Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsellors" of this kind; hast advised with them all, but hast received no satisfaction from them. The different schemes they have erected, and the different judgments they have given, have but increased thy perplexity, and tired thee out. In multitude of such counsellors there is no safety.

2nd. They are upbraided with the variety they had of such kind of people among them, ver. 13. They had their astrologers, or viewers of the heavens; that did not consider them, as David, to behold the wisdom and power of God in them, but under pretence of foretelling future events by them. They viewed the heavens, and forgot Him that made them and set their dominion on the earth, Job xxxviii. 33, and hath himself dominion over them, for he rides on the heavens. They had their stargazers, who, by the motions of the stars, their conjunctions and oppositions, read the doom of states and kingdoms. They had their monthly prognosticators, their almanac makers, that told what weather it should be, or what news they should have each month. The great stock they had of these was what they valued themselves much upon; but they were all cheats, and their art a sham. I confess, I see not how the judicial astrology, which some now pretend to, by the rules of which they undertake to prophesy concerning things to come, can be distinguished from that of the Chaldeans, and therefore how it can escape the censure and contempt which this text lays that under. Yet I fear there are some who study their almanacs, and pay more regard to them and their prognostications, than to their Bibles and the prophecies there.

3rd. They are upbraided with the utter inability and insufficiency of all these pretenders to do them any kindness in the day of their distress. Let them see whether, with the help of their enchantments, they can prevail against their enemies or profit themselves, spirit their own forces or dispirit those that came against them, ver. 12. Let them see what service those can do them who make a trade of divination; let them stand up, and either by their power save thee from these evils that are coming upon thee, or by their foresight make such a discovery of them beforehand, as that thou mayest, by needful precautions, save thyself; as Elisha, by notifying to the king of Israel the motions of the Syrian army, enabled him to save himself, not once, nor twice, 2 Kin. vi. 10. This baffling of the diviners was literally fulfilled, when that night that Babylon was taken, and Belshazzar slain, all his astrologers, soothsayers and wise men, were quite nonplussed with the handwriting on the wall that pronounced the fatal sentence, Dan. v. 8.

4th. They are upbraided with the fall of the wise men themselves in the common ruin, ver. 14. They are unlikely to stand their friends in any stead who cannot secure themselves. They are as stubble at the best, worthless and useless; and they shall be as stubble before a consuming fire. The Persians, to make room for their own wise men, will cut off those of Babylon; that fire shall burn them, and they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame. They can expect no other but to be devoured, who, by their sins, make themselves fuel to a devouring fire. When God kindles a fire among them, it shall not be a coal to warm at, and a fire to sit before, but a coal to burn them. Or rather it notes, that they shall be utterly consumed by the judgments of God, burnt quite to ashes, and there shall not remain one live coal to do any body any service. For when God judgeth, he will overcome.

5th. They are upbraided with their merchants, and those they dealt with, ver. 15. Such as they dealt with from their youth; either, First. In a way of consultation. These astrologers that dealt in the black art they always loved to be dealing with, and they were in effect their merchants. Fortune-telling was one of the best trades in Babylon; and those that followed that trade probably lived as great, and got as much money, as the richest merchants. Yet when some of them were devoured, others run their country, every one to his quarter; and there was none to save Babylon. Miserable comforters are they all. Or, Secondly. In a way of commerce. As their astrologers failed them with whom they had laboured, so did their merchants; they took care to secure their own effects, and then valued not what became of Babylon. They wandered "every one to his own quarter;" each man shifted for his own safety, but none would offer to lend a helping hand, no, not to a city by which they had got so much money. Every one for himself, but few for his friends. The New Testament Babylon is lamented by the merchants that were made rich by her; but they very prudently stand afar off to lament her, Rev. xviii. 15; not willing to attempt any thing for her succour. Happy they who, by faith and prayer, deal with One that will be "a very present help in time of trouble."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

God having in the foregoing chapter reckoned with the Babylonians, and shewed them their sins, and the desolation that was coming upon them for their sins, to shew that he hates sin wherever he finds it, and will not connive at it in his own people, comes in this chapter to shew the house of Jacob their sins; but, withal, the mercy God had in store for them notwithstanding; and he therefore sets their sins in order before them, that by their repentance and reformation, they might be prepared for that mercy. I. He chargeth them with hypocrisy in that which is good, and obstinacy in that which is evil; especially in their idolatry, notwithstanding the many convincing proofs God had given them that he is God alone, ver. 1—8. II. He assures them that their deliverance would be wrought purely for the sake of God's own name, and not for any merit of theirs, ver. 9—11. III. He encourageth them to depend purely upon God's power and promise for this deliverance, ver. 12—15. IV. He shews them that, as it was by their own sin that they brought themselves into captivity, so it would be only by the grace of God that they would obtain the necessary preparations for their enlargement, ver. 16—19. V. He proclaims their release; yet with a proviso, that the wicked shall have no benefit by it, ver. 20—22.

HEAR ye this, O house of Jacob,
Which are called by the name of Israel,
And are come forth out of the waters of Judah,
Which swear by the name of the LORD,
And make mention of the God of Israel,
But not in truth, nor in righteousness.
2 For they call themselves of the holy city,
And stay themselves upon the God of Israel;
The LORD of hosts is his name.
3 I have declared the former things from the beginning;
And they went forth out of my mouth, and I shewed them;
I did them suddenly, and they came to pass.
4 Because I knew that thou art obstinate,
And thy neck is an iron sinew,
And thy brow brass;
5 I have even from the beginning declared it to thee;
Before it came to pass I shewed it thee:
Lest thou shouldest say, Mine idol hath done them,
And my graven image, and my molten image, hath com-
6 Thou hast heard, see all this; [manded them.
And will not ye declare it?
I have shewed thee new things from this time,
Even hidden things, and thou didst not know them.
7 They are created now, and not from the beginning;
Even before the day when thou heardest them not;
Lest thou shouldest say, Behold, I knew them.
8 Yea, thou heardest not; yea, thou knewest not;
Yea, from that time that thine ear was not opened:
For I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously,
And wast called a transgressor from the womb.

We may observe here,

First. The hypocritical profession which many of the Jews made of religion, and relation to God. To those who made such a profession the prophet is here ordered to apply himself, for their conviction and humiliation; that they might own God's justice in what he had brought upon them. Now observe here,

1. How high their profession of religion soared. What a fair show they made in the flesh, and how far they went towards heaven; what a good livery they wore, and what a good face they put upon a very bad heart. 1st. They were the house of Jacob; they had a place and a name in the visible church; "Jacob have I loved." Jacob is God's chosen; and they are not only retainers to his family, but descendants from him. 2nd. They were "called by the name of Israel," an honourable name. They were of that people "to whom pertained both the giving of the law and the promises." Israel signifies 'a prince with God;' and they prided themselves in being of that princely race. 3rd. "They came forth out of the waters of Judah," and thence were called Jews. They were of the royal tribe, the tribe of which Shiloh was to come; the tribe that adhered to God when the rest revolted. 4th. They "sware by the name of the Lord," and thereby owned him to be the true God, and their God, and gave glory to him as the righteous Judge of all. They 'sware to the name of the Lord,' so it may be read; they took an oath of allegiance to him as their king, and joined themselves to him in covenant. 5th. They made mention of the God of Israel in their prayers and praises; they often spoke of him, observed his memorials, and pretended to be very mindful of him. 6th. They called "themselves of the holy city;" and when they were captives in Babylon, purely from a principle of honour and jealousy for their native country, they valued themselves upon their interest in it. Many that are themselves unholy are proud of their relation to the church, the holy city. 7th. They stayed "themselves upon the God of Israel," and boasted of his promises, and his covenant with them. They "leaned on the Lord," Mic. iii. 11. And if they were asked concerning their God, they could say, "The Lord of hosts is his name," the Lord of all. Happy we, therefore, and very great, that have relation to him.

2. How low their profession of religion sunk for all this. It was all in vain, for it was all a jest, it was not in truth and righteousness. Their hearts were not true nor right in these professions. Note, All our religious professions avail nothing farther than they are made in truth and righteousness. If we be not sincere in them we do but take the name of the Lord our God in vain.

Secondly. The means God used, and the method he took, to keep them close to himself, and to prevent their turning aside to idolatry. The many excellent laws he gave them, with their sanctions, and the hedges about them, it seems would not serve to restrain them from that sin which did most easily beset them; and therefore to those God added remarkable prophecies and remarkable providences in pursuance of those prophecies, which were all designed to convince them that their God was the only true God, and that it was therefore both their duty and interest to adhere to him.

1. He both dignified and favoured them with remarkable prophecies; ver. 3, "I have declared the former things from the beginning." Nothing material happened to their nation from its original, but it was prophesied of before: their bondage in Egypt, their deliverance thence, the situation of their tribes in Canaan, &c.; all these things went forth out of God's mouth, and he shewed them. Herein they were honoured above any nation, and even their curiosity gratified; their prophecies were such as they could rely upon, and such as concerned themselves and their own nation. And they were all verified by the accomplishment of them. "I did them suddenly," when they were least expected by themselves or others, and therefore could not be foreseen by any but a Divine prescience; "I did them, and they came to pass;" for what God doth he doth effectually. These very calamities they were now groaning under in Babylon God did from the beginning declare to them by Moses, as the certain consequences of their apostacy from God, Lev. xxvi. 31, &c., and Deu. xxviii. 36, &c.; xxix. 28. He also declared to them their return to God and to their own land again, Deu. xxx. 4, &c.; Lev. xxvi. 44, 45. Thus he shewed them how he would deal with them long before it came to pass. Let them compare their present state, together with the deliverance they had now in prospect, with what was written in the law, and they would find the Scripture exactly fulfilled.

2. He both dignified and favoured them with remarkable providences; ver. 6, "I have shewed thee new things from this time." Besides the general view given them from the beginning of God's proceedings with them, he shewed them new things by the prophets of their own day, and created them; they were hidden things, which they could not otherwise know, as the prophecy concerning Cyrus, and the exact time of their release out of Babylon; these things God created now. Their restoration was in effect their creation, and they had a promise of it, not from the beginning, but of late; for, to prevent their apostacy from God, or to recover them, prophecy was kept up among them. Yet it was told them when they could not come to the knowledge of it any other way than by Divine revelation. Consider, saith God, how much soever it is talked of now among you and expected, it was told you by the prophets, when it was the farthest thing in your thoughts, when you had not heard it, when you had not known it, nor had any reason to expect it, and when your ear was not opened concerning it, ver. 7, 8; when the thing seemed utterly impossible, and you would scarcely have given any one the hearing that should have told you of it. God had shewed them hidden things which were out of the reach of their knowledge, and done for them great things, out of the reach of their power; Now, saith he, ver. 6, "thou hast heard, see all this." Thou hast heard the prophecy; see the accomplishment of it, and observe whether the word and works of God do not exactly agree. "And will ye not declare it," that, as you have heard, so you have seen? Will you not own that the Lord is the true God, the only true God; that he has that knowledge and power which no creature has, and which none of the gods of the nations can pretend to? Will you not own that your God hath been a good God to you? Declare this to his honour and your own shame, who have dealt so deceitfully with him, and preferred others before him.

Thirdly. The reasons why God would take this method with them:

1. Because he would anticipate their boastings of themselves and their idols. 1st. God, by his prophets, told them beforehand of their deliverance, lest they should attribute the doing of it to their idols. Thus he saw it necessary to secure the glory of it to himself, which otherwise would have been given by some of them to their graven images; I spoke of it, saith God, "lest thou shouldest say, Mine idol hath done it," or hath commanded it to be done, ver. 5. There were those that would be apt to say so, and so would be confirmed in their idolatry by that which was intended to cure them of it. But they would now be for ever precluded from saying this, for if the idols had done it the prophets of the idols would have foretold it; but, the prophets of the Lord having foretold it, no doubt it was the power of the Lord that effected it. 2nd. God foretold it by his prophets, lest they should assume the foresight of it to themselves. Those that were not so profane as to have ascribed the thing itself to an idol, yet were so proud as to have pretended that by their own sagacity they foresaw it, if God had not been beforehand with them and spoken first: "Lest thou shouldest say, Behold, I knew them." Thus, vain men, that would be thought wise, commonly undervalue a thing which is really great and surprising, with this suggestion, that it was no more than they expected, and they knew it would come to this. To anticipate this, and that this boasting might for ever be excluded, God told them of it before the day, when as yet they dreamed not of it. God has said and done enough to prevent men's boastings of themselves, and that no flesh may glory in his presence; which, if it have not the intended effect, it will aggravate the sin and ruin of the proud, and sooner or later "every mouth shall be stopped," and "all flesh shall become silent before God."

2. Because he would leave them inexcusable in their obstinacy. Therefore he took this pains with them, because he knew they were obstinate, ver. 4. He knew they were so obstinate and perverse that, if he had not supported the doctrine of providence by prophecy, they would have had the impudence to deny it, and would have said their idol had done that which God did. He knew very well, 1st. How wilful they would be, and how fully bent they would be upon that which is evil. 'I knew that thou wast hard,' so the word is; there were prophecies as well as precepts which God gave them, because of the hardness of their hearts. "Thy neck is an iron sinew," unapt to yield, and submit to the yoke of God's commandments, unapt to turn and look back upon his dealings with thee, or look up to his displeasure against thee; not flexible to the will of God, not pliable to his intentions, not manageable by his word or providence. "Thy brow is brass," that is, thou art impudent, and canst not blush; insolent, and wilt not fear or give back, but thrust on in the way of thine heart. God useth means to bring sinners to comply with him, though he knows they are obstinate. 2nd. How deceitful they would be, and insincere in that which is good, ver. 8. God sent his prophets to them, but they did not hear, they would not know; and it was no more than was expected, considering what they had been; "Thou wast called," and not miscalled, "a transgressor from the womb." Ever since they were first formed into a people, they were prone to idolatry; they brought with them out of Egypt a strange addictedness to that sin, and they were murmurers as soon as ever they began their march to Canaan; they were justly upbraided with it then, Deu. ix. 7, 24. Therefore "I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously." God foresaw their apostacy, and gave this reason for it, that he had always found them false and fickle, Deu. xxxi. 16, 27, 29. This is applicable to particular persons; we are all born children of disobedience, we are called transgressors from the womb, and therefore it is easy to foresee that we will deal treacherously, very treacherously. Where original sin is, actual sin will follow of course. God knows it, and yet deals not with us according to our deserts.

9 For my name's sake will I defer mine anger,
And for my praise will I refrain for thee,
That I cut thee not off.
10 Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver;
I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction.
11 For mine own sake, even for mine own sake, will I do it:
For how should my name be polluted?
And I will not give my glory unto another.
12 Hearken unto me, O Jacob
And Israel, my called;
I am he; I am the first, I also am the last.
13 Mine hand also hath laid the foundation of the earth,
And my right hand hath spanned the heavens:
When I call unto them, they stand up together.
14 All ye, assemble yourselves, and hear;
Which among them hath declared these things?
The LORD hath loved him: he will do his pleasure on
And his arm shall be on the Chaldeans. [Babylon,
15 I, even I, have spoken; yea, I have called him: [ous;
I have brought him, and he shall make his way prosper-

The deliverance of God's people out of their captivity in Babylon was a thing upon many accounts so improbable, that there was need of line upon line for the encouragement of the faith and hope of God's people concerning it. Two things were discouraging to them: their own unworthiness that God should do it for them, and the many difficulties in the thing itself. Now in these verses both these discouragements are removed, for here is,

First. A reason why God would do it for them, though they were unworthy; not for their sake be it known to them, but for his name's sake, for his own sake, ver. 9–11.

1. It is true they had been very provoking, and God had been justly angry with them. Their captivity was the punishment of their iniquity; and if when he had them in Babylon he had left them to pine away and perish there, and made the desolations of their country perpetual, he had but dealt with them according to their sins, and it was what such a sinful people might expect from an angry God. But, saith God, "I will defer mine anger," or rather, stifle and suppress it; I will make it to appear I am slow to wrath, and will refrain from thee, not pour upon thee what I justly might, that I should cut thee off from being a people. And why will God thus stay his hand? "For my name's sake," because this people was called by his name, and made profession of his name; and if they were cut off the enemies would blaspheme his name. It is "for my praise," because it would redound to the honour of his mercy to spare and reprieve them; and if he continued them to be to him a people they might be to him for a name and a praise.

2. It is true they were very corrupt and ill-disposed, but God would himself refine them and make them fit for the mercy he intended for them; "I have refined thee," that thou mightest be made a vessel of honour. Though he doth not find them meet for his favour, he will make them so. And this accounts for his bringing them into the trouble and continuing them in it so long as he did; it was not to cut them off, but to do them good It was to refine them, "but not as silver," or, with silver; not so thoroughly as men refine their silver, which they continue in the furnace till all the dross is separated from it. But if God should take that course with them they would be always in the furnace, for they are all dross, and as such might justly be put away, Ps. cxix. 119; as reprobate silver, Jer. vi. 30. He therefore takes them as they are, refined in part only, and not thoroughly; "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction," that is, made thee a choice one by the good which the affliction has done thee, and then designed thee for great things. Many have been brought home to God as chosen vessels, and a good work of grace been begun in them, in the furnace of affliction. Affliction is no bar to God's choice, but subservient to his purpose.

3. It is true they could not pretend to merit at God's hand so great a favour as their deliverance out of Babylon, which would put such an honour upon them, and bring them so much joy; Therefore, saith God, "for mine own sake, even for mine own sake, will I do it," ver. 11. See how the emphasis is laid upon that, for it is a reason that cannot fail, and therefore the resolution grounded upon it cannot fall to the ground. God will do it, not because he owes them such a favour, but to save the honour of his own name, that that may not be polluted by the insolent triumphs of the heathen, who, in triumphing over Israel, thought they triumphed over the God of Israel, and imagined their gods were too hard for him. This was plainly the language of Belshazzar's revels, when he profaned the holy vessels of God's temple, at the same time when he praised his idols, Dan. v. 2; and of the Babylonians' demand, Ps. cxxxvii. 3, "Sing us one of the songs of Zion." God will therefore deliver his people, because he will not suffer his glory to be thus given to another. Moses pleaded this often with God: Lord, what will the Egyptians say? Note, God is jealous for the honour of his own name, and will not suffer the wrath of man to proceed any farther than he will make it turn to his praise. And it is matter of comfort to God's people that, whatever comes of them, God will secure his own honour, and as far as is necessary to that God will work deliverance for them.

Secondly. Here is a proof that God could do it for them, though they were unable to help themselves, and the thing seemed altogether impracticable. Let Jacob and Israel hearken to this, and believe it, and take the comfort of it. They are God's called, called according to his purpose, called by him out of Egypt, Hos. xi. 1, and now out of Babylon; a people whom, with a distinguishing favour, he calleth by name, and calls to; they are his called, for they are called to him, called by his name, and called his. And therefore he will look after them, and they may be assured that, as he will deliver them for his own sake, so he will deliver them by his own strength; they need not fear then, for,

1. He is God alone and the eternal God, ver. 12. I am he that can do what I will, and will do what is best; he whom none can compare with, much less contend with; "I am the first, I also am the last." Who can be too quick for him that is the first, or prevent him? Who can be too hard for him that is the last, and will keep the field against all opposers, and will reign till they are all made his footstool? What room, then, is left to doubt of their deliverance, when he undertakes it, whose designs cannot but be all well laid, for he is the first; and well executed, for he is the last? As for this God his work is perfect.

2. He is the God that made the world, and he that did that can do any thing, ver. 13. Look we down, we see the earth firm under us, and feel it so; it was his hand that laid the foundations of it. Look we up, we see the heavens spread up as a canopy over our heads, and it was his hand that spread them, that spanned them, that stretched them out, and did it by an exact measure, as the workman sometimes metes out his work by spans. This intimates that God hath a vast reach, and can compass designs of the greatest extent. If 'the palm of his right hand' (so the margin reads it) hath gone so far as to stretch out the heavens, what will he do with his outstretched arm? Yet this is not all; he hath not only made the heavens and the earth, and therefore he in whom our hope and help are is omnipotent, Ps. cxxiv. 8; but he hath the command of all the hosts of both. When he calls them into his service, to go on his errand, they stand up together, they come at the call, they answer to their names, Here we are, "what wilt thou have us to do?" They stand up not only in reverence to their Creator, but in a readiness to execute his orders; they stand up together unanimously, concurring and helping one another in the service of their Maker. Therefore, if God will deliver his people, he cannot be to seek for instruments to be employed in it.

3. He hath already foretold it; and, having such an infinite knowledge that he could foresee it, no doubt he has an almighty power to effect it. "All ye" of the house of Jacob, "assemble yourselves and hear" this for your comfort, which among them, among the gods of the heathen, or their wise men, hath declared these things, or could declare them? ver. 14. They had no foresight of them at all, but those who consulted them were very confident that Babylon should be a lady for ever, and Israel a perpetual slave, and their oracles did not give them the least hint to the contrary to undeceive them; whereas God, by his prophets, had given notice to the Jews long before of their captivity and the destruction of Jerusalem, as he had now likewise given them notice of their release, ver. 15. "I, even I, have spoken;" and he would not have spoken it if he could not have made it good. None could outsee him, and therefore we may be sure none could outdo him.

4. The person is pitched upon that is to be employed in this service, and the measures concerted in the Divine councils, which are unalterable. Cyrus is the man that must do it; and it tends much to strengthen our assurance that a thing shall be done when we are particularly informed how and by whom. It is not left at an uncertainty who shall do it, but the matter is fixed. 1st. It is one whom God is well pleased in upon this account, because he is designed for this service, "The Lord hath loved him," ver. 14; that is, he has done him this favour, this honour, to make him an instrument of the redemption of his people, and therein a type of the great Redeemer, God's beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased. Those God doth a great kindness to, and has a great kindness for, whom he makes serviceable to his church. 2nd. It is one whom God will give authority and commission to; "I have called him," have given him a sufficient warrant, and therefore will bear him out. 3rd. It is one whom God will, by a series of providences, lead to this service; I have brought him from a far country, brought him to engage against Babylon, brought him step by step, quite beyond his own intentions. Whom God calls he will bring, will cause them to come, (so the word is,) to come at the call. 4th. It is one whom God will own and give success to. Cyrus will do God's pleasure on Babylon; that which it is his pleasure should be done, and which he will be pleased with the doing of, though Cyrus has ends of his own to serve, and hath no regard either to the will of God, or to his favour in the doing of it. His arm, that is, Cyrus' army, and in it God's arm, shall come and be upon the Chaldeans, to bring them down, ver. 14; for if God call him and bring him he will certainly make his way prosperous, ver. 15. Then we may hope to prosper in our way when we follow a Divine call and conduct.

16 Come ye near unto me, hear ye this;
I have not spoken in secret from the beginning;
From the time that it was, there am I:
And now the Lord GOD, and his Spirit, hath sent me.
17 Thus saith the LORD,
Thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel;
I am the LORD thy God which teacheth thee to profit,
Which leadeth thee by the way that thou shouldest go.
18 O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments!
Then had thy peace been as a river,
And thy righteousness as the waves of the sea:
19 Thy seed also had been as the sand,
And the offspring of thy bowels like the gravel thereof;
His name should not have been cut off nor destroyed
20 Go ye forth of Babylon, [from before me.
Flee ye from the Chaldeans, with a voice of singing
Declare ye, tell this,
Utter it even to the end of the earth;
Say ye, The LORD hath redeemed his servant Jacob.
21 And they thirsted not when he led them through the deserts:
He caused the waters to flow out of the rock for them:
He clave the rock also, and the waters gushed out.
22 There is no peace, saith the LORD, unto the wicked.

Here, as before, Jacob and Israel are summoned to hearken to the prophet speaking in God's name, or rather to God, speaking in and by the prophet, and that as a type of the great Prophet, by whom God has in these last days spoken unto us, and that is sufficient; Come ye near, therefore, and hear this. Note, Those that would hear and understand what God saith must come near and approach to him. Let them come as near as they can; let those that have hearkened to the tempter now come near and hear this, that they may be confirmed in their resolutions to serve God. Those that draw nigh to God may depend upon this, that his secret shall be with them. Here,

First. God refers them to what he had both said to them and done for them formerly, which, if they would reflect upon, they might from thence fetch great encouragement to trust in God at this time. 1. He had always spoken plainly to them, from the beginning, by Moses and all the prophets. I have not spoken in secret, but publicly, from the top of mount Sinai, and in the chief places of concourse, the solemn assemblies of their tribes. He did not deliver his oracles obscurely and ambiguously, but so as they might be understood, Hab. ii. 2. 2. He had always acted wonderfully for them; "From the time that it was," that they were first formed into a people, "there am I," there have I been, resident among them, and presiding in their affairs. He sent them prophets, raised them up judges, and frequently appeared for them; and therefore there I will be still. He that has been with his people hitherto will be to the end.

Secondly. The prophet himself, as a type of the great Prophet, asserts his own commission to deliver this message; "Now the Lord God (the same that spoke from the beginning, and did not speak in secret,) "hath by his Spirit sent me," ver. 16. The Spirit of God is here spoken of as a person, distinct from the Father and the Son, and having a Divine authority to send prophets. Note, Whom God sends the Spirit sends. Those whom God commissions for any service, the Spirit in some measure qualifies for it; and those may speak boldly, and must be heard obediently, whom God and his Spirit send. As that which the prophet saith to the same purpose with this, ch. lxi. 1, is applied to Christ, Lu. iv. 21, so may this be. The Lord God sent him, and he had the Spirit without measure.

Thirdly. God by the prophet sends them a gracious message for their support and comfort under their affliction. The preface to this message is both awful and encouraging; ver. 17, "Thus saith Jehovah," the eternal God, "thy Redeemer," that hath often been so, that hath engaged to be so, and will be faithful to the engagement, for he is the Holy One, that cannot deceive, the Holy One of Israel, that will not deceive them. The same words that introduce the law, and give authority to that, introduce the promise, and give validity to that; "I am the Lord thy God," whom thou mayest depend upon, as in relation to thee, and in covenant with thee.

1. Here is the good work God undertakes to fulfil in them. He that is their Redeemer, in order to that will be, 1st. Their instructor; "I am thy God that teacheth thee to profit," that is, teacheth thee such things as are profitable for thee, things that belong to thy peace. By this God shews himself to be a God in covenant with us, by his teaching us, Heb. viii. 10, 11, and none teacheth like him, for he gives an understanding. Whom God redeems he teacheth; whom he designs to deliver out of their afflictions he first teacheth to profit by their afflictions, makes them partakers of his holiness; for that is the profit for which he chastens us, Heb. xii. 10. 2nd. Their guide. He leads them to the way and in the way by which they should go. He not only enlightens their eyes, but directs their steps. By his grace he leads them in the way of duty, by his providence he leads them in the way of deliverance. Happy they that are under such a conduct!

2. Here is the good will God declares he had for them, by his good wishes concerning them, ver. 18, 19. He had indeed brought them into captivity, but it was long of themselves, nor did he afflict them willingly. 1st. As when he gave them his law he earnestly wished they might be obedient, ("O that there were such a heart in them," Deu. v. 29; "O that they were wise," Deu. xxxii. 29,) so, when he punished them for the breach of his law, he wished they had been obedient; "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments," as Ps. lxxxi. 13, "O that my people had hearkened unto me!" This confirms what God hath said and sworn, that "he hath no pleasure in the death of sinners." 2nd. He assures them that if they had been obedient that would not only have prevented their captivity, but would have advanced and perpetuated their prosperity. He had abundance of good things ready to bestow upon them, if their sins had not turned them away, ch. lix. 1, 2. First. They should have been carried on in a constant, uninterrupted stream of prosperity; "Thy peace should have been as a river," thou shouldest have enjoyed a series of mercies, one continually following another, as the waters of a river, which always last. Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum,—'It flows, and will for ever flow;' not like the waters of a land-flood, which are soon gone. Secondly. Their virtue and honour, and the justice of their cause, should in all cases have borne down opposition by their own strength,—as the waves of the sea, such should their righteousness have been, nothing should have stood before it; whereas now, they having been disobedient, the current of their prosperity was interrupted, and their righteousness overpowered. Thirdly. The rising generation should have been very numerous, and very prosperous; whereas they were now very few, as appears by the small number of the returning captives, Ezr. ii. 64, not so many as of one tribe when they came out of Egypt, they should have been numberless as the sand, according to the promise, Gen. xxii. 17, which they had forfeited the benefit of. "The offspring of thy bowels" had been innumerable like the gravel of the sea, if thy righteousness had been irresistible and unconquerable as the waves of the sea. Fourthly. The honour of Israel had still been unstained, untouched. His name should not have been cut off, as now it is in the land of Israel, which is either desolate, or inhabited by strangers; nor should it have been destroyed from before God. And we cannot reckon a name either of a family or of a kingdom destroyed till it is destroyed from before God, till it ceaseth to be a name in his holy place. Now God thus tells them what he would have done for them, if they had persevered in their obedience, 1*st.* That they might be the more humbled for their sins, by which they had forfeited such rich mercies. Note, This should engage us, I might say, enrage us, against sin, that it has not only lost us the good things we have enjoyed, but prevented the good things God had in store for us. It will make the misery of the disobedient the more intolerable, to think how happy they might have been. 2*nd.* That his mercy might appear the more illustrious in working deliverance and salvation for them, though they had forfeited and rendered themselves unworthy of it. Nothing but a prerogative of mercy would have saved them.

3. Here is assurance given of the great work which God designed to work for them, even their salvation out of their captivity, when he had accomplished his work in them.

1st. Here is a commission granted them to leave Babylon. God proclaimed it long before Cyrus did, that whoever would might return to his own land, ver. 20. You have a full discharge sent you, "Go ye forth out of Babylon;" the prison doors are thrown open, and the trumpet sounded proclaiming a release. Perhaps with this word, as a means, the Spirit of the Lord stirred up the spirits of those that did take the benefit of Cyrus's proclamation, Ezr. i. 5. "Flee ye from the Chaldeans," not with an ignominious, stolen flight, as Jacob fled from Laban, but flee with a holy disdain, as scorning to stay any longer among them. Flee ye, not silently and sorrowfully, but with a voice, with a voice of singing, as they fled of old out of Egypt, Ex. xv. 1.

2nd. Here is the news of this sent to all parts. Let it be declared, let it be told, let it be uttered, make it to be heard by the most remote, by the most remiss; send the tidings of it by word of mouth, send it by writing, from city to city, from kingdom to kingdom, even to the utmost regions, "to the ends of the earth." This was a figure of the publishing of the Gospel to all the world; but that brings glad tidings which all the world is concerned in, this only that which it is fit all should take notice of, that they may be invited by it to forsake their idols, and come into the service of the God of Israel. Let them all know then, First. That those whom God owns for his are such as he has dearly bought and paid for; "The Lord hath redeemed his servant Jacob;" he has done it formerly, when he brought them out of Egypt, and now he is about to do it again. Jacob was God's servant, and therefore he redeemed him; for what had other masters to do with God's servants? Israel is God's son, therefore Pharaoh must let him go. God redeemed Jacob, and therefore it was fit he should be his servant, Ps. cxvi. 16; the bonds God had loosed tied them the faster to him. He that redeemed us has an unquestionable right to us. Secondly. That those whom God designs to bring home to himself he will take care of, that they want not for the necessary expenses of their journey. When he brought them out of Egypt, and led them through the deserts, they thirsted not, ver. 21, for in all their removes the water out of the rock followed them. Thence he caused the waters to flow; and, since rock water is the clearest and finest, "God clave the rock, and the waters gushed out;" for he can fetch in necessary supplies for his people that way that they think most unlikely. This refers to what he did for them when he brought them out of Egypt, when all this was literally true. But it should now be in effect done again in their return out of Babylon, so well provided for shall they and theirs be in their return. And God doth his work as effectually by marvellous providences as by miracles, though perhaps they be not so much taken notice of. This is applicable to those treasures of grace laid up for us in Jesus Christ, from which all good flows to us, as the water did to Israel out of the rock, for that rock is Christ.

3rd. Here is a caveat put in against the wicked that go on still in their trespasses. Let not them think to have any benefit among God's people, though in show and profession they herd themselves among them; let not them expect to come in sharers; no, ver. 22, though God's thoughts concerning the body of that people were thoughts of peace, yet those among them that were wicked, and hated to be reformed, to them there is no peace, no peace with God or their own consciences, no, no real good, whatever is pretended to. What have they to do with peace that are enemies to God? Their false prophets cried peace to them to whom it did not belong; but God tells them there shall be no peace, nor nothing like it, to the wicked. The quarrel sinners have commenced with God, if not taken up in time by repentance, will be an everlasting quarrel.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Glorious things had been spoken in the chapters before, concerning the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon; but, lest any should think when it was accomplished that it looked much greater and brighter in the prophecy than in the performance, and that the return of about forty thousand Jews in a poor condition, out of Babylon to Jerusalem, was not an event sufficiently answering the height and grandeur of the expressions used in the prophecy, he here comes to shew that the prophecy had a farther intention, and was to have its full accomplishment in a redemption that should as far outdo these expressions, as the other seemed to come short of them, even the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ; of whom not only Cyrus, that was God's servant in working the Jews' deliverance, but Isaiah too, that was God's servant in foretelling it, was a type. In this chapter we have, I. The designation of Christ, under the type of Isaiah, to his office as Mediator, ver. 1—3. II. The assurance given him of the success of his undertaking among the Gentiles, ver. 3—8. III. The redemption that should be wrought by him, and the progress of that redemption, ver. 9—12. IV. The encouragement given from hence to the afflicted church, ver. 13—17. V. The addition of many to it, and the setting up of a church among the Gentiles, ver. 18—23. VI. A ratification of the prophecy of the Jews' release out of Babylon, which was to be the figure and type of all these blessings, ver. 24—26. And if this chapter be rightly understood, we shall see ourselves to be more concerned in the prophecies relating to the Jews' deliverance out of Babylon than we thought we were.

LISTEN, O isles, unto me;
And hearken, ye people, from far;
The LORD hath called me from the womb;
From the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name.
2 And he hath made my mouth like a sharp sword;
In the shadow of his hand hath he hid me,
And made me a polished shaft;
In his quiver hath he hid me;
3 And said unto me, Thou art my servant,
O Israel, in whom I will be glorified.
4 Then I said, I have laboured in vain,
I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain:
Yet surely my judgment is with the LORD,
And my work with my God.
5 And now, saith the LORD
That formed me from the womb to be his servant,
To bring Jacob again to him,
Though Israel be not gathered,
Yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the LORD,
And my God shall be my strength.
6 And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldest be [my servant
To raise up the tribes of Jacob,
And to restore the preserved of Israel:

I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, [earth.
That thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the

Here, First. An auditory is summoned together, and attention demanded. The sermon in the chapter before was directed to the house of Jacob, and the people of Israel, ver. 1, 12; but this is directed to the isles, that is, the Gentiles, for they are called the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5, and to the people from far, that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and afar off. Let these listen, ver. 1, as to a thing at a distance, which yet they were to hear with desire and attention. Note, The tidings of a Redeemer are sent to the Gentiles, and to those that lay most remote, and they are concerned to listen to them. The Gentiles listened to the Gospel, when the Jews were deaf to it.

Secondly. The great author and publisher of the redemption produced his authority from heaven, for the work he had undertaken. 1. God had appointed him, and set him apart for it; "The Lord hath called me from the womb" to this office, and made mention of my name, nominated me to be the Saviour. By an angel he called him Jesus, a Saviour, who should save his people from their sins, Mat. i. 21. Nay, from the womb of the Divine counsels, before all worlds, he was called to this service, and help was laid upon him; and he came at the call, for he said, "Lo, I come," with an eye to what was written of him in the volume of the book. This was said of some of the prophets, as types of him, Jer. i. 5. Paul was separated to the apostleship from his mother's womb, Gal. i. 15. 2. God had fitted and qualified him for the service to which he designed him. He made his mouth like a sharp sword, and made him like a polished shaft, or a bright arrow; furnished him with every thing necessary to fight God's battles against the powers of darkness, to conquer Satan, and reduce God's revolted subjects to their allegiance, by his word; that is the two-edged sword, Heb. iv. 12, which comes out of his mouth, Rev. xix. 15. The convictions of the word are the arrows that shall be sharp in the hearts of sinners, Ps. xlv. 5. 3. God had preserved him to the service for which he had reserved him; "He hath hid me in the shadow of his hand, and in his quiver;" which notes, 1st. Concealment. The Gospel of Christ, and the calling in of the Gentiles by it, was long hid from ages and generations, hid in God, Eph. iii. 5, Rom. xvi. 25; hid in the shadow of the ceremonial law, and the Old Testament types. 2nd. Protection. The house of David was the particular care of the Divine providence, because that blessing was in it. Christ in his infancy was sheltered from the rage of Herod. 4. God had owned him; had said unto him, "Thou art my servant," whom I have employed, and will succeed; thou art Israel in effect, the prince with God, that hast wrestled and prevailed, and "in whom I will be glorified." The people of God are Israel, and they are all gathered together, and summed up as it were in Christ, the great representative of all Israel, as the high priest who had the names of all the tribes on his breastplate, and in him God is and will be glorified; so he said by a voice from heaven, Jno. xii. 27, 28. Some read the words in two clauses, "Thou art my servant;" so Christ is, ch. xlii. 1; 'It is Israel in whom I will be glorified by thee;' it is the spiritual Israel, the elect, in the salvation of whom by Jesus Christ God will be glorified, and his free grace for ever admired.

Thirdly. He is assured of the good success of his undertaking; for whom God calls he will prosper. And as to this,

1. He objects the discouragement he had met with at his first setting out; ver. 4, "Then I said," with a sad heart, "I have laboured in vain." Those that were ignorant, and careless, and strangers to God, are so still. I have called, and they have refused, have stretched out my hands to a gainsaying people. This was Isaiah's complaint, but it was no more than he was told to expect, ch. vi. 9. And the same was a temptation to Jeremiah to resolve he would labour no more, Jer. xx. 9. It is the complaint of many a faithful minister, that has not loitered, but laboured, not spared, but spent his strength, and himself with it, and yet as to many it is all in vain and for nought, they will not be prevailed with to repent and believe. But here it seems to point at the obstinacy of the Jews, among whom Christ went in person preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, laboured and spent his strength, and yet the rulers and the body of the nation rejected him and his doctrine; so very few were brought in, when one would have thought none should have stood out, that he might well say, "I have laboured in vain," preached so many sermons, wrought so many miracles in vain. Let not the ministers think it strange that they are slighted, when the Master himself was.

2. He comforts himself under this discouragement with this consideration, that it was the cause of God in which he was engaged, and the call of God that engaged him in it; "Yet surely my judgment is with the Lord," who is the Judge of all, "and my work with my God," whose servant I am. His comfort is, and it may be the comfort of all faithful ministers, when they see little success of their labours, 1st. That, however it be, it is a righteous cause that they are pleading, they are with God, and for God, they are on his side, and workers together with him; they like not their judgment, the rule they go by, nor their work, the business they are employed in, ever the worse for this; the unbelief of men gives them no cause to suspect the truth of their doctrine, Rom. iii. 3. 2nd. That their management of this cause, and their prosecution of this work, was known to God, and they could appeal to him concerning their sincerity, and that it was not through any neglect of theirs that they laboured in vain; "He knows the way that I take;" "my judgment is with the Lord," to determine whether I have not delivered my soul, and left the blood of them that perish on their own heads. 3rd. Though the labour be in vain as to those that are laboured with, yet not as to the labourer himself, if he be faithful. His judgment is with the Lord, who will justify him, and bear him out, though men condemn him, and run him down; and his work, that is, the reward of his work, is with his God, who will take care he shall be no loser, no, not by his lost labour. 4th. Though the judgment be not yet brought forth unto victory, nor the work to perfection, yet both are with the Lord, to carry them on, and succeed them, according to his purpose, in his own way and time.

3. He receives from God a farther answer to this objection, ver. 5, 6. He knew very well that God had set him on work, had formed him from the womb to be his servant; not only called him so early to it, ver. 1, but began so early to fit him for it, and dispose him to it. Those whom God designs to employ as his servants, he is fashioning and preparing them to be so long before, when perhaps neither themselves nor others are aware of it; it is he that formeth the spirit of man within him. Christ was to be his servant to bring Jacob again to him, that had treacherously departed from him; the seed of Jacob therefore, according to the flesh, must first be dealt with, and means used to bring them back. Christ, and the word of salvation by him, are sent to them first; nay, Christ comes in person to them only, "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But what if Jacob will not be brought back to God, and Israel will not be gathered? So it proved; but this is a satisfaction in that case.

1st. Christ will be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and those are truly glorious that are so in God's eyes. Though few of the Jewish nation were converted by Christ's preaching and miracles, and many of them loaded him with ignominy and disgrace, yet God put honour upon him, and made him glorious, at his baptism, in his transfiguration, spoke to him from heaven, sent angels to minister to him, made even his shameful death glorious by the many prodigies that attended it, much more in his resurrection. In his sufferings God was his strength; so that, though he met with all the discouragement imaginable, by the contempts of a people whom he had done so much to oblige, yet he did not fail, nor was discouraged; an angel was sent from heaven to strengthen him, Lu. xxii. 43. Faithful ministers, though they see not the fruit of their labours, yet they shall be accepted of God, and in that they shall be truly glorious, for his favour is our honour; and they shall be assisted to proceed and persevere in their labours notwithstanding. This weakens their hands, but their God will be their strength.

2nd. The Gospel shall be glorious in the eyes of the world. Though it be not so in the eyes of the Jews, yet it shall be entertained by the nations, ver. 6. The Messiah seemed as if he had been primarily designed to bring Jacob back, ver. 5. But he is here told that that is comparatively but a small matter; a higher orb of honour than that, and a larger sphere of usefulness, are designed him; "It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob" to the dignity and dominion they expect by the Messiah, "and to restore the preserved of Israel," and make them a flourishing church and state as formerly. Nay, considering what a little handful of people they are, it would be but a small matter, in comparison, for the Messiah to be the Saviour of them only; and therefore "I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles." Many great and mighty nations, by the Gospel of Christ, shall be brought to the knowledge and worship of the true God, "That thou mayest be my salvation," the author of that salvation which I have designed for lost man, and this "to the end of the earth," to nations at the greatest distance. Hence Simeon learned to call Christ a Light to lighten the Gentiles, Lu. ii. 32; and St. Paul's exposition of this text is what we ought to abide by, and it serves for a key to the context; Acts xiii. 47, "Therefore," saith he, "we turn to the Gentiles," to preach the Gospel to them; "because so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles." In this the Redeemer was truly glorious, though Israel was not gathered; the setting up of his kingdom in the Gentile world was more his honour than if he had raised up all the tribes of Jacob. This promise is in part fulfilled already, and will have a farther accomplishment, if that time be yet to come which the apostle speaks of, when "the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in." Observe, God calls it his salvation; which, some think, intimates how well pleased he was with it, how he gloried in it, and (if I may so say) how much his heart was upon it. And farther observe, that Christ is given for a light to all those to whom he is given for salvation. It is in darkness that men perish; Christ enlightens men's eyes, and so makes them holy and happy.

7 Thus saith the LORD,
The Redeemer of Israel, and his Holy One,
To him whom man despiseth, to him whom the nation [abhorreth,
To a servant of rulers,
Kings shall see and arise,
Princes also shall worship,
Because of the LORD that is faithful,
And the Holy One of Israel, and he shall choose thee.
8 Thus saith the LORD,
In an acceptable time have I heard thee,
And in a day of salvation have I helped thee:
And I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, [heritages;
To establish the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate
9 That thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth;
To them that are in darkness, Shew yourselves.
They shall feed in the ways,
And their pastures shall be in all high places
10 They shall not hunger nor thirst;
Neither shall the heat nor sun smite them:
For he that hath mercy on them shall lead them,
Even by the springs of water shall he guide them.
11 And I will make all my mountains a way,
And my highways shall be exalted.
12 Behold, these shall come from far:
And, lo, these from the north and from the west,
And these from the land of Sinim.

In these verses we have,

First. The humiliation and exaltation of the Messiah; ver. 7, "The Lord, the Redeemer of Israel," and Israel's Holy One, that had always taken care of the Jewish church, and wrought out for them those deliverances that were typical of the great salvation, speaks here to him who was the undertaker of that salvation. And, 1. He takes notice of his humiliation, the instances of which were uncommon, nay, they were unparalleled. He was one whom man despised; ch. liii. 2, "He is despised and rejected of men." To be despised by so mean a creature, man, that is himself a worm, speaks the lowest and most contemptible condition imaginable. Man, whom he came to save, and to put honour upon, yet despised him, and put contempt upon him, so wretchedly ungrateful were his persecutors. The ignominy he underwent was not the least of his sufferings; nay, they not only made him despicable, but odious. He was "one whom the nation abhorred;" they treated him as the worst of men, and cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him." The nation did it, the Gentiles as well as Jews, and the Jews herein worse than Gentiles; for his cross was to the one a stumblingblock, and to the other foolishness. He was "a servant of rulers;" he was trampled upon, abused, scourged, and crucified as a slave. Pilate boasted of his power over him, Jno. xix. 10. This he submitted to for our salvation. 2. He promiseth him his exaltation. Honour was done him, even in the depth of his humiliation. Herod the king stood in awe of him, saying, "It is John the Baptist." Noblemen, rulers, centurions, came and kneeled to him. But this was to be more fully accomplished when kings should receive his Gospel, and submit to his yoke, and join in the worship of him, and call themselves the vassals of Christ. Not that Christ values the rich more than the poor, they stand upon a level with him; but it is for the honour of his kingdom among men, when the great ones of the earth appear for him, and do homage to him. This shall be the accomplishment of God's promise, that he will give him the heathen for his inheritance; and therefore it shall be done, because of the Lord that is faithful and true to his promise. And it shall be an evidence that Christ had a commission for what he did, and that God had chosen him, and would own the choice he had made.

Secondly. The blessings he hath in store for all those to whom he is made salvation.

1. God will own him, and stand by him in his undertaking; ver. 8, "In an acceptable time have I heard thee;" that is, I will hear thee. Christ, "in the days of his flesh, offered up strong cries, and was heard," Heb. v. 7. He knew that the Father heard him always, Jno. xi. 42; heard him for himself, for though the cup might not pass from him, yet he was enabled to drink it; heard him for all that are his, and therefore he interceded for them as one having authority; "Father, I will," Jno. xvii. 24. And all our happiness results from the Son's interest in the Father, and the prevalency of his intercession, that he always heard him. And this makes the gospel time an acceptable time, welcome to us, because we are accepted of God, both reconciled and recommended to him, that God hears the Redeemer for us, Heb. vii. 25. Nor will he hear him only, but help him to get through with his undertaking. The Father was always with him at his right hand, and did not leave him when his disciples did. Violent attacks were made upon our Lord Jesus by the powers of darkness, when it was their hour, to have driven him off from his undertakings; but God promised to preserve him, and enable him to persevere in it. On that one stone was seven eyes, Zec. iii. 9. God would preserve him; that is, would preserve his interest, his kingdom amongst men, though fought against on all sides. Christ is preserved while Christianity is.

2. God will authorize him to apply to his church the benefits of the redemption he is to work out. God's preserving and helping him was to make the day of his Gospel a day of salvation, and so the apostle understands it: "behold, now is the day of salvation;" now the word of reconciliation by Christ is preached, 2 Cor. vi. 2.

1st. He shall be guarantee of the treaty of peace between God and man. "I will give thee for a covenant of the people." This we had before, ch. xlii. 6, and it is here repeated, as faithful and well worthy of all acceptation and observation. He is given for a covenant; that is, for a pledge of all the blessings of the covenant. It was in him that God was reconciling the world to himself; and he that spared not his own Son will deny us nothing. He is given for a covenant, not only as he is the Mediator of the covenant, the blessed Daysman that has laid his hand upon us both, but as he is all in all in the covenant. All the duty of the covenant is summed up in our being his; and all the privilege and happiness of the covenant is summed up in his being ours.

2nd. He shall repair the decays of the church, and build it upon a rock. He shall establish the earth, or rather the land, the land of Judah, a type of the church. He shall cause the desolate heritages to be inherited. So the cities of Judah were after the return out of captivity; and so the church, that in the last and degenerate ages of the Jewish nation had been as a country laid waste, but was again replenished by the fruits of the preaching of the Gospel.

3rd. He shall free the souls of men from the bondage of guilt and corruption, and bring them into the glorious liberty of God's children. He shall say to the prisoners, that were bound over to the justice of God, and bound under the power of Satan, "Go forth," ver. 9. Pardoning mercy is a release from the curse of the law, and renewing grace is a release from the dominion of sin; both are from Christ, and are branches of the great salvation. It is he that saith, Go forth; it is the Son that makes us free, and then we are free indeed. He saith to them that are in darkness, "Shew yourselves;" not only see, but be seen, to the glory of God, and your own comfort. When he discharged the lepers from their confinement, he said, "Go, shew yourselves to the priest." When we see the light, let our light shine.

4th. He shall provide for the comfortable passage of those whom he sets at liberty to the place of their rest and happy settlement, ver. 9—11, which refers to the provision made for the Jews returning out of their captivity, who were taken under the particular care of the Divine providence, as favourites of heaven, and now so in a special manner. But it is applicable to that conduct of Divine grace, which all God's spiritual Israel are under, from their release out of bondage, to their settlement in the heavenly Canaan. First. They shall have their charges borne, and shall be fed on free cost with food convenient. "They shall feed in the ways," as sheep; for now, as formerly, God leadeth Joseph like a flock. When God pleaseth, even highway ground shall be good ground for the sheep of his pasture to feed in. Their pastures shall not only be in the valleys, but in all high places, which commonly used to be dry and barren. Wherever God brings his people, he will take care they shall want nothing that is good for them, Ps. xxxiv. 10. And so well shall they be provided for, that "they shall not hunger nor thirst;" for what they need they shall have seasonably, before their need of it comes to any extremity. Secondly. They shall be sheltered and protected from every thing that would incommode them; "neither shall the heat nor sun smite them," for God causeth his flock to rest at noon, Cant. i. 7. And no evil thing shall befall those that put themselves under a Divine protection; they shall be enabled to bear the burthen and heat of the day. Thirdly. They shall be under God's gracious guidance; "He that hath mercy on them," in bringing them out of their captivity, "shall lead them," as he did their fathers in the wilderness, by a pillar of cloud and fire; even "by springs of water," which will be ready to them in their march, "shall he guide them;" that is, God will furnish them with suitable and seasonable comforts, not like the pools of rain water in the valley of Baca, but like the water out of the rock which followed Israel. Those who are under a Divine conduct, and follow that close, while they do so may, upon good grounds, hope for Divine comforts and cordials. The world leads its followers by broken cisterns, or brooks that fail in summer; but God leads those that are his by springs of water. And those whom God guides shall find a ready road, and all obstacles removed; ver. 11, "I will make all my mountains a way." He that in times past made the sea a way, now with as much ease will make the mountains a way, though they seemed impassable. The highway, or causeway, shall be raised, to make it both the plainer and the fairer. Note, The ways in which God leads his people he himself will be the overseer of, and will take care they be well mended, and kept in repair, as of old the ways that led to the cities of refuge. The levelling of the roads from Babylon, as it was foretold, ch. xl. 2, 3, was applied to gospel work, and so may this be. Though there be difficulties in the way to heaven which we cannot by our own strength get over, yet the grace of God shall be sufficient for us to help us over them, and to make even the mountains a way, ch. xxxv. 8.

5th. He shall bring them all together from all parts, that they may return in a body, that they may encourage one another, and be the more taken notice of. They were dispersed into several parts of the country of Babylon, as their enemies pleased, to prevent any combination among themselves; but, when God's time is come to bring them home together, one spirit shall animate them; all that lie at the greatest distance from each other, and those also that had taken shelter in other countries, shall meet them in the land of Judah, ver. 12. Here shall a party come from far, some from the north, some from the west, some from the land of Sinim, which probably is some province of Baby on, not elsewhere named in Scripture. But some make it to be a country belonging to one of the chief cities of Egypt, called Sin, of which we read, Eze. xxx. 15, 16. Now this promise was to have a farther accomplishment in the great confluence of converts to the gospel church, and its full accomplishment when God's chosen shall come from the east and from the west to sit down with the patriarchs in the kingdom of God, Mat. viii. 11.

13 Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth;
And break forth into singing, O mountains:
For the LORD hath comforted his people,
And will have mercy upon his afflicted.
14 But Zion said, The LORD hath forsaken me,
And my Lord hath forgotten me.
15 Can a woman forget her sucking child, [womb?
That she should not have compassion on the son of her
Yea, they may forget,
Yet will I not forget thee.
16 Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands;
Thy walls are continually before me.
17 Thy children shall make haste;
Thy destroyers and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee.

The scope of these verses is to shew that the return of the people of God out of their captivity, and the eternal redemption to be wrought out by Christ, which that was a type of, would be great occasions of joy to the church, and great proofs of the tender care God has of the church.

First. Nothing can furnish us with better matter for songs of praise and thanksgiving, ver. 13. Let the whole creation join with us in songs of joy, for it shares with us in the benefits of the redemption, and all they can contribute to this sacred melody is little enough in return for such inestimable favours, Ps. xcvi. 11. Let there be joy in heaven, and let the angels of God celebrate the praises of the great Redeemer; let the earth, and the mountains, particularly the great ones of the earth, be joyful, and break forth into singing, for the earnest expectation of the creatures, that waits for the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. viii. 19, 21,) shall now be abundantly answered. God's people are the blessings and ornaments of the world, and therefore let there be a universal joy, for God hath comforted his people that were in sorrow, and he will have mercy upon the afflicted, because of his compassion; upon his afflicted, because of his covenant.

Secondly. Nothing can furnish us with more convincing arguments to prove the most tender and affectionate concern God hath for his church, and her interests and comforts.

1. The troubles of the church have given some occasion to question God's care and concern for it; ver. 14, Zion, in distress, said, "The Lord hath forsaken me," and doth look after me no more; "my Lord hath forgotten me," and will look after me no more. See how deplorable the case of God's people may be sometimes, such as that they may seem to be forsaken and forgotten of their God, and how violent and prevalent their temptations may be at such a time. Infidels, in their presumption, say, "God hath forsaken the earth," Eze. viii. 12; and hath forgotten their sins, Ps. x. 11. Weak believers, in their despondency, are ready to say, God hath forsaken his church, and forgotten the sorrows of his people; but we have no more reason to question his promise and grace than we have to question his providence and justice. He is as sure a rewarder as he is a revenger. Away, therefore, with these distrusts and jealousies which are the bane of friendship.

2. The triumphs of the church, after her troubles, will, in due time, put the matter out of question. What God will do for Zion we are told, ver. 17, 1st. Her friends that had deserted her shall be gathered to her, and shall contribute their utmost to her assistance and comfort; "Thy children shall make haste." Converts to the faith of Christ are the children of the church; they shall join themselves to her with great readiness and cheerfulness, "and flock" into the communion of saints, "as doves to their windows." 'Thy builders shall make haste,' so some read it, that shall build up thy houses, thy walls, especially thy temple; they shall do it with expedition. Church work useth to be slow work; but when God's time is come it shall be done suddenly. 2nd. Her enemies, that had threatened and assaulted her, shall be forced to withdraw from her. "Thy destroyers, and they that made thee waste," that had made themselves masters of the country, and ravaged it, "shall go forth of thee." By Christ, the prince of this world, the great destroyer, is cast out, is dispossessed, his power broken, and his attempts quite baffled. Now by this it will appear that Zion's suggestions were altogether groundless, that God hath not forsaken her, or forgotten her, nor never will. Be assured,

First. That God hath a tender affection for his church and people, ver. 15. In answer to Zion's fears, God speaks as one concerned for his own glory; he takes himself to be reflected upon if Zion say, "The Lord has forsaken me," and he will clear himself; as one concerned also for his people's comfort, he would not have them droop and be discouraged, and give way to any uneasy thoughts. You think I have forgotten you; "Can a woman forget her sucking child?" 1*st.* It is not likely that she should. A woman, whose honour it is to be of the tender sex as well as the fair one, cannot but have compassion for a child, that, being both harmless and helpless, is a proper object of compassion. A mother especially cannot but be concerned for her own child; for it is her own, a piece of herself, and very lately one with her. A nursing mother, most of all, cannot but be tender of her sucking child; her own gorged breasts will soon put her in mind of it, if she should forget it. But, 2*nd.* It is possible "they may forget." A woman may perhaps be so unhappy as not to be able to remember her sucking child; she may be sick, and dying, and going to the land of forgetfulness; or she may be so unnatural as not to "have compassion on the son of her womb;" like those who, to conceal their shame, are the death of their children, as soon as they are their life, Lam. iv. 10; Deu. xxviii. 58; but saith God, "I will not forget thee." Note, God's compassions to his people infinitely exceed those of the tenderest parents towards their children. What are the affections of nature to those of the God of nature?

Secondly. That he hath a constant care of his church and people; ver. 16, "I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands." This doth not allude to the foolish art of palmistry, which imagines every man's fate to be engraven in the palms of his hands, and to be legible in the lines there; but to the custom of those who tie a string upon their hands or fingers to put them in mind of things that they are afraid they shall forget, or to the wearing of signet or locket-rings, in remembrance of some dear friend. His setting them thus as a seal upon his arm denotes his setting them as a seal upon his heart, and his being ever mindful of them and their interests, Cant. viii. 6. If we bind God's laws as a sign upon our hand, (Deu. vi. 8; xi. 18,) he will engrave our interests as a sign on his hand, and will look upon that, and remember the covenant. He adds, "Thy walls shall be continually before me." Thy ruined walls, though no pleasing spectacle, shall be in my thoughts of compassion. Do Zion's friends favour her dust? Ps. cii. 14; so doth her God. Or, the plan and model of thy walls, that are to be rebuilt, are before me, and they shall certainly be built according to it. Or, thy walls; that is, thy safety, it is my continual care; so are the watchmen on thy walls. Some apply the graving of his church on the palms of his hands to the wounds in Christ's hands, when he was crucified; he will look on the marks of them, and remember those for whom he suffered and died.

18 Lift up thine eyes round about, and behold:
All these gather themselves together, and come to thee.
As I live, saith the LORD, [ornament,
Thou shalt surely clothe thee with them all, as with an
And bind them on thee, as a bride doeth.
19 For thy waste and thy desolate places, and the land of thy destruction,
Shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants,
And they that swallowed thee up shall be far away.
20 The children which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other,
Shall say again in thine ears, The place is too strait for Give place to me that I may dwell. [me:
21 Then shalt thou say in thine heart,
Who hath begotten me these,
Seeing I have lost my children, and am desolate,
A captive, and removing to and fro? and who hath brought up these?
Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?
22 Thus saith the Lord GOD,
Behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles,
And set up my standard to the people:
And they shall bring thy sons in their arms,
And thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders.
23 And kings shall be thy nursing fathers,
And their queens thy nursing mothers:
They shall bow down to thee with their face toward the
And lick up the dust of thy feet; [earth,
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD:
For they shall not be ashamed that wait for me.

Two things are here promised, which were to be in part accomplished in the reviving of the Jewish church after its return out of captivity, but more fully in the planting of the Christian church by the preaching of the Gospel of Christ; and we may take the comfort of these promises.

First. That the church shall be replenished with great numbers added to it. It was promised, ver. 17, that her children should make haste; that promise is here enlarged upon, and is made very encouraging. It is promised,

1. That multitudes shall flock to the church from all parts. Look round, and see how they gather themselves to thee, ver. 18, by a local accession to the Jewish church: they come to Jerusalem from all the adjacent countries, for that was then the centre of their unity. But, under the Gospel, it is by a spiritual accession to the mystical body of Christ, in faith and love. Those that are come to Jesus, as the Mediator of the new covenant, thereby come to mount Zion, the church of the firstborn, Heb. xii. 22, 23. Lift up thine eyes, and behold how the fields are white unto the harvest, Jno. iv. 35. Note, It is matter of joy to the church, to see a multitude of converts to Christ.

2. That such as are added to the church shall not be a burthen and blemish to her, but her strength and ornament. This part of the promise is confirmed with an oath: "As I live, saith the Lord, thou shalt surely clothe thee with them all." The addition of such numbers to the church shall complete her clothing; and when all that were chosen are effectually called, then the bride, the Lamb's wife, shall have made herself ready, shall be quite dressed, Rev. xix. 7. They shall make her to appear comely and considerable, and she shall therefore bind them on with as much care and complacency as a bride doth her ornaments. When those that are added to the church are serious, and holy, and exemplary in their conversation, they are an ornament to it.

3. That thus the country that was waste and desolate, and without an inhabitant, (ch. v. 9; vi. 11,) shall be again peopled; nay, it shall be over-peopled, ver. 19. "Thy waste and thy desolate places," that have long lain so, "and the land of thy destruction," that land of thine which was destroyed with thee, and which nobody cared for dwelling in, shall now be so full of people that there shall be no room for the inhabitants. Here is a blessing poured out, till there be not room enough to receive it, Mal. iii. 10. Not that they shall be crowded up by their enemies, or straitened for room, as Abraham and Lot were because of the Canaanites in the land; no, "they that swallowed thee up," and took possession of thy land when thy possession of it was discontinued, "shall be far away." Thy people shall be numerous, and there shall be no stranger, no enemy among them. Thus the kingdom of God among men, that had been impoverished and almost depopulated, partly by the corruptions of the Jewish church, and partly by the abominations of the Gentile world, was again peopled and enriched by the setting up of the Christian church, and the graces and glories of that.

4. That the new converts shall strangely increase and multiply. Jerusalem, after she has lost the abundance of her children by the sword, famine, and captivity, shall have a new brood growing up instead of them; children which she shall have after she has lost the other, ver. 20: as Seth, that was appointed another seed instead of Abel, and Job's children which God blessed him with, instead of those that were killed in the ruins of the house. God will repair his church's losses, and secure to himself a seed to serve him in it. It is promised to the Jews after their return, that "Jerusalem shall be full of boys and girls, playing in the streets," Zec. viii. 5. The church, after it has lost the Jews, who will be cut off by their own infidelity, yet shall have abundance of children still, more than she had when the Jews belonged to her; see Gal. iv. 27. They shall be so numerous, that, 1st. The children shall complain for want of room. They shall say, and it is a good hearing, that their numbers increase so fast, that the place is too strait for them; as the sons of the prophets complained, 2 Kin. vi. 1. But, as strait as the place is, still more shall desire to be admitted, and the church shall gladly admit them; and the inconvenient straitness of the place shall be no hindrance to either; for it will be found, whatever we think, that even when the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind, are brought in, yet still there is room, room enough for those that are in, and room for more, Lu. xiv. 21, 22. 2nd. The mother shall stand amazed at the increase of her family, ver. 21; she shall say, "Who hath begotten me these? and who has brought up these?" They come to her with all the duty, affection, and submission of children, and yet she never bore any pain for them, nor took any pains with them, but has them ready reared to her hand. This gives her a pleasing surprise; and she cannot but be astonished at it, considering what her condition had been very lately, and very long. The Jewish nation had lost her children, they were cut off; she had been desolate, without ark, and altar, and temple service, those tokens of God's espousals to them; nay, she had been a captive, and continually moving to and fro in an unsettled condition, and not likely to bring up children, either for God or herself. She was left alone, in obscurity; "This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after," left in all the solitude and sorrow of a widowed state. How then came she to be thus replenished? See here, First. That the church is not perpetually visible, but there are times when it is desolate, and left alone, and made few in number. Secondly. That yet, on the other hand, its desolations shall not be perpetual, nor will it be found too hard for God to repair them, and out of stones to raise up children unto Abraham. Thirdly. That sometimes this is done in a very surprising way, as when a nation is born at once, ch. lxvi. 8.

5. That this shall be done with the help of the Gentiles, ver. 22. The Jews were cast off, among whom it was expected that the church should be built up; but God will sow it to himself in the earth, and from thence will reap a plentiful crop, Hos. ii. 23. Observe, 1st. How the Gentiles shall be called in. God will lift up his hand to them, to invite or beckon them, having all the day stretched it out in vain to the Jews, ch. lxv. 2. Or, it notes the exerting of an almighty power, that of his Spirit and grace, to compel them to come in, that is, to make them willing; and he will set up his standard to them, that is, the preaching of the everlasting Gospel, to which they shall gather, and under which they shall lift themselves. 2nd. How they shall come. "They shall bring thy sons in their arms," that is, either, they shall assist the sons of Zion which are found among them, in their return to their own country, and shall forward them with as much tenderness as ever any parent carried a child that was weak and helpless, (God can raise up friends for returning Israelites, even among Gentiles; "The earth helped the woman," Rev. xii. 16,) or, when they come themselves, they shall bring their children, and make them thy children: compare ch. lx. 40. Dost thou ask who has begotten and brought up these? Know, that they were begotten and brought up among the Gentiles, but they are now brought into thy family. Let all that are concerned about young converts, and young beginners in religion, learn hence to deal very tenderly and carefully with them, as Christ doth with the lambs, whom he gathers with his arms, and carries in his bosom.

Secondly. That the church shall have a great and prevailing interest in the nations, ver. 23. 1. Some of the princes of the nations shall become patrons and protectors to the church; "Kings shall be thy nursing fathers," to carry thy sons in their arms, ver. 24, as Moses, Num. xi. 14; and, because women are the most proper nurses, "their queens shall be thy nursing mothers." This promise was in part fulfilled to the Jews after their return out of captivity: divers of the kings of Persia were very tender of their interests, countenanced and encouraged them, as Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes. Esther, the queen, was a nursing mother to the Jews that remained in their captivity, putting her life in her hand, to snatch the child out of the flames. The Christian church, after a long captivity, was happy in some such kings and queens as Constantine and his mother Helena, and afterwards Theodosius and others, that nursed the church with all possible care and tenderness. Whenever the sceptre of government is put into the hands of religious princes, then this promise is fulfilled. The church, in this world, is in an infant state, and it is in the power of princes and magistrates to do it a great deal of service; it is happy when they do so, when their power is a praise to them that do well. 2. Others of them, that stand it out against the church's interests, will be forced to yield, and to repent of their opposition; they shall bow down to thee, and lick the dust. The promise to the church of Philadelphia seems to be borrowed from this; Rev. iii. 9, "I will make them of the synagogue of Satan to come and worship before thy face." Or, it may be meant of the willing subjection which kings and kingdoms shall pay to Christ, the church's king, as he manifests himself in the church; Ps. lxxii. 11, "All kings shall fall down before him." And by all this it shall be made to appear, 1st. That God is the Lord, the sovereign Lord of all, against whom there is no standing out, or rising up. 2nd. That those that wait for him, in a dependence upon his promise, and a resignation to his will, shall not be made ashamed of their hope; for the vision of peace is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and shall not lie.

24 Shall the prey be taken from the mighty,
Or the lawful captive delivered?
25 But thus saith the LORD,
Even the captives of the mighty shall be taken away,
And the prey of the terrible shall be delivered:
For I will contend with him that contendeth with thee,
And I will save thy children. [flesh;
26 And I will feed them that oppress thee with their own
And they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with
And all flesh shall know [sweet wine:
That I the LORD am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer,
The mighty One of Jacob.

Here is, First. An objection started against the promise of the Jews' release out of their captivity in Babylon, suggesting that it was a thing not to be expected: for, ver. 14, they were a prey in the hand of the mighty; of such as were then the greatest potentates on earth, and therefore it was not likely they should be rescued by force. Yet that was not all, they were lawful captives; by the law of God, having offended, they were justly delivered into captivity; and by the law of nations, being taken in war, they were justly detained in captivity, till they should be ransomed or exchanged. Now this is spoken, either, 1. By the enemies, as justifying themselves in their refusal to let them go. They plead both might and right. Proud men think all their own they can lay their hands on, and their title good, if they have but the longest sword. 2. Or by their friends: either in a way of distrust, despairing of the deliverance, (for who is able to deal with those that detain us, either by force of arms or a treaty of peace?) or in a way of thankfulness, admiring the deliverance; who would have thought that ever the prey should "be taken from the mighty?" yet it is done. This is applicable to our redemption by Christ: As to Satan, we were a prey in the hand of the mighty, and yet delivered, even from him that had the power of death, by him that had the power of life. As to the justice of God, we were lawful captives, and yet delivered by a price of inestimable value.

Secondly. This objection answered by an express promise, and a farther promise; for God's promises being all yea and amen, they may well serve to corroborate one another. 1. Here is an express promise, with a non obstante,—'notwithstanding,' to the strength of the enemy, ver. 25. "Even the captives of the mighty," though they are mighty, "shall be taken away," and it is to no purpose for them to oppose it, "and the prey of the terrible," though they are terrible, "shall be delivered;" and as they cannot with all their strength outforce, so they cannot with all their impudence outface, the deliverance, and the counsels of God concerning it. The Lord saith thus, who, having all power in his hands, and all hearts, is able to make his words good. 2. Here is a farther promise, shewing how and in what way God will bring about the deliverance. He will bring judgments upon the oppressors, and so will work salvation for the oppressed. "I will contend with him that contendeth with thee," will plead thy cause against those that justify themselves in oppressing thee; whoever it be, though but a single person, that contendeth with thee, he shall know that it is at his peril; and thus "I will save thy children." The captives shall be delivered by leading captivity captive, that is, sending those into captivity that had held God's people captive, Rev. xiii. 10. Nay, they shall have blood for blood, ver. 26; "I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh," and "they shall be drunken with their own blood;" that is, the proud Babylonians shall become not only an easy but an acceptable prey to one another; God will send a dividing spirit among them, and their ruin, which was begun by a foreign invasion, shall be completed by their intestine divisions. They shall bite and devour one another, till they are consumed one of another. They shall greedily, and with delight, prey upon those that are their own flesh and blood. God can make the oppressors of his church to be their own tormentors, and their own destroyers. The New-Testament Babylon having made herself drunk with the blood of the saints, shall have blood given her to drink, for she is worthy. See how cruel men sometimes are to themselves, to one another; and those that are so to others, are so to themselves, for God's justice and men's revenge will mete to them what they have measured to others; they not only thirst after blood, but drink it so greedily that they are drunken with it, and with as much pleasure as if it were sweet wine. If God had not more mercy on sinners than they would have one upon another were their passions let loose, the world would be soon an Aceldama, nay, a desolation.

Thirdly. See what will be the effect of Babylon's ruin: "All flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour." God will make it to appear to the conviction of all the world that, though Israel seem lost and cast off, they have a Redeemer; and though they are made a prey to the mighty, Jacob hath a mighty One, that is able to deal with all his enemies. God intends, by the deliverances of his church, both to notify and to magnify his own name.

CHAPTER L.

In this chapter, I. Those to whom God sends are justly charged with bringing all the troubles they were in upon themselves, by their own wilfulness and obstinacy; it being made to appear that God was able and ready to help them, if they had been fit for deliverance, ver. 1—3. II. He by whom God sends produceth his commission, ver. 4; allegeth his own readiness to submit to all the services and sufferings he was called to in the execution of it, ver. 5, 6; and assures himself that God who sent him would stand by him, and bear him out against all opposition, ver. 7—9. III. The message that is sent is life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse; comfort to desponding saints, and terror to presuming sinners, ver. 10, 11. Now all this seems to have a double reference: 1. To the unbelieving Jews in Babylon, who quarrelled with God for his dealings with them; and to the prophet Isaiah, who, though dead long before the captivity, yet, prophesying so plainly and fully of it, saw fit to produce his credentials, to justify what he had said. 2. To the unbelieving Jews in our Saviour's time, whose own fault it was that they were rejected; Christ having preached much to them, and suffered much from them, and being herein borne up by a Divine power. The contents of this chapter in our Bibles give this sense of it very concisely, thus: Christ shews, that the dereliction of the Jews is not to be imputed to him, by his ability to save, by his obedience in that work, and by his confidence in Divine assistance; and concludes with an exhortation to trust in God, and not in ourselves.

THUS saith the LORD,
Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement,
Whom I have put away?
Or which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you?
Behold, for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves,
And for your transgressions is your mother put away.

2 Wherefore, when I came, was there no man?
When I called, was there none to answer?
Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem?
Or have I no power to deliver?
Behold, at my rebuke I dry up the sea,
I make the rivers a wilderness:
Their fish stinketh, because there is no water,
And dieth for thirst.

3 I clothe the heavens with blackness,
And I make sackcloth their covering.

Those who have professed to be the people of God, and yet seem to be dealt severely with, are apt to complain of God, and to lay the fault upon him, as if he had been hard with them. But in answer to their murmurings, we have here,

First. A challenge given them to prove, or produce any evidence, that the quarrel began on God's side, ver. 1. They could not say that he had done them any wrong, or had acted arbitrarily. 1. He had been a husband to them; and husbands were then allowed a power to put away their wives upon any little disgust; if they found not favour in their eyes, they made nothing of giving them a bill of divorce, Deu. xxiv. 1; Mat. xix. 7. But they could not say that God had dealt so with them. It is true, they were now separated from him, and had abode many days without ephod, altar, or sacrifice; but whose fault was that? They could not say that God had given their mother a bill of divorce; let them produce it if they can; for a bill of divorce was given into the hand of her that was divorced. 2. He had been a father to them; and fathers had then a power to sell their children for slaves to their creditors, in satisfaction for the debts they were not otherwise able to pay. Now it was true, that the Jews were sold, to the Babylonians then, and afterwards to the Romans; but did God sell them for payment of his debts? No, he was not indebted to any of those to whom they were sold; or, if he had, he did not increase his wealth by their price, Ps. xliv. 12. When God chastens his children, it is neither for his pleasure, Heb. xii. 10, nor for his profit. All that are saved are saved by a prerogative of grace; but those that perish are cut off by an act of Divine holiness and justice, not of absolute sovereignty.

Secondly. A charge exhibited against them, shewing that they were themselves the authors of their own ruin. "Behold, for your iniquities," for the pleasure of them, and the gratification of your own base lusts, "you have sold yourselves;" for your iniquities you are sold; not as children are sold by their parents, to pay their debts, but as malefactors are sold by the judges, to punish them for their crimes. You sold yourselves to work wickedness, and therefore God justly sold you into the hands of your enemies, 2 Chr. xii. 5, 8. It is "for your transgressions that your mother is put away," for her whoredoms and adulteries, which were always allowed to be a just cause of divorce. The Jews were sent into Babylon for their idolatry, a sin which broke the marriage covenant, and were at last rejected for crucifying the Lord of glory; these were the iniquities for which they were sold, and put away.

Thirdly. The confirmation of this challenge and this charge.

1. It is plain it was long of themselves that they were cast off, for God came and offered them his favour, offered them his helping hand, either to prevent their trouble or to deliver them out of it, but they slighted him and all the tenders of his grace. Do you lay it upon me? saith God; tell me, then, wherefore when I came there was no man to meet me, when I called there was none to answer me? ver. 2. God came to them by his servants the prophets, demanding the fruits of his vineyard, Mat. xxi. 34; sent them his messengers, rising up betimes and sending them, Jer. xxxv. 15; called them to leave their sins, and so prevent their own ruin: but there was no man, or next to none, that had any regard to the warnings which the prophets gave them, none that answered the calls of God, or complied with the messages he sent them; and this was it for which they were sold and put away, because they mocked the messengers of the Lord, therefore God "brought upon them the king of the Chaldees," 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16, 17. Last of all he sent unto them his Son; he "came to his own, but his own received him not;" he called them to himself, but there were none that answered; he would have gathered Jerusalem's children together, but they would not; they knew not, because they would not know, the things that belonged to their peace, nor the day of their visitation, and for that transgression it was that they were put away, and their house left desolate, Mat. xxi. 41; xxiii. 37, 38; Lu. xix. 41, 42. When God calls men to happiness, and they will not answer, they are justly left to be miserable.

2. It is plain it was not long of God, for he is almighty, and could have recovered them from so great a death; not long of Christ, for he is able to save to the uttermost. The unbelieving Jews in Babylon thought they were not delivered, because their God was not able to do it; and those in Christ's time were ready to ask in scorn, Can this man save us, for himself he cannot save? But, saith God, "Is my hand shortened at all?" Or is it weakened? Can any limits be set to omnipotence? Cannot he redeem who is the great Redeemer? or hath he no power to deliver whose all power is? To put to silence, and for ever to put to shame, their doubts concerning his power, he here gives unquestionable proofs of it. 1st. He can, when he pleaseth, dry up the seas, and "make the rivers a wilderness;" he did so for Israel, when he redeemed them out of Egypt; he can do so again for their redemption out of Babylon. It is done at his rebuke, as easily as with a word's speaking; he can so dry up the rivers as to leave the fish to die for want of water, and to putrefy. When God turned the waters of Egypt into blood he slew the fish, Ps. cv. 24. The expression our Saviour sometimes used concerning the power of faith, that it will remove mountains and plant sycamores in the sea, is not unlike this; if their faith could do that, no doubt their faith would save them, and therefore they were inexcusable if they perished in unbelief. 2nd. He can, when he pleaseth, eclipse the light of heaven, clothe them with blackness, and make sackcloth their covering, by thick and dark clouds interposing, which he balanceth, Job xxxvi. 32; xxxvii. 16.

4 The Lord GOD hath given me the tongue of the learned,
That I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary:
He wakeneth morning by morning,
He wakeneth mine ear
To hear as the learned.

5 The Lord GOD hath opened mine ear,
And I was not rebellious,
Neither turned away back.

6 I gave my back to the smiters,
And my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair:
I hid not my face from shame and spitting.

7 For the Lord GOD will help me;
Therefore shall I not be confounded:
Therefore have I set my face like a flint,
And I know that I shall not be ashamed.

8 He is near that justifieth me;

Who will contend with me? let us stand together:
Who is mine adversary? let him come near to me.
9 Behold, the Lord GOD will help me;
Who is he that shall condemn me?
Lo, they all shall wax old as a garment;
The moth shall eat them up.

Our Lord Jesus, having proved himself able to save, here shews himself as willing as he is able. We suppose the prophet Isaiah to say something of himself in these verses, engaging and encouraging himself to go on in his work as a prophet, notwithstanding the many hardships he met with, not doubting but that God would stand by him and strengthen him. But, like David, often he speaks of himself as a type of Christ, who is here prophesied of, and promised to be the Saviour.

First. As an acceptable preacher, ver. 4. Isaiah, as a prophet, was qualified for the work to which he was called; so were the rest of God's prophets, and others whom he employed as his messengers; but Christ was anointed with the Spirit above his fellows. To make the man of God perfect he hath, 1. "The tongue of the learned," to know how to give instruction, "how to speak a word in season to him that is weary." God, who made man's mouth, gave Moses the tongue of the learned to speak for the terror and conviction of Pharaoh, Ex. iv. 11, 12. He gave to Christ the tongue of the learned, to speak a word in season for the comfort of those that are weary and heavy laden under the burthen of sin, Mat. xi. 28. Grace was poured into his lips, and they are said to drop sweet-smelling myrrh. See what is the best learning of a minister, to know how to comfort troubled consciences, and to speak pertinently, and properly, and plainly, to the various cases of poor souls. An ability to do this is God's gift, and it is one of the best gifts, which we should covet earnestly. And let us repose ourselves in the many comfortable words which Christ hath spoken to the weary. 2. The ear of the learned to receive instruction. And this prophets have as much need of as of the tongue of the learned; for they must deliver what they are taught, and no other; must hear the word from God's mouth diligently and attentively, that they may speak it exactly, Eze. iii. 17. Christ himself received that he might give. None must undertake to be teachers that have not first been learners; Christ's apostles were first disciples, "scribes instructed unto the kingdom of heaven," Mat. xiii. 42. Nor is it enough to hear, but we must hear as the learned, hear and understand, hear and remember, hear as those that would learn by what we hear. Those that would hear as the learned must be awake, and wakeful, for we are naturally drowsy and sleepy, and unapt to hear at all, or hear by the halves, hear and do not heed. Our ears need to be awakened; we need to have something said to rouse us, to awaken us out of our spiritual slumbers, that we may hear as for our lives. We need to be awakened "morning by morning," as duly as the day returns, to be awakened to do the work of the day in its day. Our case calls for continual fresh supplies of Divine grace to free us from the dulness we contract daily. The morning, when our spirits are most lively, is a proper time for communion with God; then we are in the best frame both to speak to him,—"My voice shalt thou hear in the morning;" and to hear from him,—the people came early in the morning to hear Christ in the temple, Lu. xxi. 38; for it seems his were morning lectures, and it is God that awakens us morning by morning. Those that do any thing to purpose in his service, it is he that, as their Master, calls them up; and we should doze perpetually if he did not awaken us morning by morning.

Secondly. As a patient sufferer, ver. 5, 6. One would think he that was commissioned and qualified to speak comfort to the weary should meet with no difficulty in his work, but a universal acceptance; but it is quite otherwise: he hath both hard work to do and hard usage to undergo; and here he tells us with what undaunted constancy he went through with it. We have no reason to question but that the prophet Isaiah went on resolutely in the work to which God had called him, though we read not of his undergoing any such hardships as are here supposed; but we are sure it was abundantly verified in Jesus Christ. And here we have,

1. His patient obedience in his doing-work. "The Lord God hath" not only awakened my ear to hear what he saith, but hath "opened my ear" to receive it and comply with it; Ps. xl. 6, 7, "Mine ears hast thou opened;—then said I, Lo, I come;" for when he adds, "I was not rebellious, neither turned away back," more is implied than expressed: that he was willing; that though he foresaw a great deal of difficulty and discouragement, though he was to take pains and give constant attendance as a servant, though he was to empty himself of that which was very great and humble himself to that which was very mean, yet he did not fly off, did not fail, nor was discouraged. He continued very free and very forward to his work, even when he came to the hardest part of it. Note, As a good understanding in the truths of God, so a good-will and affection to the work and service of God, is from the grace of God.

2. His obedient patience in his suffering-work. I call it obedient patience, because he was patient with an eye to his Father's will, thus pleading with himself, "This commandment have I received of my Father;" and thus submitting to God, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt." In this submission he resigned himself, 1. To be scourged; "I gave my back to the smiters;" and that not only by submitting to it when he was smitten, but by permitting it, or admitting it rather, among other the instances of pain and shame he would voluntarily undergo for us. 2. To be buffeted; "I gave my cheeks to them that" not only smote them, but "plucked off the hair" of the beard, which was a greater degree both of pain and ignominy. 3. To be spit upon; "I hid not my face from shame and spitting." He could have hid his face from it, could have avoided it, but he would not, because he was made a reproach of men, and thus he would answer the type of Job, that man of sorrows, of whom it is said that they smote him upon the cheek reproachfully, Job xvi. 10, and spared not to spit in his face, Job xxx. 10, which is an expression not only of contempt, but of abhorrence and indignation. All this Christ underwent for us, and voluntarily, to convince us of his willingness to save us.

Thirdly. As a courageous champion, ver. 7—9. The Redeemer is as famous for his boldness as for his humility and patience; and, though he yield, yet he is more than a conqueror. Observe,

1. The dependence he hath upon God. What was the prophet Isaiah's support was the support of Christ himself, ver. 7, "The Lord God will help me;" and again, ver. 9. Whom God employs he will assist, and will take care they want not any help that they or their work call for. God, having laid help upon his Son for us, gave help to him, and his hand was all along with the man of his right hand. Nor will he only assist him in his work, but accept of him; ver. 8, "He is near that justifieth me." Isaiah, no doubt, was falsely accused, and loaded with reproach and calumny, as other prophets were; but he despised it, knowing that God would roll away the reproach, and bring forth his righteousness as the light; perhaps in this world, Ps. xxxvii. 6; however in the great day, when there will be a resurrection of names as well as bodies, and the righteous shall shine forth as the morning sun. And so it was verified in Christ. By his resurrection he was proved to be not the man that he was represented, not a blasphemer, not a deceiver, not an enemy to Cæsar; the judge that condemned him owned he found no fault in him; the centurion, or sheriff, that had charge of his execution, declared him a righteous man; so near was he that justified him. But it was true of him in a farther and more peculiar sense: the Father justified him when he accepted the satisfaction he made for the sin of man, and constituted him the Lord our righteousness, who was made sin for us; he was "justified in the Spirit," 1 Tim. iii. 16. He was near that did it; for his resurrection, by which he was justified, came presently after he was condemned and crucified; he was straightway glorified, Jno. xiii. 32.

2. The confidence he thereupon hath of success in his undertaking. If "God will help me," if he will justify me, will stand by me and bear me out, "I shall not be confounded," as those are that come short of the end they aimed at, and the satisfaction they promised themselves; "I know that I shall not be ashamed." Though his enemies did all they could to put him to shame, yet he kept his ground, he kept his countenance, and was not ashamed of the work he had undertaken. Note, Work for God is work that we should not be ashamed of, and hope in God is hope that we shall not be ashamed of. Those that trust in God for help shall not be disappointed; they know whom they have trusted, and therefore know they shall not be ashamed.

3. The defiance which, in this confidence, he bids to all opposers and opposition. God will help me, and "therefore have I set my face like a flint." The prophet did so; he was bold in reproving sin and warning sinners, Eze. iii. 8, 9, and in asserting the truth of his predictions. Christ did so; he went on in his work as Mediator with an unshaken constancy and undaunted resolution; he did not fail, nor was discouraged; and here he challengeth all his opposers, 1st. To enter the lists with him; "Who will contend with me," either in law or by the sword? "Let us stand together" as combatants, or as the plaintiff and defendant. "Who is mine adversary?" Who is the master of my cause? so the word is. Who will pretend to enter an action against me? let him appear, and "come near to me," for I will not abscond. Many offered to dispute with Christ, but he put them to silence. The prophet speaks this in the name of all faithful ministers; those who keep close to the pure word of God in delivering their message need not fear the contradiction that may be given them; the Scriptures will bear them out, whoever contends with them. Great is the truth, and will prevail. Christ speaks this in the name of all believers, speaks it as their champion. Who dares be an enemy to those whom he is a friend to, or contend with those for whom he is an advocate? Thus St. Paul applies it, Rom. viii. 33, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" 2nd. He challengeth them to prove any crime upon him, ver. 9, "Who is he that shall condemn me?" The prophet, perhaps, was condemned to die; Christ, we are sure, was; and yet both could say, Who is he that shall condemn? for there is no condemnation to those whom God justifies. There were those that did condemn them, but what came of them? "They shall all wax old as a garment." The righteous cause of Christ and his prophets shall outlive all opposition. The moth shall eat them up silently and insensibly; a little thing will serve to do their business; but the roaring lion himself shall not prevail against God's witnesses. All believers are enabled to make this challenge, Who is he that shall condemn? It is Christ that died.

10 Who is among you that feareth the LORD,
That obeyeth the voice of his servant,
That walketh in darkness, and hath no light?
Let him trust in the name of the LORD,
And stay upon his God.
11 Behold, all ye that kindle a fire,
That compass yourselves about with sparks:
Walk in the light of your fire,
And in the sparks that ye have kindled.
This shall ye have of mine hand; ye shall lie down in sorrow.

The prophet having the tongue of the learned given him, that he might give to every one their portion, here makes use of it, rightly dividing the word of truth. It is the summary of the Gospel; "He that believes shall be saved," that trusts in the name of the Lord shall be comforted, though for a while he walk in darkness, and have no light; but "he that believes not shall be damned," though for a while he walk in the light of his own fire, yet he shall lie down in sorrow.

First. Comfort is here spoken to disconsolate saints, and they are encouraged to trust in God's grace, ver. 10. Where observe,

1. What is always the character of a child of God. He is one that fears the Lord with a filial fear, that stands in awe of his majesty, and is afraid of incurring his displeasure. This is a grace that usually appears most in good people then when they walk in darkness, when other graces appear not. They then tremble at his word, ch. lxvi. 2, and are afraid of his judgments, Ps. cxix. 120. He is one that "obeyeth the voice of his servant," that is, is willing to be ruled by the Lord Jesus, as God's servant, in the great work of man's redemption; one that yields a sincere obedience to the law of Christ, and cheerfully comes up to the terms of his covenant. Those that truly fear God will obey the voice of Christ.

2. What is sometimes the case of a child of God. It is supposed that, though he has in his heart the fear of God and faith in Christ, yet for a time he "walketh in darkness, and hath no light," is disquieted, and hath little or no comfort. Who is there that doth so? which intimates that it is a case that sometimes happens among the professors of religion, yet not very often; but whenever it happens God takes notice of it. It is no new thing for the children and heirs of light sometimes to walk in darkness, and for a time not to have any glimpse or gleam of light. It is not meant so much of the comforts of this life; those that fear God, when they have never so great an abundance of them, do not walk in them as their light; as of their spiritual comforts, which relate to their souls. They walk in darkness when their evidences for heaven are clouded; their joy in God is interrupted, the testimony of the Spirit is suspended, and the light of God's countenance eclipsed. Serious Christians are apt to be melancholy ones, and those who fear always to fear too much.

3. What is likely to be an effectual cure in this sad case. He that is thus in the dark, 1st. "Let him trust in the name of the Lord," in the goodness of his nature, and that which he has made known of himself and his own wisdom, power, and goodness; the name of the Lord is a strong tower, let him run into that. Let him depend upon it that if he walk before God, which any man may do, though he walk in the dark, he shall find God all-sufficient to him. 2nd. Let him stay himself upon his God, his in covenant; let him keep hold of his covenant-relation to God, and call God his God for all this; as Christ on the cross, "My God, my God." Let him stay himself upon the promises of the covenant, and build his hopes on them. When a child of God is ready to sink, he will find enough in God to stay himself upon; let him trust in Christ, for God's "name is in him," Ex. xxiii. 21; trust in that name of his, "The Lord our righteousness," and stay himself upon God as his God, in and through a Mediator.

Secondly. Conviction is here spoken to presuming sinners, and they are warned not to trust in themselves, ver. 11. Observe, 1. The description given of them. They kindle a fire, and walk in the light of that fire; they depend upon their own righteousness, offer all their sacrifices, and burn all their incense, with that fire, as Nadab and Abihu, and not with the fire from heaven. In their hope of acceptance with God they have no regard to the righteousness of Christ; they refresh and please themselves with a conceit of their own merit and sufficiency, and warm themselves with that; it is both light and heat to them; they compass themselves about with sparks of their own kindling. As they trust in their own righteousness, and not in the righteousness of Christ, so they place their happiness in their worldly possessions and enjoyments, and not in the favour of God. Creature comforts are as sparks, shortlived, and soon gone; yet the children of this world, while they last, warm themselves by them, and walk with pride and pleasure in the light of them. 2. The doom passed upon them. They are ironically bidden to walk in the light of their own fire; Make your best of it while it lasts. But what will be in the end thereof? what will it come to at last? "This shall ye have of mine hand," saith Christ, for to him the judgment is committed, "Ye shall lie down in sorrow," shall go to bed in the dark: see Job xviii. 5, 6, "His candle shall be put out with him." Those that make the world their comfort, and their own righteousness their confidence, will certainly meet with a fatal disappointment, which will be bitterness in the end. A godly man's way may be melancholy, but his end shall be peace and everlasting light; a wicked man's way may be pleasant, but his end and endless abode will be utter darkness.

CHAPTER LI.

This chapter is designed for the comfort and encouragement of those that fear God and keep his commandments, even then when they walk in darkness and have no light. Whether it was intended primarily for the support of the captives in Babylon, is not certain, probably it was; but comforts thus generally expressed ought not to be so confined. Whenever the church of God is in distress, her friends and well-wishers may comfort themselves and one another with these words here, I. That God, who raised his church at first out of nothing, will take care it shall not perish, ver. 1—3. II. That the righteousness and salvation he designs for his church are sure and near, very near, and very sure, ver. 4—6. III. That the persecutors of the church are weak and dying creatures, ver. 7, 8. IV. That the same power which did wonders for the church formerly is now engaged and employed for her protection and deliverance, ver. 9—11. V. That God himself, the maker of the world, had undertaken both to deliver his people out of their distress and to comfort them under it, and sent his prophet to assure them of it, ver. 12—16. VI. That, as deplorable as the condition of the church now was, ver. 17—20, to the same woful circumstances her persecutors and oppressors should shortly be reduced, and worse, ver. 20—23. The first three paragraphs of this chapter begin with, "Hearken unto me," and they are God's people that are all along called to hearken; for, even when comforts are spoken to them, sometimes they hearken not, through anguish of spirit, Ex. vi. 9; therefore they are again and again called to hearken, ver. 1, 4, 7. The two other paragraphs of this chapter begin with, "Awake, awake." In the former, ver. 9, God's people call upon him to awake and help them: in the latter, ver. 17, God calls upon them to awake and help themselves.

HEARKEN to me, ye that follow after righteousness,
Ye that seek the LORD:
Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn,
And to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged.
2 Look unto Abraham your father,
And unto Sarah that bare you:
For I called him alone,
And blessed him, and increased him.
3 For the LORD shall comfort Zion:
He will comfort all her waste places;
And he will make her wilderness like Eden,
And her desert like the garden of the LORD;
Joy and gladness shall be found therein,
Thanksgiving, and the voice of melody.

Observe, First. How the people of God are here described, to whom the word of this consolation is sent, and who are called upon to hearken to it, ver. 1. They are such as "follow after righteousness," that are very solicitous and very desirous both to be justified and to be sanctified, are pressing hard after this, to have the favour of God restored to them and the image of God renewed on them. These are they that seek the Lord, for it is only in the way of righteousness that we can seek him with any hopes of finding him.

Secondly. How they are here directed to look back to their original, and the smallness of their beginning. "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn;" the idolatrous family in Ur of the Chaldees, out of which Abraham was taken, the generation of slaves which the heads and fathers of their tribes were in Egypt: "look unto the hole of the pit out of which ye are digged," as clay, when God formed you into a people. Note, It is good for those that are privileged by a new birth to consider what they were by their first birth; how they were conceived in iniquity and shapen in sin. That which is born of the flesh is flesh. How hard was that rock out of which we were hewn, unapt to receive impressions; and how dirty the hole of the pit out of which we were digged! The consideration hereof should fill us with low thoughts of ourselves, and high thoughts of Divine grace. Those that are now advanced would do well to remember how low they began; ver. 2, "Look unto Abraham your father," the father of all the faithful, of all that follow after the righteousness of faith, as he did, Rom. iv. 11. "And unto Sarah that bare you," and whose daughters you all are as long as you do well; think how Abraham was called alone, and yet was blessed and multiplied; and let that encourage all believers to depend upon the promise of God, even then when a sentence of death seems to be upon all the means that lead to the performance of it. Particularly let it encourage the captives in Babylon, though they are reduced to a small number, and few of them left, to hope that yet they shall increase so as to replenish their own land again. When Jacob is very small, yet he is not so small as Abraham was, who yet became father of many nations. "Look unto Abraham," and see what he got by trusting in the promise of God, and take example by him to follow God with an implicit faith.

Thirdly. How they are here assured that their present seedness of tears should end in a harvest of joys at length, ver. 3. The church of God on earth, even the gospel Zion, hath sometimes had her desert and waste places; many parts of the church, either through corruption or persecution, made like wildernesses, unfruitful to God or uncomfortable to the inhabitants; but God will find out a time and way to comfort Zion; not only by speaking comfortably to her, but by acting graciously for her. God has comforts in store even for the waste places of his church, for those parts of it that seem not regarded or valued. 1. He will make them fruitful, and so give them cause to rejoice; her wildernesses shall put on a new face, and look pleasant as Eden, and abound in all good fruits as the garden of the Lord. Note, It is the greatest comfort of the church to be made serviceable to the glory of God, and to be as his garden in which he delights. 2. He will make them cheerful, and so give them hearts to rejoice. With the fruits of righteousness, "joy and gladness shall be found therein;" for the more holiness men have, and the more good they do, the more gladness they have. And where there is joy and gladness to their satisfaction, it is fit there should be thanksgiving to God's honour; for whatever is the matter of our rejoicing ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving; and the returns of God's favour ought to be celebrated with the voice of melody; which will be the more melodious when God gives songs in the night, songs in the desert.

4 Hearken unto me, my people;
And give ear unto me, O my nation:
For a law shall proceed from me, [people.
And I will make my judgment to rest for a light of the 5 My righteousness is near; my salvation is gone forth,
And mine arms shall judge the people;
The isles shall wait upon me,
And on mine arm shall they trust.
6 Lift up your eyes to the heavens,
And look upon the earth beneath:
For the heavens shall vanish away like smoke,
And the earth shall wax old like a garment,
And they that dwell therein shall die in like manner:
But my salvation shall be for ever,
And my righteousness shall not be abolished.
7 Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness,
The people in whose heart is my law;
Fear ye not the reproach of men,
Neither be ye afraid of their revilings.
8 For the moth shall eat them up like a garment,
And the worm shall eat them like wool:
But my righteousness shall be for ever,
And my salvation from generation to generation.

Both these proclamations, as I may call them, end alike with an assurance of the perpetuity of God's righteousness, and his salvation, and therefore we put them together, both being designed for the comfort of God's people. Observe,

First. Who are they to whom this comfort belongs? My people, and my nation, that I have set apart for myself, that own me, and are owned by me. Those are God's people, and his nation, who are subject to him, as their king and their God, pay allegiance to him, and put themselves under his protection accordingly. They are a people that know righteousness, not only have the means of knowledge, and to whom righteousness is made known, but improve those means, and are able to form a right judgment of truth and falsehood, good and evil. And as they have good heads so they have good hearts, for they have the law of God in them, written and ruling there. Those God owns for his people, in whose heart his law is. Even those that know righteousness, and have the law of God in their heart, may yet be in great distress and sorrow, and loaded with reproach and contempt; but their God will comfort them with the righteousness they know, and the law they have in their hearts.

Secondly. What the comfort is that belongs to God's people.

1. That the gospel of Christ shall be preached and published to the world. "A law shall proceed from me," an evangelical law, the law of Christ, the law of faith, ch. ii. 3. This law is his judgment, for it is that law of liberty by which the world shall be governed and judged. This shall not only go forth, but shall continue and rest; it shall take firm footing, and deep root in the world; it shall rest not only for the benefit of the Jews, that had the first notice of it, but for a light of the people of other nations. It is this law, this judgment, that we are required to hearken and give ear to at our peril; for how shall we escape if we neglect it, and turn a deaf ear to it? When a law proceeds from God, "he that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

2. That this law and judgment shall bring with it righteousness and salvation, shall open a ready way to the children of men how they may be justified and saved, ver. 5. It is called God's righteousness and his salvation, because of his contriving and bringing about; it is a righteousness that he will accept for us, and accept us for; and a righteousness which he will work in us, and graciously accept of. It is the salvation of the Lord, for it ariseth from him, and terminates in him. Observe, There is no salvation without righteousness; and wherever there is the righteousness of God there shall be his salvation. All those, and those only, that are justified and sanctified shall be glorified.

3. That this righteousness and salvation shall very shortly appear. It is near, it is gone forth; the decree is gone forth concerning it, it shall as certainly be introduced as if it were gone forth already, and the time for it is at hand. It is near in time. Behold all things are now ready; it is near in place, not far to seek, but the word is nigh us, and Christ in the word, righteousness in the word, Rom. x. 8.

4. That this evangelical righteousness and salvation shall not be confined to the Jewish nation, but shall be extended to the Gentiles. "Mine arms shall judge the people." Those that will not yield to the judgments of God's mouth shall be crushed by the judgments of his hands. Some shall thus be judged by the Gospel, for for judgment Christ came into this world; but others, and those of the isles, shall wait upon him, and bid his Gospel, and the commands as well as the comforts of it, welcome. It was a comfort to God's people, to his nation, that multitudes should be added to them, and the increase of their number should be the increase of their strength and beauty. It is added, and "on mine arm shall they trust," that arm of the Lord which is revealed in Christ, ch. liii. 1. Observe, God's arm shall judge the people that are impenitent, and yet on his arm shall others trust, and be saved by it; for it is to us as we make it, a savour of life or death.

5. That this righteousness and salvation shall be for ever, and shall never be abolished, ver. 6. It is an everlasting righteousness that the Messiah brings in, Dan. ix. 24, an eternal redemption that he is the Author of, Heb. v. 9. As it shall spread through all the nations of the earth, so it shall last through all the ages of the world. We must never expect any other way of salvation, any other covenant of peace, or rule of righteousness, but what we have in the Gospel, and what we have there shall continue to the end, Mat. xxviii. 20. It is for ever, for the consequences of it shall be to eternity; and by this law of liberty men's everlasting state will be determined. This perpetuity of the Gospel, and the blessed things it brings in, is illustrated by the fading and perishing of this world and all things in it. Look up to the visible heavens above, which have continued hitherto, and seem likely to continue, but "they shall vanish like smoke," that soon spends itself and disappears; they shall be "rolled together like a scroll," and their lights shall fall like leaves in autumn. Look down to the earth beneath, that abideth too for a short ever, Eccl. i. 4; but it shall "wax old like a garment," that will be the worse for wearing; and "they that dwell therein," all the inhabitants of the earth, even those that seem to have the best settlement in it, "shall die in like manner." The soul shall, as to this world, vanish like smoke, and the body be thrown by like a garment waxen old. 'They shall die like a louse,' so some of the critics read it; easily crushed, Job vi. 19, and no loss of them. But when heaven and earth pass away, when all flesh and the glory of it wither as grass, the word of the Lord endures for ever, and not one iota or tittle of that shall fall to the ground. Those whose happiness is bound up in Christ's righteousness and salvation will have the comfort of it when time and days shall be no more.

Thirdly, What use they are to make of this comfort. If God's righteousness and salvation are near to them, then let them not fear "the reproach of men," of mortal, miserable men, nor be "afraid of their revilings," or spiteful taunts; theirs that bade you sing them the songs of Zion, or that ask you in scorn, Where is now your God? Let not those who embrace the gospel righteousness be afraid of those who will call them Beelzebub, and will say all manner of evil against them falsely; let them not be afraid of them, let them not be disturbed by these opprobrious speeches, nor made uneasy by them, as if they would be the ruin of their reputation and honour; and they must for ever lie under the load of them. Let them not be afraid of their executing their menaces, nor be deterred thereby from their duty, or frightened into any sinful compliances, or driven to take any indirect courses for their own safety. Those can bear but little for Christ that cannot bear a hard word for him. Let us not fear the reproach of men; for, 1. They will be quickly silenced; ver. 8, "The moth shall eat them up like a garment;" ch. l. 9, "the worm shall eat them like wool," or woollen cloth. If we have the approbation of a living God, we may despise the censure of dying men; the matter is not great what they say of us who must be worm's meat shortly. Or it intimates the judgments of God with which they shall be visited, with which they shall be consumed, for their malice against the people of God; they shall be slowly and silently, but effectually destroyed, when God shall come to reckon with them for all their hard speeches, Jude 14, 15. 2. The cause we suffer for cannot be run down; the falsehood of their reproaches will be detected, but truth shall triumph, and the righteousness of religion's injured cause shall be for ever plain. Clouds darken the sun, but give no obstruction to its progress.

9 Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the LORD;
Awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old.
Art thou not it that hath cut Rahab,
And wounded the dragon?
10 Art thou not it which hath dried the sea,
The waters of the great deep;
That hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?
11 Therefore the redeemed of the LORD shall return,
And come with singing unto Zion;
And everlasting joy shall be upon their head:
They shall obtain gladness and joy;
And sorrow and mourning shall flee away.
12 I, even I, am he that comforteth you:
Who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die,
And of the son of man which shall be made as grass;
13 And forgettest the LORD thy maker,
That hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth;
And hast feared continually every day
Because of the fury of the oppressor,
As if he were ready to destroy?
And where is the fury of the oppressor?
14 The captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed,
And that he should not die in the pit,
Nor that his bread should fail.
15 But I am the LORD thy God,
That divided the sea, whose waves roared:
The LORD of hosts is his name.
16 And I have put my words in thy mouth,
And I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand,
That I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth,
And say unto Zion, Thou art my people.

In these verses we have,

First. A prayer that God would in his providence appear and act for the deliverance of his people, and the mortification of his and their enemies. "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord," ver. 9. The arm of the Lord is Christ, or it is put for God himself, as Ps. xliv. 23, "Awake, why sleepest thou?" He that keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps; but when we pray that he would awake, we mean that he would make it to appear he watcheth over his people, and is always awake to do them good. The arm of the Lord is said to awake when the power of God exerts itself with more than ordinary vigour on his people's behalf. When a hand or arm is benumbed, we say it is asleep; when it is stretched forth for action it awakes. God needs not to be reminded or excited by us; but he gives us leave thus to be humbly earnest with him for such appearances of his power as will be for his own praise. "Put on strength;" that is, put forth strength. Appear in thy strength, as we appear in the clothes we put on, Ps. xxi. 13. The church sees her case bad, her enemies many and mighty, her friends few and feeble, and therefore depends purely upon the strength of God's arm for her relief. "Awake, as in the ancient days;" that is, do for us now as thou didst for our fathers formerly, repeat the wonders they told us of, Jud. vi. 13.

Secondly. The pleas to enforce this prayer:

1. They plead precedents, the experiences of their ancestors, and the great things God had done for them. Let the arm of the Lord be made bare on our behalf, for it has done great things formerly, in defence of the same cause, and we are sure it is neither shortened nor weakened. It did wonders against the Egyptians, that enslaved and oppressed God's son, his firstborn; it cut Rahab to pieces with one direful plague after another; and wounded Pharaoh, the dragon, the leviathan, as he is called, Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14, gave him his death's wound. It did wonders for Israel; it "dried up the sea," even "the waters of the great deep," as far as was requisite to open a way through the sea, for "the ransomed to pass over," ver. 10. God is never at a loss for a way to accomplish his purposes concerning his people, but will either find one or make one. And past experiences, as they are great supports to faith and hope, so they are good pleas in prayer: "Thou hast;" "Wilt thou not?" Ps. lxxxv. 1—6.

2. They plead promises, ver. 11. And "the redeemed of the Lord shall return;" that is, (as it may be supplied,) thou hast said they shall; referring to ch. xxxv. 10, where we find this promise, that the redeemed of the Lord, when they are released out of their captivity in Babylon, shall "come with singing unto Zion." Sinners, when they are brought out of the slavery of sin into the glorious liberty of God's children, may come singing, as a bird got loose out of the cage. The souls of believers, when they are delivered out of the prison of the body, come to the heavenly Zion with singing. Then this promise will have its full accomplishment, and we may plead it in the mean time. He that designs such joy for us at last will he not work such deliverance for us in the meantime as our case requires? When the saints come to heaven they enter into the joy of their Lord, it crowns their heads with immortal honour, it fills their hearts with complete satisfaction; they shall obtain that joy and gladness which they could never obtain in the vale of tears. In this world of changes it is a short step from joy to sorrow; but in that world "sorrow and mourning shall flee away," never to return, or come in view again.

Thirdly. The answer immediately given to this prayer; ver. 12, "I, even I, am he that comforteth you." They prayed for the operations of his power; he answers them with the consolations of his grace, which may well be accepted as an equivalent. If God do not wound the dragon, and dry the sea, as formerly, yet if he comfort us in soul under our afflictions, we have no reason to complain. If God do not answer presently with the saving strength of his right hand, we must be thankful if he answers us, as an angel himself was answered, Zec. i. 13, "with good words, and comfortable words." See how God resolves to comfort his people; "I, even I" will do it. He had ordered his ministers to do it, ch. xl. 1; but, because they cannot reach the heart, he takes the work into his own hands, "I, even I" will do it. See how he glories in it; he takes it among the titles of his honour to be the God that comforteth them that are cast down; he delights in being so. Those whom God comforteth, they are comforted indeed; nay, his undertaking to comfort them is comfort enough to them.

1. He comforts those that were in fear; and fear has torment which calls for comfort, the fear of man hath a snare in it which we have need of comfort to preserve us from. He comforts the timorous by chiding them, and that is no improper way of comforting either others or ourselves; "Why art thou cast down, and why disquieted?" ver. 12, 13. God, that comforts his people, would not have them disquiet themselves with amazing, perplexing fears, either of the reproach of men, (ver. 7,) or of their growing, threatening power and greatness; or of any mischief they may intend against us, or our people. Observe,

1st. The absurdity of those fears. It is a disparagement to us to give way to them; "Who art thou that thou shouldest be afraid?" In the original the pronoun is feminine, Who art thou, O woman; unworthy the name of a man, such a weak and womanish thing is it to give way to perplexing fears. First. It is absurd to be in such dread of a dying man; what! "afraid of a man that shall die;" shall certainly and shortly die; of the "son of man which shall be made as grass;" shall wither and be trodden down, or eaten up? The greatest men, and the most formidable, that are the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, yet are but men, Ps. ix. 20; and shall die like men, Ps. lxxxii. 7; are but grass out of the earth, cleaving to it, and retiring again into it. Note, We ought to look upon every man as a man that shall die. Those we admire and love and trust to, they are men that shall die; let us not therefore delight too much in them, nor depend too much upon them. Those we fear, we must look upon them as frail and mortal; and consider what a foolish thing it is for the servants of the living God to be afraid of dying men, that are here to-day and gone to-morrow. Secondly. It is absurd to fear "continually every day," ver. 13; to put ourselves upon a constant rack, so as never to be easy, nor to have any enjoyment of ourselves. Now and then a danger may be imminent and threatening, and it may be prudence to fear it; but to be always in a toss, jealous of dangers at every step, and to tremble at the shaking of every leaf, is to make ourselves all our lifetime subject to bondage, Heb. ii. 15; and to bring upon ourselves that sore judgment which is threatened, Deu. xxviii. 66, 67, "Thou shalt fear day and night." Thirdly. It is absurd to fear beyond what there is cause for. Thou art afraid "of the fury of the oppressor;" it is true there is an oppressor, and he is furious, and he designs, it may be, when he has an opportunity, to do thee a mischief, and it will be thy wisdom therefore to stand upon thy guard; but thou art afraid of him, "as if he were ready to destroy," as if he were just now going to cut thy throat, and as if there were no possibility of preventing it. A timorous spirit is thus apt to make the worst of every thing, and to apprehend the danger greater and nearer than really it is; and sometimes God is pleased presently to shew us the folly of it, "Where is the fury of the oppressor?" It is gone in an instant, and the danger is over ere thou art aware. His heart is turned, or his hands are tied. Pharaoh, king of Egypt, is but a noise; and the king of Babylon no more. What is gone with all the furious oppressors of God's Israel, that hectored them, and threatened them, and were a terror to them? they passed away, and lo, they were not, and so shall these.

2nd. The impiety of those fears. Thou art "afraid of a man that shall die," and "forgettest the Lord thy Maker," who is also the Maker of all the world, who hath "stretched forth the heavens," and "laid the foundations of the earth;" and therefore hath all the hosts and all the powers of both at his command and dispose. Note, Our inordinate fearing of man is an implicit forgetting of God; when we disquiet ourselves with the fear of man, we forget that there is a God above him, and that the greatest of men have no power but what is given them from above; we forget the providence of God, by which he orders and overrules all events according to the counsel of his own will; we forget the promises he has made to protect his people, and the experiences we have had of his care concerning us; and his seasonable interposal for our relief many a time, when we thought the oppressor ready to destroy; we forget our Jehovah-jirehs, monuments of mercy in the mount of the Lord. Did we remember to make God our fear and our dread, we should not be so much afraid as we are of the frowns of men. ch. viii. 12, 13. Happy is the man that fears God always, Pr. xxviii. 14; Lu. xii. 4, 5.

2. He comforts those that were in bonds, ver. 14, 15. See here, 1st. What they do for themselves. "The captive exile hasteneth that he may be loosed," and may return to his own country, from which he is banished; his care is, that he may not die in the pit, nor die a prisoner, through the inconveniences of his confinement, and that his bread should not fail, either the bread he should have to keep him alive in prison or that which should bear his charges home; his stock is low, and therefore he hasteth to be loosed. Now some understand this as his fault; he is distrustfully impatient of delays, cannot wait God's time, but thinks he is undone, and must die in the pit if he be not released presently. Others take it to be his praise, that when the doors are thrown open he doth not linger, but applies himself with all diligence to procure his discharge. And then it follows, "But I am the Lord thy God," which intimates, 2nd. What God will do for them, even that which they cannot do for themselves. God hath all power in his hand to help the captive exiles; for he hath divided the sea, when the roaring of his waves was more frightful than any of the impotent menaces of proud oppressors. He hath stilled or quieted the sea, so some think it should be read, Ps. lxv. 7; lxxxix. 9. This is not only a proof of what God can do, but a resemblance of what he has done, and will do for his people; he will find out a way to still the threatening storm, and bring them safe into the harbour. "The Lord of hosts is his name," his name for ever, the name by which his people have long known him. And, as he is able to help them, so he is willing and engaged to do it; for he is thy God, captive exile, thine in covenant. This is a check to the desponding captives; let them not conclude that they must either be loosed presently or die in the pit; for he that is the Lord of hosts can relieve them when they are brought never so low. It is also an encouragement to the diligent captives who, when liberty is proclaimed, are willing to lose no time; let them know that the Lord is their God, and while they thus strive to help themselves they may be sure he will help them.

3. He comforts all his people who depended upon what the prophets said to them in the name of the Lord, and built their hopes upon it. When the deliverances which the prophets spake of either did not come so soon as they looked for them or did not come up to the height of their expectation, they began to be cast down in their own eyes; but as to this they are encouraged (ver. 16) by what God saith to his prophet, not to this only, but to all his prophets, nor to this or them principally, but to Christ the great Prophet. It is a great satisfaction to those to whom the message is sent, to hear the God of truth and power say to his messenger, as he doth here, "I have put my words in thy mouth," that by them "I may plant the heavens." God undertook to comfort his people, ver. 12; but still he doth it by his prophets, by his Gospel. And that he may do it by these, he here tells us, 1st. That his word in them is very true. He owns what they had said to be what he had directed and enjoined them to say; "I have put my words in thy mouth," and therefore he that receives thee and them receives me. This is a great stay to our faith, that Christ's doctrine was not his, but his that sent him; and that the words of the prophets and apostles were God's words which he put into their mouths. God's Spirit not only revealed to them the things themselves they spoke of, but dictated to them the words they should speak, 2 Pet. i. 21; 1 Cor. ii. 13; so that these are the true sayings of God, of a God that cannot lie. 2nd. That it is very safe. "I have covered thee in the shadow of my hand," as before, ch. xlix. 2; which speaks the special protection not only of the prophets, but of their prophecies; not only of Christ, but of Christianity, of the Gospel of Christ. It is not only the faithful word of God which the prophets deliver to us, but it shall be carefully preserved till it have its accomplishment for the use of the church, notwithstanding the restless endeavours of the powers of darkness to extinguish this light. They shall prophesy again, Rev. x. 11; though not in their persons yet in their writings, which God has always covered in the shadow of his hand, preserved by a special providence, else they had been lost ere this. 3rd. That this word, when it comes to be accomplished, will be very great, and will not at all fall short of the pomp and grandeur of the prophecy; "I have put my words in thy mouth," not that by the performance of them I may plant a nation, or found a city, but "plant the heavens," and "lay the foundations of the earth," may do that for my people which will be a new creation. This must look as far forward as to the great work done by the Gospel of Christ, and the setting up of his holy religion in the world. As God by Christ made the world at first, Heb. i. 2, and by him formed the Old Testament church, Zec. vi. 12, so by him, and the words put into his mouth, he will set up, First. A new world; will again plant the heavens, and found the earth. Sin having put the whole creation into disorder, Christ's taking away the sin of the world put all into order again, old things are passed away, all things are become new. Things in heaven and things on earth are reconciled, and so put into a new posture, Col. i. 20. And through him, according to the promise, we "look for new heavens and a new earth," 2 Pet. iii. 13; and to this the prophets bear witness. Secondly. He will set up a new church, a New Testament church; he will "say unto Zion, Thou art my people." The gospel church is called Zion, Heb. xii. 22; and Jerusalem, Gal. iv. 26. And when the Gentiles are brought into it it shall be said unto them, Ye are my people. When God works great deliverances for his church, and especially when he shall complete the salvation of it in the great day, he will thereby own that poor, despised handful to be his people, whom he has chosen and loved.

17 Awake, awake, stand up, O Jerusalem,
Which hast drunk at the hand of the LORD the cup of his fury;
Thou hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling,
And wrung them out.
18 There is none to guide her
Among all the sons whom she hath brought forth;
Neither is there any that taketh her by the hand
Of all the sons that she hath brought up.
19 These two things are come unto thee;
Who shall be sorry for thee?
Desolation, and destruction, and the famine, and the sword:
By whom shall I comfort thee?
20 Thy sons have fainted,
They lie at the head of all the streets, as a wild bull in a net:
They are full of the fury of the LORD,
The rebuke of thy God.
21 Therefore hear now this, thou afflicted,
And drunken, but not with wine:
22 Thus saith thy Lord the LORD,
And thy God that pleadeth the cause of his people,
Behold, I have taken out of thine hand the cup of trembling,
Even the dregs of the cup of my fury;
Thou shalt no more drink it again:
23 But I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee;
Which have said to thy soul, Bow down, that we may go over:
And thou hast laid thy body as the ground,
And as the street, to them that went over.

God having awoke for the comfort of his people, here calls upon them to awake, as afterwards, ch. lii. 1. It is a call to awake, not so much out of the sleep of sin, (though that also is necessary, in order to their being ready for deliverance,) as out of the stupor of despair. When the inhabitants of Jerusalem were in captivity, they, as well as those who remained upon the spot, were so overwhelmed with the sense of their troubles, that they had no heart or spirit to mind any thing that tended to their comfort or relief. They were, as the disciples in the garden, sleeping for sorrow, Lu. xxii. 45; and, therefore, when the deliverance came they are said to be like them that dream, Ps. cxxvi. 1. Nay, it is a call to awake not only from sleep, but from death; like that to the dry bones to live, Eze. xxxvii. 9. Awake, and look about thee, that thou mayest see the day of thy deliverance dawn; and mayest be ready to bid it welcome. Recover thy senses, sink not under thy load; but stand up, and bestir thyself for thy own help. This may be applied to the Jerusalem that was in the apostles' time, which is said to be "in bondage with her children," Gal. iv. 25; and to have been under the power of a "spirit of slumber," Rom. xi. 8. They are called to awake and mind the things that belonged to their everlasting peace; and then the cup of trembling should be taken out of their hands, and peace should be spoken to them, and they should triumph over Satan, who had blinded their eyes, and lulled them asleep. Now,

First. It is owned that Jerusalem had long been in a very deplorable condition, and sunk into the depths of misery.

1. She had lain under the tokens of God's displeasure. He had put into her hand the "cup of his fury," that is, her share of his displeasure. The dispensations of his providence concerning her had been such as she had reason to think he was angry with her. She had provoked him to anger most bitterly, and was made to taste the bitter fruits of it. The cup of God's fury is, and will be, a "cup of trembling," to all those that have it put into their hands; damned sinners will find it so to eternity. It is said, Ps. lxxv. 8, that the "dregs of the cup," the loathsome sediments in the bottom of it, "all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them." But here, Jerusalem having made herself as the wicked of the earth, is compelled to wring them out, and drink them; for wherever there has been a cup of fornication, as there had been in Jerusalem's hand when she was idolatrous, sooner or later there will be "a cup of fury," a "cup of trembling;" therefore, "stand in awe, and sin not."

2. Those that should have helped her in her distress failed her, and were either unable or unwilling to help her, as might have been expected, ver. 18. She is intoxicated with the cup of God's fury, and, being so, staggers, and is very unsteady in her counsels and attempts. She knows not what she saith or doth, much less knows she what to say or do. And in this unhappy condition, of all the sons that she hath brought forth, and brought up, that she has borne and educated, (and there were many famous ones, for "of Zion it was said, That this and that man was born there," Ps. lxxxvii. 5,) there is none to guide her, none to take her by the hand,—to keep her either from falling or from shaming herself,—either to lend a hand to help her out of her trouble or lend a tongue to comfort her under it. Think it not strange if wise and good men are disappointed in their children, and have not that succour from them which they expected; but those that were arrows in their hand prove arrows in their heart; when Jerusalem herself hath none of all her sons, either prince, priest, or prophet, that hath such a sense either of duty or gratitude, as to help her when she had most need of help. Thus they complain, Ps. lxxiv. 9, "There is none to tell us how long." Now that which aggravated this disappointment was,

1st. That her trouble was very great, and yet there was none to pity or help her. "These two things are come unto thee," ver. 19, to complete thy desolation and destruction, even the famine and the sword; two sore judgments, and very terrible. Or the two things were, the desolation and destruction by which the city was wasted, and the famine and sword by which the citizens perished. Or the two things were, the trouble itself, made up of desolation, destruction, famine, and sword, and her being helpless, forlorn, and comfortless under it. Two sad things indeed, to be in this woful case, and to have none to pity thee, to sympathise with thee in thy griefs, or to help to bear the burthen of thy cares; to have none to comfort thee, by suggesting that to thee which might help to alleviate thy grief, or doing that for thee which might help to redress thy grievances. Or these two things that were come upon Jerusalem are the same with the two things that were afterwards to come upon Babylon, ch. xlvii. 9, loss of children and widowhood; a piteous case, and yet, when thou hast brought it upon thyself by thy own sin and folly, "Who shall be sorry for thee?" A case that calls for comfort, and yet, when thou art froward under thy trouble, frettest, and makest thyself uneasy, "By whom shall I comfort thee?" They that will not be counselled cannot be helped.

2nd. That those who should have been her comforters were their own tormentors, ver. 20; they have fainted, as quite dispirited and driven to despair. They have no patience, in which to keep possession of their own souls and the enjoyment of themselves, nor any confidence in God's promise, by which to keep possession of the comfort of that. They throw themselves upon the ground in vexation at their troubles, and there they lie "at the head of all the streets," complaining to all that pass by, Lam. i. 12, pining away for want of necessary food. There they lie like "a wild bull in a net," fretting and raging, struggling and pulling in vain to help themselves, but entangling themselves so much the more, and making their condition the worse by their own passions and discontents. They that are of a meek and quiet spirit are, under affliction, like a dove in a net, mourning indeed, but silent and patient. They that are of a froward, peevish spirit, are like a wild bull in a net, uneasy to themselves, vexatious to their friends, and provoking to their God; "They are full of the fury of the Lord, the rebuke of our God." God is angry with them, and contends with them, and they are full of that only, and take no notice of his wise and gracious designs in afflicting them; never inquire wherefore he contends with them, and therefore nothing appears in them but anger at God, and quarrelling with him. They are displeased at God for the dispensations of his providence concerning them, and so they do but make ill worse. This had long been Jerusalem's woful case, and God took cognizance of it. But,

Secondly. It is promised that Jerusalem's troubles shall at length come to an end, and be transferred to her persecutors, ver. 21. Nevertheless, hear this, thou afflicted. It is often the lot of God's church to be afflicted, and God hath always something to say to her then which she will do well to hearken to. Thou art drunken, not, as formerly, with wine, not with the intoxicating cup of Babylon's whoredoms and idolatries, but with the cup of affliction. Know, then, for thy comfort,

1. That the Lord Jehovah is thy Lord and thy God for all this. It is expressed emphatically, ver. 22, "Thus saith thy Lord the Lord, and thy God," the Lord that is able to help thee, and hath wherewithal to relieve thee; thy Lord that hath an incontestable right to thee, and will not alienate it; thy God in covenant with thee, and that hath undertaken to make thee happy. Whatever the distresses of God's people may be, he will not disown his relation to them, nor have they lost their interest in him and in his promise.

2. That he is the God "that pleadeth the cause of his people," as their patron and protector, who takes what is done against them as done against himself. The cause of God's people, and of that holy religion which they profess, is a righteous cause, otherwise the righteous God would not appear for it. Yet it may for a time be run down, and seem as if it were lost; but God will plead it, either by convincing the consciences or confounding the mischievous projects of those that fight against it. He will plead it by clearing up the equity and excellency of it to the world, and by giving success to those that act in defence of it. It is his own cause; he hath espoused it, and therefore will plead it with jealousy.

3. That they should shortly take leave of their troubles, and bid a final farewell to them. I will take out of thy hand the cup of trembling, that bitter cup; it shall pass from thee. Throwing away the cup of trembling will not do, nor saying we will not, we cannot drink it. But, if we patiently submit, he that put it into our hands will himself take it out of our hands, Nay, it is promised, "Thou shalt no more drink it again;" God hath let fall his controversy with thee, and will not revive the judgment.

4. That their persecutors and oppressors should be made to drink of the same bitter cup which they had drunk so deep of, ver. 23. See here, 1st. How insolently they had abused and trampled upon the people of God; They have said to thy soul, to thee, to thy life, "Bow down, that we may go over." Nay, they have said it to thy conscience, taking a pride and pleasure in forcing thee to worship idols. Herein the New Testament Babylon treads in the steps of that old oppressor, tyrannizing over men's consciences, giving law to them, and putting them upon the rack, and compelling them to sinful compliances. They that set up an infallible head and judge, requiring an implicit faith in his dictates and obedience to his commands, do in effect say to men's souls, "Bow down, that we may go over," and they say it with delight. 2nd. How sneakingly the people of God, having, by their sin, lost much of their courage and sense of honour, truckled to them, "Thou hast laid thy body as the ground." Observe, The oppressors required the souls to be subjected to them, that every man should believe and worship just as they would have them. But all they could gain by their threats and violence was, that people laid their bodies on the ground. They brought them to an external and hypocritical conformity, but conscience cannot be forced, nor is it mentioned to their praise that they yielded thus far. But, 3rd. Observe how justly God will reckon with those who have carried it so imperiously towards his people; the cup of trembling shall be put into their hand. Babylon's case shall be as bad as ever Jerusalem's was. Daniel's persecutors shall be thrown into Daniel's den; let them see how they like it. And the Lord is known by these judgments which he executeth.

CHAPTER LII.

The most part of this chapter is on the same subject with the chapter before, concerning the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, which yet is applicable to the great salvation Christ hath wrought out for us; but the last three verses are on the same subject with the following chapter, concerning the person of the Redeemer, his humiliation and exaltation. Observe, I. The encouragement that is given to the Jews in captivity to hope that God would deliver them in his own way and time, ver. 1—6. II. The great joy and rejoicing that shall be both with ministers and people upon that occasion, ver. 7—10. III. The call given to those that remained in captivity, to shift for their own enlargement, when liberty was proclaimed, ver. 11, 12. IV. A short idea given here of the Messiah, which is enlarged upon in the next chapter, ver. 13—15.

AWAKE, awake; put on thy strength, O Zion; [city:
Put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy
For henceforth there shall no more come into thee
The uncircumcised and the unclean.
2 Shake thyself from the dust;
Arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem:
Loose thyself from the bands of thy neck,
O captive daughter of Zion.
3 For thus saith the LORD,
Ye have sold yourselves for nought;
And ye shall be redeemed without money.
4 For thus saith the Lord GOD, [there;
My people went down aforetime into Egypt to sojourn
And the Assyrian oppressed them without cause.
5 Now therefore, what have I here, saith the LORD,
That my people is taken away for nought? [LORD;
They that rule over them make them to howl, saith the
And my name continually every day is blasphemed.
6 Therefore my people shall know my name:
Therefore they shall know in that day that I am he that Behold, it is I. [doth speak:

Here, First. God's people are stirred up to appear vigorous for their own deliverance, ver. 1, 2. They had desired that God would awake, and put on his strength, ch. li. 9; here he calls upon them to awake, and put on their strength, to bestir themselves. Let them awaken from their despondency, and pluck up their spirits, encourage themselves, and one another with hope, that all will be well yet, and no longer succumb, and sink under their burthen. Let them awaken from their distrust, look above them, look about them; look into the promises, look into the providences of God that were working for them; and let them raise their expectations of great things from God. Let them awaken from their dulness, and sluggishness, and incogitancy, and raise up their endeavours, not to take any irregular courses for their own relief contrary to the law of nations concerning captives, but to use all likely means to recommend themselves to the favour of the conqueror, and make an interest with him. God here gives them an assurance,

1. That they shall be reformed by their captivity. "There shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean;" their idolatrous customs shall be no more introduced, or at least not harboured. For when by the marriage of strange wives, in Ezra's time and Nehemiah's, the unclean crept in, they were soon by the vigilance and zeal of the magistrate expelled again; and care was taken that Jerusalem should be a holy city. Thus the Gospel Jerusalem is purified by the blood of Christ and the grace of God, and made indeed a holy city.

2. That they shall be relieved, and rescued out of their captivity; that the bands of their neck should be loosed, that they should not now be any longer oppressed; nay, that they should not be any more invaded, as they had been; 'There shall no more come against thee,' (so it may be read, ver. 1,) 'the uncircumcised and unclean.' The heathen shall not again enter into God's sanctuary, and profane his temple, Ps. lxxix. 1. This must be understood with a condition. If they keep close to God, and keep in with him, God will keep off, will keep out, the enemy; but if they again corrupt themselves, Antiochus will profane their temple, and the Romans destroy it. However, for some time they shall have peace; and to this happy change now approaching, they are here called to accommodate themselves. 1st. Let them prepare for joy: "Put on thy beautiful garments;" no longer to appear in mourning weeds, and the habit of thy widowhood. Put on a new face, a smiling countenance, now a new and pleasant scene begins to open. The beautiful garments were laid up then when the harps were hung on the willow trees; but now there is occasion for both, let both be resumed together. "Put on thy strength;" and, in order to that, put on thy beautiful garments, in token of triumph and rejoicing. Note, The joy of the Lord will be our strength, Neh. viii. 10; and our beautiful garments will serve for armour of proof against the darts of temptation and trouble. And observe, Jerusalem must then put on her beautiful garments when she is become a holy city, for the beauty of holiness is the most amiable beauty; and the more holy we are the more cause we have to rejoice. 2nd. Let them prepare for liberty: "Shake thyself from the dust," in which thou hast lain, and into which thy proud oppressors have trodden thee, ch. li. 23, or into which thou hast, in thy extreme sorrow, rolled thyself. 'Arise, and sit up;' so it may be read. O Jerusalem, prepare to get clear of all the marks of servitude thou hast been under, and to shift thy quarters; "Loose thyself from the bands of thy neck," be inspired with generous principles and resolutions to assert thine own liberty. The Gospel proclaims liberty to those who were bound with fears, and makes it their duty to take hold of their liberty. Let those that have been weary and heavy laden under the burthen of sin, finding relief in Christ, shake themselves from the dust of their doubts and fears, and loose themselves from those bands; for if the Son make them free they shall be free indeed.

Secondly. God stirs up himself to appear jealous for the deliverance of his people. He doth here plead their cause with himself, and even stir up himself to come and save them; for his reasons of mercy are fetched from himself. Divers things he here considers:

1. That the Chaldeans, who oppressed them, never acknowledged God in the power they gained over his people: no more than Sennacherib did, who, when God made use of him as an instrument for the correction and reformation of his people, meant not so, ch. x. 6, 7. "Ye have sold yourselves for nought;" you got nothing by it, nor did I. God considers, that when they by sin had sold themselves, he himself, who had the prior, nay, the sole title to them, did not increase his wealth by the price, Ps. xliv. 12. They did not so much as pay their debts to him with it. The Babylonians gave him no thanks for them, but rather reproached and blasphemed his name upon that account; and therefore they, having so long had you for nothing, shall at last restore you for nothing; you shall be redeemed without price, as was promised, ch. xlv. 13. Those that give nothing must expect to get nothing; however, God is a debtor to no man.

2. That they had been often before in the like distress, had often smarted for a time under the tyranny of their taskmasters; and therefore it was pity they should now be left always in the hand of these oppressors, ver. 4. "My people went down into Egypt," in an amicable way to settle there; but they enslaved them, and ruled them with rigour; and then they were delivered, notwithstanding the pride, and power, and policies of Pharaoh: and why may we not think God will deliver his people now? At other times the Assyrian oppressed the people of God without cause, as when the ten tribes were carried away captive by the king of Assyria, soon after Sennacherib, another Assyrian, with a destroying army, oppressed and made himself master of all the defenced cities of Judah. The Babylonians might not unfitly be called Assyrians, their monarchy being a branch of the Assyrian; and they now "oppressed them without cause." Though God was righteous in delivering them into their hands, they were unrighteous in using them as they did, and could not pretend a dominion over them as their subjects, as Pharaoh might when they were settled in Goshen, a part of his kingdom. When we suffer by the hands of wicked and unreasonable men, it is some comfort to be able to say, that as to them it is without cause; that we have not given them any provocation, Ps. vii. 3—5, &c.

3. That God's glory suffered by the injuries that were done to his people; ver. 5, "What have I here," what do I get by it, "that my people is taken away for nought?" God is not worshipped as he used to be in Jerusalem, his altar there is gone, and his temple in ruins; but if in lieu of that, he were more and better worshipped in Babylon, either by the captives, or by the natives, it were another matter; God might be looked upon as in some respect a gainer in his honour by it. But, alas! it is not so. 1st. The captives are so dispirited that they cannot praise him; but instead of that they are continually howling, which grieves him, and moves his pity. "They that rule over them make them to howl;" as the Egyptians of old made them to sigh, Ex. ii. 23. So the Babylonians now using them more hardly extorted from them louder complaints, and made them to howl. This gives us no pleasing idea of the temper the captives were now in; their complaints were not so rational and pious as they should have been, but brutish rather; they howled, Hos. vii. 14. However, God heard it, and came down to deliver them, as he did out of Egypt, Ex. iii. 7. 2nd. The natives are so insolent that they will not praise him; but, instead of that, they are continually blaspheming, which affronts him, and moves his anger. They boasted that they were too hard for God, because they were too hard for his people; and set him at defiance, as unable to deliver them; and thus "my name continually every day is blasphemed" among them. When they praised their own idols, they lifted up themselves against the Lord of heaven, Dan. v. 23. Now, saith God, this is not to be suffered; I will go down to deliver them. For what honour, what rent, what tribute of praise have I from the world, when my people, that should be to me for a name and a praise, are to me for a reproach? For their oppressors will neither praise God themselves nor let them do it. The apostle quotes this with application to the wicked lives of the Jews, by which God was dishonoured among the Gentiles then, as much as now he was by their sufferings, Rom. ii. 23, 24.

4. That his glory would be greatly manifested by their deliverance; ver. 6, "Therefore," because my name is thus blasphemed, I will arise, and "my people shall know my name," my name Jehovah, by which he had made himself known, in delivering them out of Egypt, Ex. vi. 3. God will do something to vindicate his own honour, something for his great name; and his people, that have almost lost the knowledge of it, shall know it to their comfort, and shall find it their strong tower. They shall know that God's providence governs the world, and all the affairs of it; that it is he that doth speak deliverance for them by the word of his power; that it is he only who at first spake, and it was done. They shall know that God's word, which Israel is blessed with above other nations, shall without fail have its accomplishment in due season. That it is he that speaks by the prophets. It is he, and they do not speak of themselves; for not one iota or tittle of what they say shall fall to the ground.

7 How beautiful upon the mountains
Are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace;
That bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation;
That saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!
8 Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice;
With the voice together shall they sing:
For they shall see eye to eye,
When the LORD shall bring again Zion.
9 Break forth into joy, sing together,
Ye waste places of Jerusalem:
For the LORD hath comforted his people,
He hath redeemed Jerusalem.
10 The LORD hath made bare his holy arm
In the eyes of all the nations;
And all the ends of the earth
Shall see the salvation of our God.
11 Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence,
Touch no unclean thing;
Go ye out of the midst of her;
Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the LORD.
12 For ye shall not go out with haste,
Nor go by flight:
For the LORD will go before you;
And the God of Israel will be your rereward.

The removal of the Jews from Babylon to their own land again is here spoken of both as a mercy and as a duty; and the application of those words, ver. 7, to the preaching of the Gospel by the apostle, Rom. x. 15, plainly intimates, that that deliverance was a type and figure of the redemption of mankind by Jesus Christ, to which what is here said of their redemption out of Babylon ought to be accommodated.

First. It is here spoken of as a great blessing, which ought to be welcomed with abundance of joy and thankfulness.

1. Those that bring the tidings of their release shall be very acceptable; ver. 7, "How beautiful upon the mountains," the mountains round about Jerusalem, over which these messengers are seen coming at a distance; how beautiful are their feet, when it is known what tidings they bring! It is not meant so much of the common posts, or the messengers sent express by the government to disperse the proclamation, but rather of some of the Jews themselves; who, being at the fountain-head of intelligence, had early notice of it, and presently went themselves, or sent their own messengers to all parts, to disperse the news, and even to Jerusalem itself, to tell the few who remained there that their brethren would be with them shortly. For it is published, not merely as matter of news, but as a proof that Zion's God reigns; for in that language it is published. They say unto Zion, "Thy God reigneth." Those who bring the tidings of peace and salvation, that Cyrus has given orders for the release of the Jews; those tidings which were so long expected by them that waited for the consolation of Israel, those good tidings, (so the original reads it, without the tautology of our translation, "good tidings of good,") they put this construction upon it; O Zion, thy God reigns. Note, When bad news is abroad this is good news, and when good news is abroad this is the best news, that Zion's God reigns; that God is Zion's God, in covenant with her, and as such he reigns, Ps. cxlvi. 10; Zec. ix. 9. "The Lord hath founded Zion," ch. xiv. 32. All events have their rise in the disposals of the kingdom of his providence, and their tendency to the advancement of the kingdom of his grace. This must be applied to the preaching of the Gospel, which is a proclamation of peace and salvation. It is Gospel indeed, good news, glad tidings; tidings of victory over our spiritual enemies, and liberty from our spiritual bondage. The good news is, that the Lord Jesus reigns, and all power is given to him. Christ himself brought these tidings first, Lu. iv. 18; Heb. ii. 3; and of him the text speaks. How beautiful are his feet! his feet that were nailed to the cross, how beautiful upon mount Calvary; his feet, when he came leaping upon the mountains, Cant. ii. 8, how beautiful were they to those who knew his voice, and knew it to be the voice of their beloved! His ministers proclaim these good tidings. They ought to keep their feet clean from the pollutions of the world, and then they ought to be beautiful in the eyes of those to whom they are sent, who sit at their feet, or rather at Christ's in them, to hear his word. They must be esteemed in love for their works' sake, 1 Thes. v. 13. For their message sake, which is well worthy of all acceptation.

2. Those to whom the tidings are brought shall be put thereby into a transport of joy.

1st. Zion's watchmen shall then rejoice, because they are surprisingly illuminated, ver. 8. The watchmen on Jerusalem's walls shall lead the chorus in this triumph. Who they were we are told, ch. lxii. 6. They were such as God set on the walls of Jerusalem, to make mention of his name, and to continue instant in prayer to him, till he again make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. These watchmen stand upon their watch-tower, waiting for an answer to these prayers, Hab ii. 1; and, therefore, when the good news comes, they have it first; and the longer they have continued, and the more importunate they have been in praying for it, the more will they be elevated when it comes. They shall "lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing" in concert, to invite others to join with them in their praises; and that which above all things will transport him with pleasure is, that "they shall see eye to eye," that is, face is face. Whereas God had been a God hiding himself, and they could scarce discern any thing of his favour through the dark cloud of their afflictions, now the cloud is scattered they shall plainly see it. They shall see Zion's king eye to eye; so it was fulfilled when the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; and there were those that saw his glory, Jno. i. 14; and looked upon it, 1 Jno. i. 1. They shall see an exact agreement and correspondence between the prophecy and the event, the promise and the performance; they shall see how they look one upon another eye to eye, and be satisfied that the same God spoke the one and did the other. When the Lord shall bring again Zion out of her captivity, the prophets shall from thence receive and give fuller discoveries than ever of God's good-will to his people; and applying this also, as the foregoing verse, to gospel times, it is a promise of the pouring out of the Spirit upon gospel ministers, as a spirit of wisdom and revelation, to lead them into all truth, so that they shall see eye to eye; shall see God's grace more clearly than the Old Testament saints could see it; and they shall herein be unanimous. In these great things concerning the common salvation, they shall concur in their sentiments as well as their songs; nay, St. Paul seems to allude to this, when he makes it the privilege of our future state, that we shall see face to face.

2nd. Zion's waste places shall then rejoice, because they shall be surprisingly comforted; ver. 9, "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem," that is, all parts of Jerusalem, for it was all in ruins; and even those parts that seemed to lie most desolate shall share in the joy; and they, having little expected it, shall break forth into joy, as men that dream, Ps. cxxvi. 1, 2. Let them sing together. Note, Those that share in mercies ought to join in praises. Here is matter for joy and praise. First. God's people will have the comfort of this salvation; and what is the matter of our rejoicing ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. He hath redeemed Jerusalem; that is, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that were sold into the hands of their enemies; and thereby he hath comforted his people that were in sorrow. The redemption of Jerusalem is the joy of all God's people, whose character it is that they look for that redemption, Lu. ii. 38. Secondly. God will have the glory of it; ver. 10, He "hath made bare his holy arm," that is, manifested and displayed his power in the eyes of all the nations. God's arm is a holy arm, stretched out in purity and justice, in defence of holiness, and in pursuance of his promise. Thirdly. All the world will have the benefit of it. In the great salvation wrought out by our Lord Jesus, the arm of the Lord was revealed, and all the ends of the earth were made to see the great salvation; that is, not as spectators of it only, (as they saw the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon,) but as sharers in it. Some of all nations, the most remote, shall partake of the benefits of the redemption. This is applied to our salvation by Christ; Lu. iii. 6, "All flesh shall see the salvation of God," that great salvation.

Secondly. It is here spoken of as a great business, which ought to be managed with abundance of care and circumspection. When the liberty is proclaimed,

1. Let the people of God hasten out of Babylon with all convenient speed. Though they are never so well settled there, let them not think of taking root in Babylon, but "Depart ye, depart ye," (ver. 11,) "Go ye out of the midst of her," not only those that are in the borders, but those that are in the midst, in the heart of the country, let them be gone. Babylon is no place for Israelites; as soon as they have leave to go, let them lose no time; with this word God stirred up the spirits of those that were moved to go up, Ezr. i. 5; and it is a call to all those who are yet in the bondage of sin and Satan, to make use of the liberty which Christ hath proclaimed to them. And if the Son make them free, they shall be free indeed.

2. Let them take heed of carrying away with them any of the pollutions of Babylon; "Touch no unclean thing." Now God makes bare his holy arm for you, be ye holy as he is, and keep yourselves from every wicked thing. When they came out of Egypt, they brought with them the idolatrous customs of Egypt, Eze. xxiii. 3, which were their ruin; let them take heed of doing so now they come out of Babylon. Note, When we are receiving any special mercy from God, we ought more carefully than ever to watch against all impurity; but especially let them be clean that bear the vessels of the Lord, that is, the priests that had the charge of the vessels of the sanctuary, when they were restored by a particular grant, to carry them to Jerusalem, Ezr. i. 7; viii. 24. Let them not only avoid touching any unclean thing, but be very careful to cleanse themselves according to the purification of the sanctuary. Christians are made to our God spiritual priests, Rev. i. 5; they are to bear the vessels of the Lord, are intrusted to keep the ordinances of God pure and entire. It is a good thing committed to them, and they ought to be clean, to wash their hands in innocency, and so to compass God's altars, and carry his vessels, and keep themselves pure.

3. Let them depend upon the presence of God with them and his protection in their remove, ver. 12. Ye "shall not go out with haste." They were to go with a diligent haste, not to lose time, nor linger as Lot in Sodom; but they were not to go with a diffident, distrustful haste, as if they were afraid of being pursued, as when they came out of Egypt, or of having the orders for their release recalled and countermanded. No, they shall find, that as for God his work is perfect; and therefore, they need not make more haste than good speed. Cyrus shall give them an honourable discharge, and they shall have an honourable return, and not steal away; for the Lord will go before them as their general and commander-in-chief; and the God of Israel will be their rearward, or he that will gather up them that are left behind. God will both lead their van and bring up their rear; that is, he will secure them from enemies, that either meet them or follow them; for with his favour will he compass them. The pillar of cloud and fire, when they came out of Egypt, sometimes went behind them to secure their rear, Ex. xiv. 19, and God's presence with them would now be that to them which that pillar was a visible token of. Those that are in the way of their duty are under God's special protection; and he that believeth this will not make haste.

13 Behold, my servant shall deal prudently,
He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high.
14 As many were astonied at thee;
His visage was so marred more than any man,
And his form more than the sons of men:
15 So shall he sprinkle many nations;
The kings shall shut their mouths at him:
For that which had not been told them shall they see;
And that which they had not heard shall they consider.

Here, as in other places, for the confirming of the faith of God's people, and the encouraging of their hope in the promises of temporal deliverances, the prophet passeth from them to speak of the great salvation which should in the fulness of time be wrought out by the Messiah. As the prophecy of Christ's incarnation was intended for the ratification of the promise of their deliverance from the Assyrian army, so this of Christ's death and resurrection is to confirm the promise of their return out of Babylon; for both these salvations were typical of the great redemption, and the prophecies of them had a reference to that. This prophecy, which begins here, and is continued to the end of the next chapter, points as plainly as can be at Jesus Christ. The ancient Jews understand it of the Messiah, though the modern Jews take a great deal of pains to pervert it; and some of ours (no friends therein to the Christian religion) will have it understood of Jeremiah; but Philip, who from hence preached Christ to the eunuch, hath put it past dispute, that of him speaketh the prophet this, of him, and of no other man, Acts viii. 34, 35. Here,

First. God owns Christ to be both commissioned and qualified for his undertaking. 1. He is appointed to it. He is my servant, whom I employ, and therefore will uphold. In his undertaking he doth his Father's will, seeks his Father's honour, and serves the interests of his Father's kingdom. 2. He is qualified for it. He shall deal prudently; for the Spirit of wisdom and understanding shall rest upon him, ch. xi. 2. The word is used concerning David, when he behaved himself wisely, 1 Sam. xviii. 14. Christ is wisdom itself, and in the contriving and carrying on of the work of our redemption there appeared much of "the wisdom of God in a mystery," 1 Cor. ii. 7. Christ, when he was here upon earth, dealt very prudently, to the admiration of all.

Secondly. He gives a short prospect both of his humiliation and his exaltation. See here,

1. How he humbled himself. Many were astonished at him, as they were at David, when by reason of his sorrows and troubles he became "a wonder unto many," Ps. lxxi. 7. Many admired to see what base usage he met with, how inveterate people were against him, how inhuman, and what indignities were done him. "His visage was marred more than any man's," when he was buffeted, smitten on the cheek, and crowned with thorns, and "hid not his face from shame and spitting." His face was foul with weeping, for he was a man of sorrows; he that really was fairer than the children of men had a good face spoiled with the abuses that were done him. Never was man used so barbarously; his form, when he took upon him the form of a servant, was more mean and abject than that of any of the sons of men. They that saw him said, Sure never man looked so miserably; a worm, and no man, Ps. xxii. 6. The nation abhorred him, ch. xlix. 7; treated him as the offscouring of all things. Never was sorrow like unto his sorrow.

2. How highly God exalted him, and therefore exalted him because he humbled himself. Three words are used for this; ver. 13, "He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high." God shall exalt him, men shall extol him, and with both he shall be very high, higher than the highest, higher than the heavens. He shall prosper in his work, and succeed in it, and that shall raise him very high. 1st. Many nations shall be the better for him, for he shall sprinkle them, and not the Jews only; the blood of sprinkling shall be applied to their consciences to purify them. He suffered, and died, and so sprinkled many nations; for in his death there was a fountain opened, Zec. xiii. 1. He shall "sprinkle many nations" by his heavenly doctrine, which shall drop as the dew, and distil as the rain. Moses' did so only on one nation, Deu. xxxii. 2, but Christ's on many nations. He shall do it by baptism, which is the washing of the body with pure water, Heb. x. 22; so that this promise had its accomplishment when Christ sent his apostles to disciple all nations, by baptizing or sprinkling them. 2nd. The great ones of the nations shall shew him respect; "Kings shall shut their mouths at him," that is, they shall not open their mouths against him as they had done, to contradict and blaspheme his sacred oracles; nay, they shall acquiesce in, and be well pleased with, the methods he takes of setting up his kingdom in the world. They shall with great humility and reverence receive his oracles and laws, as those who, when they heard Job's wisdom, "after his speech spake not again," Job xxix. 9, 22. "Kings shall see and arise," ch. xlix. 7. 3rd. The mystery, which was kept secret from the beginning of the world, shall by him be "made known to all nations for the obedience of faith," as the apostle speaks, Rom. xvi. 25, 26. "That which had not been told them shall they see." The Gospel brings to light things new and unheard of, which will awaken the attention and engage the reverence of kings and kingdoms. This is applied to the preaching of the Gospel in the Gentile world, Rom. xv. 21, where these words are quoted according to the Septuagint translation; "To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see, and they that have not heard shall understand." As the things revealed had long been kept secret, so the persons to whom they were revealed had long been kept in the dark, but now they shall see, and consider the glory of God shining in the face of Christ, which before they had not been told of, they had not heard. That shall be discovered to them by the Gospel of Christ which could never be told them by all the learning of their philosophers, or the art of their diviners, or any of their pagan oracles. Much had been said in the Old Testament concerning the Messiah, much had been told them, and they had heard it. But, as the queen of Sheba said concerning Solomon, what they shall see in him when he comes shall far exceed what had been told them. Christ disappointed the expectations of those who looked for a Messiah according to their fancies, as the carnal Jews, but outdid theirs who looked for such a Messiah as was promised. According to their faith, nay, and beyond it, it was to them.

CHAPTER LIII.

The two great things which the Spirit of Christ in the Old Testament prophets testified beforehand, were the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. i. 11. And that which Christ himself, when he expounded Moses and all the prophets, shewed to be the drift and scope of them all was, that Christ ought to suffer, and then to enter into his glory, Lu. xxiv. 26, 27. But nowhere, in all the Old Testament, are these two so plainly and fully prophesied of as here in this chapter, out of which divers passages are quoted with application to Christ in the New Testament. This chapter is so replenished with the unsearchable riches of Christ, that it may be called rather the gospel of the evangelist Isaiah, than the prophecy of the prophet Isaiah. We may observe here, I. The reproach of Christ's sufferings; the meanness of his appearance; the greatness of his grief; and the prejudices which many conceived from thence against his doctrine, ver. 1—3. II. The rolling away of this reproach, and the stamping of an immortal honour upon his sufferings, notwithstanding the disgrace and ignominy of them, by four considerations: 1. That therein he did his Father's will, ver. 4, 6, 10; 2. That thereby he made atonement for the sin of man, ver. 4—6, 8, 11, 12; for it was not for any sin of his own that he suffered, ver. 9; 3. That he bore his sufferings with an invincible and exemplary patience, ver. 7; 4. That he should prosper in his undertaking, and his sufferings should end in his immortal honour, ver. 10—12. By mixing faith with the prophecy of this chapter, we may improve our acquaintance with Jesus Christ and him crucified, with Jesus Christ and him glorified; dying for our sins, and rising again for our justification.

WHO hath believed our report?
And to whom is the arm of the LORD revealed?
2 For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant,
And as a root out of a dry ground: [him,
He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see
There is no beauty that we should desire him.
3 He is despised and rejected of men;
A man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief:
And we hid as it were our faces from him;
He was despised, and we esteemed him not.

The prophet, in the close of the former chapter, had foreseen and foretold the kind reception which the Gospel of Christ should find among the Gentiles: that nations and their kings should bid it welcome; that they who had not seen him, yet should believe in him; and, though they had not any prophecies among them of gospel grace, which might raise their expectations, and dispose them to entertain it; yet, upon the first notice of it, they should give it its due weight and consideration. Now here he foretells with wonder the unbelief of the Jews, notwithstanding the previous notices they had of the coming of the Messiah in the Old Testament, and the opportunity they had of being personally acquainted with them. Observe here,

First. The contempt they put upon the Gospel of Christ, ver. 1. The unbelief of the Jews in our Saviour's time, is expressly said to be the fulfilling of this word, Jno. xii. 38; and it is applied likewise to the little success which the apostles' preaching met with among Jews and Gentiles, Rom. x. 16. Note, 1. Of the many that hear the report of the Gospel there are few, very few, that believe it. It is reported openly and publicly, not whispered in a corner, or confined to the schools, but proclaimed to all; and it is so faithful a saying, and so well worthy of all acceptation, that one would think it should be universally received and believed, but it is quite otherwise. Few believed the prophets who spake before of Christ; when he came himself none of the rulers or of the Pharisees followed him; and but here and there one of the common people. When the apostles carried this report all the world over, some in each place believed, but comparatively very few. It is so still of the many that profess to believe this report; there are few that cordially embrace it, and submit to the power of it. 2. Therefore, people believe not the report of the Gospel, because the arm of the Lord is not revealed to them; they do not discern, nor will be brought to acknowledge, that Divine power which goes along with the word. The arm of the Lord is made bare, (as was said ch. lii. 10,) in the miracles that were wrought to confirm Christ's doctrine, in the wonderful success of it, and its energy upon the conscience,—though it is a still voice, it is a strong one; but they do not perceive this, nor do they experience in themselves that working of the Spirit which makes the word effectual. They believe not the Gospel, because by rebelling against the light they had they had forfeited the grace of God, which, therefore, he justly denied them, and withheld from them, and for want of that they believed not. 3. This is a thing we ought to be much affected with. It is to be wondered at, and greatly lamented; and ministers may go to God and complain of it to him, as the prophet here. What pity is it that such rich grace should be received in vain; that precious souls should perish at the pool's side, because they will not step in and be healed.

Secondly. The contempt they put upon the person of Christ, because of the meanness of his appearance, ver. 2, 3. And this seems to come in as a reason why they rejected his doctrine, because they were prejudiced against his person. When he was on earth, many that heard him preach, and could not but approve of what they heard, yet would not give it any regard or entertainment, because it came from one that made so small a figure, and had no external advantages to recommend him. Observe here,

1. The low condition he submitted to, and how he abased and emptied himself. The entry he made into the world, and the character he wore in it, were no way agreeable to the ideas which the Jews had formed of the Messiah, and their expectations concerning him, but quite the reverse.

1st. It was expected that his extraction should be very great and noble. He was to be the son of David, of a family that had a "name like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth," 2 Sam. vii. 9. But he sprang out of this royal and illustrious family when it was reduced and sunk; and Joseph, that son of David that was his supposed father, was but a poor carpenter, perhaps a ship-carpenter, for most of his relations were fishermen. This is here meant by his being "a root out of a dry ground," his being born of a mean and despicable family in the north, in Galilee; of a family out of which, like a dry and desert ground, nothing green, nothing great was expected; in a country of such small repute, that it was thought no good thing could come out of it. His mother being a virgin was as dry ground, yet from her he sprung, who is not only fruit, but root; the seed on the stony ground had no root. But, though Christ grew out of a dry ground, he is both the root and the offspring of David, the root of the good olive.

2nd. It was expected that he should make a public entry, and come in pomp, and with observation; but instead of that, he grew up before God, not before men. God had his eye upon him, but men regarded him not; he grew up as a tender plant, silently and insensibly, and without any noise; as the corn, that tender plant, grows up, we know not how, Mar. iv. 27. Christ rose as a tender plant, which one would have thought might easily have been crushed, and that one frosty night would have nipped it. The Gospel of Christ, in its beginning, was as a grain of mustard seed, so inconsiderable did it seem, Mat. xiii. 31, 32.

3rd. It was expected that he should have some uncommon beauty in his face and person, which should charm the eye, attract the heart, and raise the expectations of all that saw him. But there was nothing of that in him; not that he was in the least deformed or misshapen, but he had "no form nor comeliness," nothing extraordinary, which one might have thought to meet with in the countenance of an incarnate Deity. Those who saw him could not see that there was any beauty in him that they should desire him; nothing in him "more than another beloved," Cant. v. 9. Moses, when he was born, was exceeding fair; to that degree, that it was looked upon as a happy presage, Acts vii. 20; Heb. xi. 23. David, when he was anointed, was of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to, 1 Sam. xvi. 12. But our Lord Jesus had nothing of that to recommend him. Or, it may refer not so much to his person as to the manner of his appearing in the world, which had nothing in it of sensible glory. His Gospel is preached, not with the enticing words of man's wisdom, but with all plainness, agreeable to the subject.

4th. It was expected that he should live a pleasant life, and have a full enjoyment of all the delights of the sons and daughters of men, which would have invited all sorts to him; but, quite contrary, he was "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." It was not only his last scene that was tragical, but his whole life was so; not only mean, but miserable,—

Of labour, sorrow, and consuming pain.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

Thus, being made sin for us, he underwent the sentence sin had subjected us to, that we should eat in sorrow all the days of our life, Gen. iii. 17, and thereby relaxed much of the rigour and extremity of the sentence as to us. His condition was, upon many accounts, sorrowful; he was unsettled, had not where to lay his head, lived upon alms, was opposed and menaced, and "endured the contradiction of sinners against himself." His spirit was tender, and he admitted the impressions of sorrow; we never read that he laughed, but often that he wept. Lentulus, in his epistle to the Roman senate concerning Jesus, saith he was never seen to laugh; and so worn and macerated was he with continual grief, that when he was but a little above thirty years of age he was taken to be near fifty, Jno. viii. 57. Grief was his intimate acquaintance; for he acquainted himself with others' grievances, and sympathised with them, and he never set his own as at a distance; for in his transfiguration he talked of his own decease, and in his triumph wept over Jerusalem. Let us look unto him and mourn.

2. The low opinion that men had of him upon this account; they being generally apt to judge of persons and things by the sight of the eye, and according to outward appearance, they saw no beauty in him, that they should desire him. There was a great deal of true beauty in him, the beauty of holiness, and the beauty of goodness, enough to render him the desire of all nations; but the far greater part of those among whom he lived and conversed, saw none of his beauty, for it was spiritually discerned. Carnal hearts see no excellency in the Lord Jesus, nothing that should induce them to desire an acquaintance with him, or interest in him. Nay, he is not only not desired, but he is despised and rejected, abandoned and abhorred, a reproach of men, an abject,—one that men were shy of keeping company with, and had not any esteem for; a worm, and no man. He was despised as a mean man, rejected as an ill man; he was "the stone which the builders refused;" they would not have him to reign over them. Men that should have had so much reason as to understand things better, so much tenderness as not to trample upon a man in misery,—men whom he came to seek and save,—they rejected him; "We hid as it were our faces from him," looked another way, and his sufferings were as nothing to us, though never sorrow was like unto his sorrow. Nay, we not only carried it as unconcerned about him, but as loathing him, and having him in detestation. It may be read, He hid as it were his face from us, concealed the glory of his majesty, and drew a veil over it; and therefore "he was despised, and we esteemed him not," because we could not see through that veil. Christ having undertaken to make satisfaction to the justice of God, for the injury man had done him in his honour by sin, (and God cannot otherwise be injured but in his holiness,) he did it not only by divesting himself of the glories due to an incarnate Deity, but by submitting himself to the disgraces due to the worst of men and malefactors; and thus by vilifying himself he glorified his Father. But this is a good reason why we should esteem him highly, and study to do him honour. Let him be received by us whom men rejected.

4 Surely he hath borne our griefs,
And carried our sorrows:
Yet we did esteem him stricken,
Smitten of God, and afflicted.
5 But he was wounded for our transgressions,
He was bruised for our iniquities:
The chastisement of our peace was upon him;
And with his stripes we are healed.
6 All we like sheep have gone astray;
We have turned every one to his own way;
And the LORD hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.
7 He was oppressed, and he was afflicted,
Yet he opened not his mouth:
He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter,
And as a sheep before her shearers is dumb,
So he openeth not his mouth.
8 He was taken from prison and from judgment:
And who shall declare his generation?
For he was cut off out of the land of the living:
For the transgression of my people was he stricken.
9 And he made his grave with the wicked,
And with the rich in his death;
Because he had done no violence,
Neither was any deceit in his mouth.

In these verses we have,

First. A farther account of the sufferings of Christ. Much was said before, but more is said here, of the very low condition to which he abased and humbled himself, to which he became obedient, even to the death of the cross.

1. He had griefs and sorrows. Being acquainted with them, he kept up the acquaintance, and did not grow shy, no, not of such melancholy acquaintance. Were griefs and sorrows allotted him? He bore them, and blamed not his lot; he carried them, and did neither shrink from them nor sink under them. The load was heavy, and the way long; and yet he did not tire, but persevered to the end, till he said, "It is finished."

2. He had blows and bruises; he was stricken and smitten, and afflicted. His sorrows bruised him, he felt pain and smart from them; they touched him in the most tender part, especially when God was dishonoured, and when he forsook him upon the cross. All along he was smitten with the tongue, when he was cavilled at and contradicted, put under the worst of characters, and had all manner of evil said against him. At last he was smitten with the hand, with blow after blow.

3. He had wounds and stripes. He was scourged, not under the merciful restriction of the Jewish law, which allowed not above forty stripes to be given to the worst of malefactors, but according to the usage of the Romans. And his scourging, doubtless, was the more severe, because Pilate intended it as an equivalent for his crucifixion; and yet it proved a preface to it. He was wounded in his hands, and feet, and side; though it was so ordered that "not a bone of him should be broken," yet he had scarce any where a whole skin, (how fond soever we are to sleep in one, even when we are called out to suffer for him,) but from the crown of the head, which was crowned with thorns, to the soles of his feet, which were nailed to the cross, nothing appeared but wounds and bruises.

4. He was wronged and abused, ver. 7; he was oppressed, injuriously treated, and hardly dealt with. That was laid to his charge which he was perfectly innocent of; that laid upon him which he did not deserve; and in both he was oppressed and injured. He was afflicted both in mind and body; being oppressed, he laid it to heart, and though he was patient was not stupid under it; but he mingled his tears with those of the oppressed, that have no comforter, because on the side of the oppressors there is power, Eccl. iv. 1. Oppression is a sore affliction, it has made many a wise man mad, Eccl. vii. 7; but our Lord Jesus, though when he was oppressed he was afflicted, yet he kept possession of his own soul.

5. He was judged and imprisoned; that is implied in his being taken from prison and judgment, ver. 8. God having made him sin for us, he was proceeded against as a malefactor, he was apprehended and taken into custody, and made a prisoner; he was judged, accused, tried, and condemned according to the usual forms of law. God filed a process against him, judged him in pursuance of that process, and clapped him up in the prison of the grave, at the door of which a stone was rolled and sealed.

6. He was cut off by an untimely death "from the land of the living," though he lived a most useful life, did so many good works; and they were all such, that one would be apt to think it was for some of them that they stoned him. He was stricken to the death, to the grave, which he made with the wicked; for he was crucified between two thieves, as if he had been the worst of the three; and yet with the rich, for he was buried in a sepulchre that belonged to Joseph, an honourable counsellor. Though he died with the wicked, and, according to the common course of dealing with criminals, should have been buried with them, in the place were he was crucified; yet God here foretold, and providence so ordered it, that he should make his grave with the innocent, with the rich, as a mark of distinction put between him and those that really deserve to die, even in his sufferings.

Secondly. A full account of the meaning of his sufferings. It was a very great mystery that so excellent a person should suffer such hard things; and it is natural to ask with amazement how it came about. What evil has he done? His enemies indeed looked upon him as suffering justly for his crimes; and, though they could lay nothing to his charge, they esteemed him "stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted," ver. 4. Because they hated him, and run him down, they thought God did; that he was his enemy and fought against him, and therefore they were the more enraged against him, saying, "God hath forsaken him, persecute and take him," Ps. lxxi. 11. Those that are justly smitten are smitten of God, for by him princes decree justice; and so they looked upon him to be smitten, justly put to death, as a blasphemer, a deceiver, and an enemy to Cæsar. They that saw him hanging on the cross inquired not into the merits of his cause; but took it for granted that he was guilty of every thing laid to his charge, and that therefore vengeance suffered him not to live. Thus Job's friends esteemed him smitten of God, because there was something uncommon in his sufferings. It was true that he was smitten of God, ver. 10, (or, as some read it, 'he was God smitten and afflicted,' the Son of God, though smitten and afflicted,) but not in the sense that they meant it; for it is true he suffered all these things, but,

1. He never did any thing in the least to deserve this hard usage. Whereas he was charged with perverting the nation, and sowing sedition, it was utterly false, "he had done no violence," but "went about doing good." And whereas he was called "that deceiver," he never deserved that character, for there was no deceit in his mouth, ver. 9, to which the apostle refers, 1 Pet. ii. 22, "He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth;" he never offended either in word or deed, nor could any of his enemies take up that challenge of his, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" The judge that condemned him owned he found no fault in him; and the centurion that executed him professed that certainly he was a righteous man.

2. He carried himself under his sufferings so as to make it appear that he did not suffer as an evil-doer; for, though he was oppressed and afflicted, yet he "opened not his mouth," ver. 7, no, not so much as to plead his own innocency, but freely offered himself to suffer and die for us, and objected nothing against it. This quite takes away the scandal of the cross, that he voluntarily submitted to it for great and holy ends. By his wisdom he could have evaded the sentence, and by his power have resisted the execution; but thus it was written, and thus it behoved him to suffer; this commandment he received from his Father, and therefore he was led "as a lamb to the slaughter," without any difficulty or reluctancy. He is the Lamb of God, and as a sheep is dumb before the shearers, nay, before the butchers, so he opened not his mouth; which notes not only his exemplary patience under affliction, Ps. xxxix. 9, and his meekness under reproach, Ps. xxxviii. 13, but his cheerful compliance with his Father's will; "Not my will, but thine be done: Lo, I come." And by this will we are sanctified; his making his own soul, his own life, an offering for our sin.

3. It was for our good, and in our stead, that Jesus Christ suffered; this is asserted here plainly and fully, and in a very great variety of emphatical expressions.

1st. It is certain we are all guilty before God; we have all sinned, and come short of the glory of God; ver. 6, "All we like sheep have gone astray," one as well as another. The whole race of mankind lies under the stain of original corruption, and every particular person stands charged with many actual transgressions. We have all gone astray from God our rightful owner, alienated ourselves from him, from the ends he designed us to move towards, and the way he appointed us to move in. We have gone astray like sheep, that are apt to wander, and are unapt, when they are gone astray, to find the way home again. And that is our true character; we are bent to backslide from God, but altogether unable of ourselves to return to him. This is mentioned not only as our infelicity, that we go astray from the green pastures, and expose ourselves to the beasts of prey, but as our iniquity; we affront God in going astray from him, for we turn aside every one to his own way, and thereby set up ourselves and our own will in competition with God and his will; which is the malignity of sin. Instead of walking obediently in God's way, we have turned wilfully and stubbornly to our own way, the way of our own heart, the way that our own corrupt appetites and passions lead us to; we have set up for ourselves, to be our own masters, our own carvers, to do what we will, and have what we will. Some think it intimates our own evil way, in distinction from the evil way of others. Sinners have their own iniquity, their beloved sin, which doth most easily beset them; their own evil way, that they are particularly fond of, and bless themselves in.

2nd. Our sins are our sorrows and our griefs, ver. 4. Or, as it may be read, our sicknesses and our wounds. The Seventy read it, 'our sins;' and so the apostle, 1 Pet. ii. 24. Our original corruptions are the sickness and disease of the soul, an habitual indisposition; our actual transgressions are the wounds of the soul, which put conscience to pain, if it be not seared and senseless. Or, our sins are called our griefs and sorrows, because all our griefs and sorrows are owing to our sins; and our sins deserve all griefs and sorrows, even those that are most extreme and everlasting.

3rd. Our Lord Jesus was appointed, and did undertake, to make satisfaction for our sins, and so to save us from the penal consequences of them. First. He was appointed to do it, by the will of his Father; for "the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." God chose him to be the Saviour of poor sinners, and would have him to save them in this way, by bearing their sins, and the punishment of them; not the idem,—'the same' that we should have suffered, but the tantundem—that which was more than equivalent for the maintaining of the honour of the holiness and justice of God in the government of the world. Observe here, 1*st.* In what way we are saved from the ruin to which by sin we were become liable. By laying our sins on Christ, as the sins of the offerer were laid upon the sacrifice, and those of all Israel upon the head of the scapegoat. Our sins were made to meet upon him, so the margin reads it; the sins of all that he was to save, from every place and every age, met upon him, and he was met with for them. They were made to fall upon him, so some read it, as those rushed upon him that came with swords and staves to take him. The laying of our sins upon Christ implies the taking of them off from us; we shall not fall under the curse of the law if we submit to the grace of the Gospel. They were laid upon Christ when he was made sin, that is, a sin offering for us; and redeemed us from the curse of the law by being made a curse for us, and so he put himself into a capacity to make those easy that come to him heavy laden under the burthen of sin: see Ps. xl. 6—12. 2*nd.* By whom this was appointed. It was the Lord that laid our iniquities on Christ. He contrived this way of reconciliation and salvation, and he accepted of the vicarious satisfaction Christ was to make. Christ was delivered to death by the "determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." None but God had power to lay our sins upon Christ, both because the sin was committed against him, and to him the satisfaction was to be made, and because Christ, on whom the iniquity was to be laid, was his own Son, the Son of his love, and his holy child Jesus, who himself knew no sin. 3*rd.* For whom this atonement was to be made. It was "the iniquity of us all" that was laid on Christ; for in Christ there is a sufficiency of merit for the salvation of all, and a serious offer made of that salvation to all, which excludes none that do not exclude themselves. It intimates that this is the one only way of salvation. All that are justified are justified by having their sins laid on Jesus Christ; and, though they were never so many, he is able to bear the weight of them all. Secondly. He undertook to do it. God laid upon him our iniquity. But did he consent to it? Yes, he did; for so some think is the true reading of the next words, ver. 7, "It was exacted, and he answered." Divine justice demanded satisfaction for our sins, and he engaged to make the satisfaction. He became our surety, not as originally bound with us, but as bail to the action. 'Upon me be the curse, my Father.' And therefore, when he was seized, he indented with those into whose hands he surrendered himself, that that should be his disciples' discharge, "If you seek me, let these go their way," Jno. xviii. 8. By his own voluntary susception he made himself responsible for our debt, and it is well for us he was responsible. Thus he restored that which he took not away.

4. Having undertaken our debt, he underwent the penalty. Solomon saith, "He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it." Christ being surety for us, did smart for it. 1st. He "bore our griefs, and carried our sorrows," ver. 4. He not only submitted to the common infirmities of the human nature, and the common calamities of human life which sin had introduced, but he underwent the extremities of grief when he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful." He made the sorrows of this present time heavy to himself, that he might make them light and easy for us. Sin is the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery. Christ bore our sins, and so bore our griefs, bore them off us, that we should never be pressed above measure. This is quoted, Mat. viii. 17, with application to the compassion Christ had for the sick that came to him to be cured, and the power he put forth to cure them. 2nd. He did this by suffering for our sins; ver. 5, "He was wounded for our transgressions;" that is, to make atonement for them, and to purchase for us the pardon of them. Our sins were the thorns in his head, the nails in his hands and feet, the spear in his side. Wounds and bruises were the consequences of sin, what we deserved, and what we had brought upon ourselves, ch. i. 9. That these wounds and bruises, though they are painful, may not be mortal, Christ was "wounded for our transgressions," was tormented or pained (the word is used for the pains of a woman in travail) for our revolts and rebellions; he was bruised or crushed for our iniquities, they were the procuring cause of his death. To the same purpose, ver. 8, "For the transgression of my people was he stricken," was the stroke upon him that should have been upon us; and so some read it, 'He was cut off for the iniquity of my people, unto whom the stroke belonged, or was due.' He was delivered to death for our offences, Rom. iv. 25. Hence it is said to be "according to the Scriptures," according to this scripture, that Christ died for our sins, 1 Cor. xv. 3. Some read this, 'by the transgression of my people,' that is, by the wicked hands of the Jews, who were in profession God's people, he was stricken, was crucified and slain, Acts ii. 23. But, doubtless, we are to take it in the former sense, which is abundantly confirmed by the angel's prediction of the Messiah's undertaking, solemnly delivered to Daniel, that he shall finish transgression, make an end of sin, and make reconciliation for iniquity, Dan. ix. 24.

5. The effect and consequent of this to us is our peace and healing, ver. 5. 1st. Hereby we have peace. "The chastisement of our peace was upon him;" that is, he, by submiting to these chastisements, slew the enmity, and settled an amity between God and man; he made peace by the blood of his cross. Whereas by sin we were become odious to God's holiness, and obnoxious to his justice, through Christ God is reconciled to us, and not only forgives our sins, and saves us from ruin, but takes us into friendship and fellowship with himself, and thereby peace, that is, all good, comes unto us, Eph. ii. 14. "He is our peace," Col. i. 20. Christ was in pain, that we might be at ease; he gave satisfaction to the justice of God, that we might have satisfaction in our own minds; might be of good cheer, knowing that through him our sins are forgiven us. 2nd. Hereby we have healing; for by "his stripes we are healed." Sin is not only a crime for which we were condemned to die, and which Christ purchased for us the pardon of, but it is a disease which tends directly to the death of our souls, and which Christ provided for the cure of. By his stripes, that is, the sufferings he underwent, he purchased for us the Spirit and grace of God to mortify our corruptions, which are the distempers of our souls, and to put our souls in a good state of health, that they may be fit to serve God, and prepared to enjoy him. And by the doctrine of Christ's cross, and the powerful arguments it furnisheth us with against sin, the dominion of sin is broken in us, and we are fortified against that which feeds the disease.

6. The effect and consequent of this to Christ was, his resurrection and advancement to perpetual honour. This perfectly makes the offence of the cross to cease; he yielded himself to die as a sacrifice, as a lamb; and, to make it evident that the sacrifice he offered of himself was accepted, we are told here, ver. 8, 1st. That he was discharged. "He was taken from prison and from judgment;" that is, whereas he was imprisoned in the grave, under a judicial process, lay there under an arrest for our debt, and judgment seemed to be given against him, he was, by an express order from heaven, taken out of the prison of the grave; an angel was sent on purpose to roll away the stone, and set him at liberty; by which the judgment given against him was reversed, and taken off; which redounds not only to his honour, but to our comfort, for being delivered for our offences he was raised again for our justification. That discharge of the bail amounted to a release of the debt. 2nd. That he was preferred. "Who shall declare his generation?" his age, or continuance, so the word signifies; the time of his life? he rose to die no more; death had no more dominion over him; he that was dead is alive, and lives for evermore. And who can describe that immortality to which he rose; or number the years and ages of it? And therefore he is advanced to this eternal life, because for the transgression of his people he became obedient to death. We may take it as speaking the time of his usefulness; as David is said to serve his generation, and so to answer the end of living. Who can declare how great a blessing Christ by his death and resurrection will be to the world? And some, by his generation, understand his spiritual seed. Who can count the vast numbers of converts that shall by the Gospel be begotten to him, like the dew of the morning?

> 'When thus exalted, he shall live to see
> A numberless believing progeny;
> Of his adopted sons the godlike race
> Exceed the stars that heaven's high arches grace.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

Of which generation of his let us pray as Moses did for Israel, "The Lord God of our fathers make them a thousand times so many more as they are, and bless them as he hath promised them," Deu. i. 11.

10 Yet it pleased the LORD to bruise him;
He hath put him to grief:
When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin,
He shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days,
And the pleasure of the LORD shall prosper in his hand.
11 He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied:
By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many;
For he shall bear their iniquities.
12 Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great,
And he shall divide the spoil with the strong;
Because he hath poured out his soul unto death:
And he was numbered with the transgressors;
And he bare the sin of many,
And made intercession for the transgressors.

In the foregoing verses the prophet had testified very particularly of the sufferings of Christ, yet mixing some hints of the happy issue of them. Here he again mentions his sufferings, but largely foretells the glory that should follow. We may observe in these verses,

First. The service and sufferings of Christ's estate of humiliation. Come and see how he loved us; see what he did for us.

1. He submitted to the frowns of heaven; ver. 10, "Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him," to put him to pain, or torment, or grief. The Scripture nowhere saith that Christ in his sufferings underwent the wrath of God; but it saith that the Lord bruised him; not only permitted men to bruise him, here, 1st. That the Lord bruised him; not only permitted men to bruise him, but awakened his own sword against him, Zec. xiii. 7. They esteemed him smitten of God for some very great sin of his own, ver. 4. Now it was true that he was smitten of God, but it was for our sin. The Lord bruised him; for he did not spare him, but "delivered him up for us all," Rom. viii. 32. He it was that put the bitter cup into his hand, and obliged him to drink it, Jno. xviii. 11, having laid upon him our iniquity. He it was that made him sin and a curse for us, and turned to ashes all his burnt offering, in token of the acceptance of it, Ps. xx. 3. 2nd. That he bruised him so as to put him to grief. Christ accommodated himself to this dispensation, and received the impressions of grief from his Father's delivering him up; and he was troubled to that degree that it put him into an agony, and he began to be amazed and very heavy. 3rd. It pleased the Lord to do this; that is, he determined to do it, it was the result of an eternal counsel; and he delighted in it, as it was an effectual method for the salvation of man, and the securing and advancing of the honour of God.

2. He substituted himself in the room of sinners as a sacrifice; he made his soul an offering for sin. He himself explains this, Mat. xx. 28, that he came to give his life a ransom for many. When men brought bulls and goats as sacrifices for sin, they made them offerings, for they had an interest in them, God having put them under the feet of man; but Christ made himself an offering: it was his own act and deed. We could not put him in our stead, but he put himself, and said, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit;" in a higher sense than David said, or could say it, Father, I commit my soul to thee: I deposit it in thy hands, as the life of a sacrifice, and the price of pardons. Thus he shall bear the iniquities of the many that he designed to justify, ver. 11; shall take away the sin of the world, by taking it upon himself, Jno. i. 29. This is mentioned again, ver. 12, "He bare the sin of many," who, if they had been to bear it themselves, it would have sunk them to the lowest hell. See how this string is harped upon; for whenever we think of the sufferings of Christ, we must see him in them bearing our sin.

3. He subjected himself to that which to us is the wages of sin; ver. 12, "He hath poured out his soul unto death;" poured it out as water; so little account did he make of it, when the laying of it down was the appointed means of our redemption and salvation. He loved not his life unto the death, and his followers the martyrs did likewise, Rev. xii. 11. Or, rather, he poured it out as a drink offering, to make his sacrifice complete; poured it out as wine, that his blood might be drink indeed, as his flesh is meat indeed, to all believers. There was not only a colliquation of his body in sufferings, (Ps. xxii. 14, "I am poured out like water.) but a surrender of his spirit; he poured out that even unto death, though he is the Lord of life.

4. He suffered himself to be ranked with sinners, and yet offered himself to be an intercessor for sinners, ver. 12. 1st. It was a great aggravation of his sufferings, that he was numbered with the transgressors. He was not only condemned as a malefactor, but was executed in company with two notorious malefactors, and he in the midst, as if he had been the worst of the three; in which circumstance of his suffering the evangelist tells us this prophecy was fulfilled, Mar. xv. 27, 28. Nay, the vilest malefactor of all, Barabbas, that was both traitor, thief, and murderer, was put in election with him for the favour of the people, and carried it; for they would not have Jesus released, but Barabbas. In his whole life he was numbered among the transgressors; for he was called and counted a sabbath-breaker, a drunkard, and a friend to publicans and sinners. 2nd. It was a great commendation to his sufferings, and redounded very much to his honour, that in his sufferings he "made intercession for the transgressors," for those that reviled and crucified him, for he prayed, "Father, forgive them;" thereby shewing not only that he forgave them, but that he was now doing that upon which their forgiveness, and the forgiveness of all other transgressors, was to be founded. That prayer was the language of his blood, crying not for vengeance, but for mercy, and therein it speaketh better things than that of Abel, even for those who with wicked hands shed it.

Secondly. The graces and glories of his estate of exaltation, and the graces he confers on us, are not the least of the glories conferred on him; these are secured to him by the covenant of redemption, which these verses give us some idea of. He promiseth to make his soul an offering for sin, consents that the Father shall deliver him up, and undertakes to bear the sin of many; and for and in consideration hereof, the Father promiseth to glorify him, not only with the glory he had as God before the world was, Jno. xvii. 5, but with the glories of the Mediator.

1. He shall have the glory of an everlasting Father. Under this title he was brought into the world, ch. ix. 6, and he shall not fail to answer the title when he goes out of the world. This was the promise made to Abraham, (who herein was a type of Christ,) that he should be the "father of many nations," and so be "the heir of the world," Rom. iv. 13, 17. As he was the root of the Jewish church, and the covenant was made with him and his seed, so is Christ of the universal church, and with him (and his spiritual seed) is the covenant of grace made, which is grounded upon, and grafted in, the covenant of redemption, which here we have some of the glorious promises of. It is promised,

1st. That the Redeemer shall have a seed to serve him, and to bear up his name, Ps. xxii. 30. True believers are the seed of Christ; the Father gave them to him to be so, Jno. xvii. 6. He died to purchase and purify them to himself; fell to the ground as a corn of wheat, that he might bring forth much fruit, Jno. xii. 24. The word, that incorruptible seed of which they are born again, is his word; the Spirit, the great author of their regeneration, is his Spirit; and it is his image that is formed in them, and they are conformed to.

2nd. That he shall live to see his seed. Christ's children have a living Father; and because he lives they shall live also, for he is their life. Though he died, he rose again, and left not his children orphans, but took effectual care to secure to them the Spirit, the blessing, and the inheritance of sons. He shall see a great increase of them. The word is plural; "He shall see his seeds,' multitudes of them, so many that they cannot be numbered.

3rd. That he shall himself continue, to take care of the affairs of this numerous family: "He shall prolong his days." Many, when they see their seed, their seed's seed, have wished to depart in peace; but Christ will not commit the care of his family to any other; no, he shall himself live long, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, for he ever lives. Some refer it to believers; "He shall see a seed that shall prolong his days;" agreeing with Ps. lxxxix. 29, 36, "His seed shall endure for ever." Whilst the world stands Christ will have a church in it, which he himself will be the life of.

4th. That his great undertaking shall be successful, and shall answer expectation. "The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand." God's purposes shall take effect, and not one iota or tittle of them shall fail. Note, First. The work of man's redemption is in the hands of the Lord Jesus, and it is in good hands. It is well for us they are in his, for our own hands are not sufficient for us; but he is able to save to the uttermost. They are in his hands who upholdeth all things. Secondly. It is the good pleasure of the Lord, which notes not only his counsel concerning it, but his complacency in it, and therefore God loved him, and was well pleased in him, because he undertook to lay down his life for the sheep. Thirdly. It has prospered hitherto, and shall prosper, whatever obstructions or difficulties have been, or may be in the way of it. Whatever is undertaken according to God's pleasure shall prosper, ch. xlvi. 10. Cyrus, a type of Christ, shall perform all God's pleasure, ch. xliv. 28, and therefore no doubt Christ shall. Christ was so perfectly well qualified for his undertaking, and prosecuted it with so much vigour, and it was (from first to last) so well laid, that it could not fail to prosper, to the honour of his Father, and the salvation of all his seed.

5th. That he shall himself have abundant satisfaction in it; ver. 11, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." He shall see it beforehand, (so it may be understood,) he shall, with the prospect of his sufferings, have a prospect of the fruit, and be satisfied in the bargain; he shall see it, when it is accomplished in the conversion and salvation of poor sinners. Note, First. Our Lord Jesus was in travail of soul for our redemption and salvation; in great pain, but with longing desire to be delivered; and all the pains and throes he underwent were in order to it, and hastened it on. Secondly. Christ doth and will see the blessed fruit of the travail of his soul in the founding and building up of his church, and the eternal salvation of all that were given him. He will not come short of his end in any part of his work, but will himself see that he has not laboured in vain. Thirdly. The salvation of souls is a great satisfaction to the Lord Jesus. He will reckon all his pains well bestowed, and himself abundantly recompensed, if the many sons be by him brought through grace to glory. Let him have this, and he has enough. God will be sanctified and glorified; penitent believers shall be justified, and then he is satisfied. Thus, in conformity to Christ, it shall be a satisfaction to us if we can do any thing to serve the interests of God's kingdom in the world. Let it always be our meat and drink, as it was Christ's, to do God's will.

2. He shall have the glory of bringing in an everlasting righteousness, for so it was foretold concerning him, Dan. ix. 24, and here to the same purpose; "By his knowledge;" that is, the knowledge of him, and faith in him, "shall my righteous servant justify many;" for he shall bear the sins of many, and so lay a foundation for our justification from sin. Note, 1st. The great privilege that flows to us from the death of Christ is justification from sin, our being acquitted from that guilt which alone can ruin us, and accepted into God's favour, which alone can make us happy. 2nd. Christ, that purchased our justification for us, applies it to us by his intercession made for us, his Gospel preached to us, and his Spirit witnessing in us. The Son of man had power, even on earth, to forgive sin. 3rd. There are many whom Christ justifies. Not all, multitudes perish in their sins; yet many, even as many as he gave his life a ransom for, as many as the Lord our God shall call. He shall justify, not here and there one that is eminent and remarkable, but those of the many, the despised multitude. 4th. It is by faith that we are justified, by our consent to Christ and the covenant of grace. In this way we are saved, because thus God is most glorified, free grace most advanced, self most abased, and our happiness most effectually secured. 5th. Faith is the knowledge of Christ, and without knowledge there can be no true faith. Christ's way of gaining the will and affections is by enlightening the understanding, and bringing that unfeignedly to assent to Divine truths. 6th. That knowledge of Christ, and faith in him, by which we are justified, hath reference to him, both as a servant to God, and as a surety for us. First. As one that is employed for God to pursue his designs, and secure and advance the interests of his glory. He is my righteous servant, and as such justifies men. God hath authorized and appointed him to do it; it is according to God's will, and for his honour, that he doth it; he is himself righteous, and of his righteousness have all we received. He that is himself righteous, (for he could not have made atonement for our sin, if he had had any sin of his own to answer for,) is made of God to us righteousness; the Lord our righteousness. Secondly. As one that hath undertaken for us. We must know him, and believe in him, as one that bore our iniquities—saved us from sinking under the load by taking it upon himself.

3. He shall have the glory of obtaining an incontestable victory and universal dominion; ver. 12, Because he has done all these good services, "therefore will I divide him a portion with the great," and, according to the will of the Father, "he shall divide the spoil with the strong;" as a great general, when he hath driven the enemy out of the field, takes the plunder of it for himself and his army, which is both an unquestionable evidence of the victory, and a recompence for all the toils and perils of the battle. Note, 1st. God the Father has engaged to reward the services and sufferings of Christ with great glory. I will set him among the great, highly exalt him, and give him a name above every name, and with great riches, for he shall divide the spoil, shall have abundance of graces and comforts to bestow upon all his faithful soldiers. 2nd. Christ comes at his glory by conquest. He hath set upon the strong man armed, dispossessed him, and divided the spoil. He hath vanquished principalities and powers, sin and Satan, death and hell, the world and the flesh; these are the strong that he hath disarmed and taken the spoil of. 3rd. Much of the glory with which Christ is recompensed, and the spoil which he hath divided, consists in the vast multitudes of willing, faithful, loyal subjects, that shall be brought in to him; for so some read it, 'I will give many to him, and he shall obtain many for a spoil;' that is, God will give him the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession, Ps. ii. 8. His dominion shall be from sea to sea. Many shall be wrought upon by the grace of God to give up themselves to him, to be ruled, and taught, and saved by him; and hereby he shall reckon himself honoured, and enriched, and abundantly recompensed for all he did, and all he suffered. 4th. What God designed for the Redeemer he shall certainly gain the possession of; I will divide it to him: and immediately it follows, He shall divide it, notwithstanding the opposition that is given to him; for as Christ finished the work that was given him to do, so God completed the recompence that was promised him for it, for he is both able and faithful. 5th. The spoil which God divided to Christ, he divides, (it is the same word,) he distributes it among his followers; for when he led captivity captive he received gifts for men, that he might give gifts to men; for, as he has told us, Acts xx. 35, he did himself reckon it more blessed and honourable to give than to receive. Christ conquered for us, and through him we are more than conquerors. He hath divided the spoils, the fruits of his conquest, to all that are his; let us therefore cast in our lot among them.

CHAPTER LIV.

The death of Christ is the life of the church, and of all that truly belong to it; and therefore, very fitly, after the prophet had foretold the sufferings of Christ, he foretells the flourishing of the church, which is a part of his glory, and that exaltation of him which was the reward of his humiliation. It was promised him, that he should see his seed; and this chapter is an explication of that promise. It may easily be granted, that it has a primary reference to the welfare and prosperity of the Jewish church, after their return out of Babylon, which (as other things that happened to them) was typical of the glorious liberty of the children of God, which through Christ we are brought into; yet it cannot be denied but that it has a farther and principal reference to the Gospel church, into which the Gentiles were to be admitted. And the first words being understood by the apostle of the New Testament Jerusalem, Gal. iv. 26, 27, may serve as a key to the whole chapter, and that which follows. It is here promised concerning the Christian church, I. That though the beginnings of it were small, yet it should be greatly enlarged by the accession of many to it from among the Gentiles, that had been wholly destitute of church privileges, ver. 1—5. II. That though sometimes God might seem to withdraw from her, and suspend the tokens of his favour, yet he would return in mercy, and would not return to contend with them any more, ver. 6—10. III. That though for a while she was in sorrow, and under oppression, yet she should at length be advanced to greater honour and splendour than ever, ver. 11, 12. IV. That knowledge, righteousness, and peace, should flourish and prevail, ver. 13, 14. V. That all attempts against the church should be baffled, and she should be secured from the malice of her enemies, ver. 14—17.

SING, O barren, thou that didst not bear;
Break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child:
For more are the children of the desolate
Than the children of the married wife, saith the LORD.

2 Enlarge the place of thy tent,
And let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations:
Spare not, lengthen thy cords,
And strengthen thy stakes; [left;
3 For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the
And thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles,
And make the desolate cities to be inhabited.
4 Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed:
Neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame:
For thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth,
And shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood
5 For thy Maker is thine husband; [any more.
The LORD of hosts is his name;
And thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel;
The God of the whole earth shall he be called.

If we apply this to the state of the Jews after their return out of captivity, it is a prophecy of the increase of their nation after they were settled in their own land. Jerusalem had been in the condition of a wife written childless, or a desolate, solitary widow; but now it is promised that the city should be replenished, and the country peopled again; that not only the ruins of Jerusalem should be repaired, but the suburbs of it extended on all sides, and a great many buildings erected upon new foundations; that those estates which had for many years been wrongfully held by the Babylonian Gentiles should now return to the right owners. God will again be a husband to them, and the reproach of their captivity, and the small number to which they were then reduced shall be forgotten. And it is to be observed, that by virtue of the ancient promise made to Abraham of the increase of his seed, when they were restored to God's favour, they multiplied greatly. Those that first came up out of Babylon were but forty-two thousand, Ezr. ii. 64, about a fifteenth part of their number when they came out of Egypt; many came dropping to them afterwards, but we may suppose that to be the greatest number that ever came in a body; and yet about five hundred years after, a little before their destruction by the Romans, a calculation was made by the number of the paschal lambs, and the lowest computation by that rule, (allowing only ten to a lamb, whereas they might be twenty,) made the nation to be near three millions. Josephus saith, seven and twenty hundred thousand and odd.—De Bel. Jud., l. vii., c. 17. But we must apply it to the church of God in general, I mean the kingdom of God among men, God's city in the world, the children of God incorporated. Now observe,

First. The low and languishing estate of religion in the world for a long time before Christianity was brought in. It was like one barren, that did not bear, or "travail with child;" was like one desolate, that had lost husband and children. The church lay in a little compass, and brought forth little fruit. The Jews were indeed by profession married to God, but few proselytes were added to them. The rising generations were unpromising, and serious godliness manifestly lost ground among them. The Gentiles had less religion among them than the Jews; their proselytes were in a dispersion; and the children of God, like the children of a broken, reduced family, were scattered abroad, Jno. xi. 52; did not appear, nor make any figure.

Secondly. Its recovery from this low condition by the preaching of the Gospel and the planting of the Christian church.

1. Multitudes were converted from idols to the living God. Those were the church's children that were born again, were partakers of a new and Divine nature by the Word. "More were the children of the desolate than of the married wife;" that is, there were more good people found in the Gentile church, (when that was set up,) that had long been afar off, and without God in the world, than ever were found in the Jewish church. God's sealed ones, out of the tribes of Israel, are numbered, Rev. vii. 4, and they were but a remnant compared with the thousands of Israel. But those of other nations were so many, and crowded in so thick, and lay so much scattered in all parts, that no man could number them, ver. 9. Sometimes more of the power of religion is found in those places and families that have made little show of it, and have enjoyed but little of the means of grace, than in others that have distinguished themselves by a flourishing profession; and then more are the children of the desolate, more the fruits of their righteousness than those of the married wife; so the last shall be first. Now this is spoken of as matter of great rejoicing to the church, which is called upon to break forth into singing upon this account. The increase of the church is the joy of all its friends, and strengthens their hands. The longer the church has lain desolate, the greater will the transports of its joy be, when it begins to recover the ground it has lost, and to gain more. Even in heaven, among the angels of God, there is an uncommon joy for a sinner that repenteth, much more for a nation that doth so. If the barren fig-tree at length bring forth fruit, it is well; it shall rejoice, and others with it.

2. The bounds of the church were extended much farther than ever before, ver. 2, 3. 1st. It is here supposed that the present state of the church is a tabernacle state; it dwells in tents, like the heirs of promise of old, Heb. xi. 9. Its dwelling is mean, and movable, and of no strength against a storm. The city, the continuing city, is reserved for hereafter. A tent is soon taken down and shifted; so the candlestick of church privileges is soon removed out of its place, Rev. ii. 5; and, when God pleaseth, it is as soon fixed elsewhere. 2nd. Though it be a tabernacle state, it is sometimes very remarkably a growing state; and if this family increase, no matter though it be in a tent. Thus it was in the first preaching of the Gospel; it was the business of the apostles to "disciple all nations," to stretch forth the curtains of the church's habitation, to preach the Gospel there where Christ had not yet been named, Rom. xv. 20, to leaven those towns and countries with the Gospel that had hitherto been strangers to it, and so to lengthen the cords of this tabernacle, that more might be enclosed; which would make it necessary to strengthen the stakes proportionably, that they might bear the weight of the enlarged curtains. The more numerous the church grows, the more cautious she must be to fortify herself against errors and corruptions, and to support her seven pillars, Pr. ix. 1. 3rd. It was a proof of Divine power going along with the Gospel, that in all places it grew and prevailed mightily, Acts xix. 20. It broke forth as the breaking forth of waters, on the right hand, and on the left; that is, on all hands: the Gospel spread itself into all parts of the world; there were eastern and western churches. The church's seed inherited the Gentiles, and the cities that had been desolate, that is, destitute of the knowledge and worship of the true God, came to be inhabited; that is, to have religion set up in them, and the name of Christ professed.

3. This was the comfort and honour of the church; ver. 4, "Fear not, for thou shalt not be ashamed," as formerly, of the straitness of thy borders, and the fewness of thy children, which thine enemies upbraided thee with; but shalt forget the reproach of thy youth, because there shall be no more ground for that reproach. It was the reproach of the Christian religion in its youth, that none of the rulers or princes of this world embraced it, and that it was entertained and professed by a despicable handful of men; but after a while nations were discipled, the empire became Christian, and then this reproach of its youth was forgotten.

4. This was owing to the relation in which God stood to his church, as her husband; ver. 5, "Thy Maker is thine husband." Believers are said to be married to Christ, that they may "bring forth fruit unto God," Rom. vii. 4. So the church is married to him, that she may bear and bring up a holy seed to God, that shall be accounted to him for a generation. Jesus Christ is the church's Maker, by whom she is formed into a people; her Redeemer, by whom she is brought out of captivity, the bondage of sin, the worst of slaveries. This is he that hath espoused her to himself. And, 1st. He is "the Lord of hosts," he has an irresistible power, an absolute sovereignty, and a universal dominion! Kings, that are lords of some hosts, find there are others that are lords of other hosts, as many and mighty as theirs; but God is the Lord of all hosts. 2nd. He is "the Holy One of Israel," the same that presided in the affairs of the Old Testament church, and was the Mediator of the covenant made with it. The promises made to the New Testament Israel are as rich and sure as those made to the Old Testament Israel; for he that is our Redeemer is the Holy One of Israel. 3rd. He is, and shall be called, the Lord of the whole earth, as God, and as Mediator; for he is the heir of all things. But then he shall be called so when the ends of the earth shall be made to see his salvation; all the earth shall call him their God, and have an interest in him. Long he had been called in a peculiar manner the God of Israel; but now the partition wall between Jew and Gentile being taken down, he shall be called "The God of the whole earth;" there where he has been, as at Athens itself, an unknown God.

6 For the LORD hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, [God.
And a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy 7 For a small moment have I forsaken thee;
But with great mercies will I gather thee.
8 In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment;
But with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee,
Saith the LORD thy Redeemer.
9 For this is as the waters of Noah unto me:
For as I have sworn
That the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth;
So have I sworn
That I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee.
10 For the mountains shall depart,
And the hills be removed;
But my kindness shall not depart from thee,
Neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed,
Saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee.

The seasonable succour and relief which God sent to his captives in Babylon, when they had a discharge from their bondage there, is here foretold, as a type and figure of all those consolations of God, which are treasured up for the church in general, and all believers in particular, in the covenant of grace.

First. Look back to former troubles, and, in comparison with them, God's favours to his people appear very comfortable, ver. 6—8; where observe,

1. How sorrowful the church's condition had been. She had been as a woman forsaken, whose husband was dead or had fallen out with her, though she was a "wife of youth;" upon which account she is grieved in spirit, takes it very ill, frets, and grows melancholy upon it; or, as one refused and rejected, and therefore full of discontent. Note, Even those that are espoused to God may yet seem to be refused and forsaken, and may be grieved in spirit under the apprehensions of it. Those that shall never be forsaken and left in despair may yet for a time be perplexed and in distress. The similitude is explained ver. 7, "For a small moment have I forsaken thee;" and ver. 8, "In a little wrath I hid my face from thee." When God continues his people long in trouble he seems to forsake them; so their enemies construe it, Ps. lxxi. 11; so they themselves misinterpret it, ch. xlix. 14. When they are comfortless under their troubles, because their prayers and expectations are not answered, God hides his face from them, as if he regarded them not, nor designed them any kindness. This God owns he had done, for he keeps an account of the afflictions of his people; and though he never turned his face against them, as against the wicked, Ps. xxxiv. 16, he remembers how often he turned his back upon them. This arose indeed from his displeasure; it was in wrath that he forsook them, and hid his face from them, ch. lvii. 17. Yet it was but in a little wrath,—not that God's wrath ever is a little thing, or to be made light of, (who knows the power of his anger?)—but little in comparison with what they had deserved, and what others justly suffer, on whom the full vials of his wrath are poured out. He did not stir up all his wrath; but God's people, though they be sensible of never so small a degree of God's displeasure, cannot but be grieved in spirit because of it. And for the continuance of it, it was but for a moment, a small moment; for God doth not keep his anger against his people for ever; no, it is soon over: as he is slow to anger, so he is swift to shew mercy. The afflictions of God's people, as they are light, so they are but for a moment,—a cloud, that presently blows over.

2. How sweet the returns of mercy would be to them, when God shall come and comfort them according to the time that he afflicted them. God called them into covenant with himself, then when they were forsaken and grieved; he called them out of their afflictions, then when they were most pressing, ver. 6. God's anger endures for a moment, but God will gather his people when they think themselves neglected; will gather them out of their dispersions, that they may return in a body to their own land; will gather them into his arms, to protect them, embrace them, and bear them up; and will gather them at last to himself —will gather the wheat into the barn. He will have mercy on them; which supposeth the turning away of his anger, and the admitting of them again into his favour. God's gathering of his people takes rise from his mercy, not any merit of theirs; and it is "with great mercies," ver. 7, "with everlasting kindness," ver. 8. The wrath is little, but the mercies great; the wrath for a moment, but the kindness everlasting. See how one is set over against the other, that we may neither despond under our afflictions nor despair of relief.

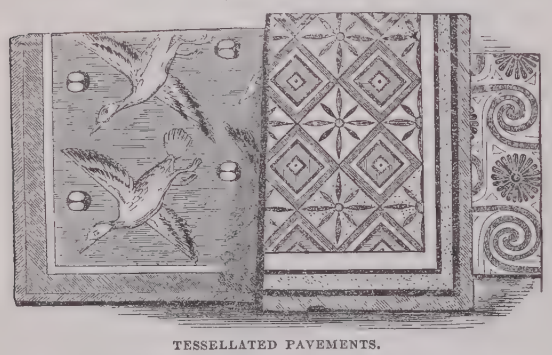
Secondly. Look forward to future dangers, and in defiance of them. God's favours to his people appear very constant, and his kindness everlasting; for it is formed into a covenant, here called a covenant of peace, because it is founded in reconciliation, and is inclusive of all good. Now,

1. This is as firm as the covenant of providence. It is "as the waters of Noah," that is, as that promise which was made concerning the deluge, that there should never be the like again to disturb the course of summer and winter, seedtime and harvest, ver. 9. God then contended with the world in great wrath, and for a full year, and yet at length returned in mercy, everlasting mercy; for he gave his word, which was as inviolable as his oath, that Noah's flood should never return, that he would never drown the world again: see Gen. viii. 21, 22; ix. 11. And God hath ever since kept his word, though the world has been very provoking; and he will keep it to the end, for the world that now is is reserved unto fire. And thus inviolable is the covenant of grace: "I have sworn that I would not be wroth with thee," as I have been, and "rebuke thee," as I have done. He will not be so angry with them as to cast them off, and break his covenant with them, Ps. lxxxix. 34; nor rebuke them, as he hath rebuked the heathen to destroy them, and "put out their name for ever and ever," Ps. ix. 5.

2. It is more firm than the strongest parts of the visible creation; ver. 10, "The mountains shall depart," which are called everlasting mountains, and "the hills be removed," though they are called perpetual hills, Hab. iii. 6. Sooner shall they remove than God's covenant with his people be broken. Mountains have sometimes been shaken by earthquakes, and removed; but the promises of God were never broken by the shock of any event. The day will come when all "the mountains shall depart," and all "the hills be removed;" not only the tops of them covered, as they were by the waters of Noah, but the roots of them torn up; for the earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. But then the covenant of peace between God and believers shall continue, in the everlasting bliss of all those who are the children of that covenant. Mountains and hills signify great men, men of bulk and figure. Do these mountains seem to support the skies, (as Atlas,) and bear them up? they shall depart and be removed. Creature confidences shall fail us; in vain is salvation hoped for from those hills and mountains; but the firmament is firm, and answers its name, when those who seemed to prop it are gone. When our friends fail us, our God doth not, nor doth his kindness depart. Do these mountains threaten, and seem to top the skies, and bid defiance to them, as Pelion and Ossa? Do the kings of the earth and the rulers set themselves against the Lord? They shall depart and be removed, great mountains that stand in the way of the salvation of the church shall be made plain, Zec. iv. 7, but God's kindness shall never depart from his people; for whom he loves he loves to the end, nor shall the covenant of his peace ever be removed, for he is the Lord that hath mercy on his people. Therefore the covenant is immovable and inviolable, because it is built, not on our merit, which is a mutable, uncertain thing, but on God's mercy, which is from everlasting to everlasting.

11 O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted,
Behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours,
And lay thy foundations with sapphires.



TESSELLATED PAVEMENTS.

12 And I will make thy windows of agates,
And thy gates of carbuncles,
And all thy borders of pleasant stones.
13 And all thy children shall be taught of the LORD;
And great shall be the peace of thy children.
14 In righteousness shalt thou be established:
Thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear:
And from terror; for it shall not come near thee.
15 Behold, they shall surely gather together, but not by me:
Whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall for thy sake.
16 Behold, I have created the smith
That bloweth the coals in the fire,
And that bringeth forth an instrument for his work;
And I have created the waster to destroy.
17 No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper;
And every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn.
This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD,
And their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD.

Very precious promises are here made to the church in her low condition, that God would not only continue his love to his people under their troubles, as before, but that he would restore them to their former prosperity; nay, that he would raise them to greater prosperity than any they had yet enjoyed. In the foregoing chapter we had the humiliation and exaltation of Christ, here we have the humiliation and exaltation of the church; for if we suffer with him we shall reign with him. Observe,

First. The distressed state the church is here reduced to by the providence of God; ver. 11, "O thou afflicted," poor and indigent society, that art "tossed with tempest," like a ship driven from her anchors by a storm, and hurried into the ocean, where she is ready to be swallowed up by the waves, and in this condition not comforted by any compassionate friend that will sympathize with thee, or suggest to thee any encouraging considerations, Eccl. iv. 2; not comforted by any allay to thy trouble, or prospect of deliverance out of it. This was the condition of the Jews in Babylon, and afterwards, for a time, under Antiochus. It is often the condition of Christian churches, and of particular believers; without are fightings, within are fears; like the disciples in a storm, ready to perish, and where is their faith?

Secondly. The glorious state the church is here advanced to by the promise of God. God takes notice of the afflicted, distressed state of his church, and comforts her when she is most disconsolate and has no other comforter. Let the people of God, when they are afflicted and tossed, think they hear God speaking comfortably to them by these words, taking notice of their griefs and fears, what afflictions they are under, what tosses they are in, and what comforts their case calls for; when they bemoan themselves, God bemoans them and speaks to them with pity; "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted," for in all their afflictions he is afflicted. But this is not all; he engageth to raise her up out of her affliction, and encourageth her with the assurance of great things he would do for her, both for her prosperity and for the securing of that prosperity to her.

1. Whereas now she lay in disgrace, God promiseth that which would be her beauty and honour, which would make her easy to herself, and amiable in the eyes of others.

1st. This is here promised by a similitude taken from a city; and it is an apt similitude, for the church is the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem; whereas now Jerusalem lay in ruins, a heap of rubbish, it shall not only be rebuilt, but beautified, and appear more splendid than ever; the stones shall not only be laid firm, but fine, laid with fair colours; they shall be glittering stones, 1 Chr. xxix. 2. The foundations shall be laid, or garnished, with sapphire, the most precious of all the precious stones here mentioned; for Christ, (the church's foundation,) and the foundation of the apostles and prophets, are precious above any thing else. The windows of this house, city or temple, shall be made of agate; the "gates of carbuncles," and "all the borders," the walls that enclose the courts, or the boundaries, by which her limits are marked, the mere stones, shall be "of pleasant stones," ver. 12. Never was this literally true; but it intimates, First. That God having graciously undertaken to build his church, we may expect that to be done for it, that to be wrought in it, which is very great and uncommon. Secondly. That the glory of the New Testament church shall far exceed that of the Jewish church, not in external pomp and splendour, but in those gifts and graces of the Spirit, which are infinitely more valuable; that wisdom which is more precious than rubies, Pr. iii. 15, than the precious onyx and the sapphire, and which the topaz of Ethiopia cannot equal, Job xxviii. 16—19. Thirdly. That the wealth of this world, and those things of it that are accounted most precious, shall be despised by all the true living members of the church, as having no value, no glory in comparison with that which far excelleth; that which the children of this world lay up in their treasures, and too often in their hearts, the children of God make pavements of, and put under their feet, the fittest place for it.

2nd. It is here promised in the particular instances of those things that shall be the beauty and honour of the church, which are, knowledge, holiness, and love, the very image of God in which man was created, renewed and restored upon it; and these are the sapphires and carbuncles, the precious and pleasant stones, with which the gospel temple shall be enriched and beautified; and these wrought by the power and efficacy of those doctrines which the apostle compares to gold, silver, and precious stones, that are to be built upon the foundation, 1 Cor. iii. 12. Then the church is all glorious, First. When it is full of the knowledge of God, and that is promised here; ver. 13, "all thy children shall be taught of the Lord." The church's children, being born of God, shall be taught of God; being his children by adoption, he will take care of their education. It was promised ver. 1, that the church's children shall be many; but, lest we should think that being many, as sometimes it happens in numerous families, they will be neglected, and not have instruction given them so carefully as if they were but few, God here takes that work into his own hands; they shall all be taught of the Lord, and none teacheth like him. 1*st.* It is a promise of the means of instruction, and those means authorized by a Divine institution; they shall be taught of God, that is, they shall be taught by those whom God shall appoint, and whose labours shall be under his direction and blessing. He will ordain the methods of instruction, and, by his word and ordinances, will diffuse a much greater light than the Old Testament church had. Care shall be taken for the teaching of the church's children, that knowledge may be transmitted from generation to generation, and that all may be enriched with it, from the least even to the greatest. 2*nd.* It is a promise of the Spirit of illumination. Our Saviour quotes it with application to gospel grace, and makes it to have its accomplishment in all those that were brought to believe in him, Jno. vi. 45; "It is written in the prophets, they shall be all taught of God;" from whence he infers, that those and those only come to him by faith that have "heard and learned of the Father," that are "taught by him as the truth is in Jesus," Eph. iv. 21. There shall be a plentiful effusion of the Spirit of grace upon Christians, to teach them all things, Jno. xiv. 26. Secondly. When the members of it live in love and unity among themselves; "Great shall be the peace of thy children." Peace may be taken here for all good; as where no knowledge of God is no good is to be expected, so those that are taught of God to know him are in a fair way to prosper for both worlds; great peace have they that know and love God's law, Ps. cxix. 165. But it is often put for love and unity, and so we may take it. All that are taught of God are taught to love one another, 1 Thes. iv. 9, and that will keep peace among the church's children, and prevent their falling out by the way. Thirdly. When holiness reigns, for that, above anything, is the beauty of the church, ver. 14; "In righteousness shalt thou be established." The reformation of manners, the reformation of purity, the due administration of public justice, and the prevailing of honesty and fair dealing among men, are the strength and stability of any church or state. The kingdom of God, set up by the Gospel of Christ, is not meat and drink, but this righteousness and peace, holiness and love.

2. Whereas now she lay in danger, God promiseth that which would be her protection and security. God engageth here that though, in the day of her distress, without were fightings and within were fears, now she should be safe from both.

1st. There shall be no fears within; ver. 14, "Thou shalt be far from oppression;" those that have oppressed thee shall be removed; those that would oppress thee shall be restrained, and therefore thou shalt not fear; but mayest look upon it as a thing at a mighty distance, that thou art now in no danger of. Thou shalt be far from terror; not only from evil, but from the fear of evil, for "it shall not come near thee," so as to do thee any hurt, or to put thee in any fright. Note, Those are far from terror that are far from oppression; for it is as great a terror as any other to a people to have the rod of government turned into the serpent of oppression, because against this there is no fence, nor flight from it.

2nd. There shall be no fightings without. Though attempts should be made upon them to insult them, to invade their country, or besiege their towns, they should all be in vain, and none of them succeed, ver. 15. It is granted, "they shall surely gather together" against thee; thou must expect it; the confederate force of hell and earth will be renewing their assaults. As long as there is a devil in hell, and a persecutor out of it, God's people must expect frequent alarms; but, (1.) God will not own them, will not give them either commission or countenance; They gather together, hand joins in hand, but it is not by me. God gave them no such order as he did to Sennacherib, to take the spoil, and take the prey, ch. x. 6; and therefore, (2.) Their attempt will end in their own ruin. "Whosoever shall gather together against thee," be they never so many, and never so mighty, they shall not only be baffled, but they "shall fall for thy sake," or, they shall fall before thee, which shall be the just punishment of their enmity to thee. God will make them to fall for the sake of the love he bears to his church, and the care he hath of it, in answer to the prayers made by his people, and in pursuance of the promises made to them: they shall fall, that thou mayest stand, Ps. xxvii. 2.

Now, that we may with the greatest assurance depend upon God for the safety of his church, we have here,

First. The power of God over the church's enemies asserted, ver. 16. The truth is, they have no power but what is given them from above, and he that gave them their power can limit and restrain them; hitherto they shall go, and no farther.

1*st.* They cannot carry on their design without arms and weapons of war; and the smith that makes those weapons is God's creature, and he gave him his skill to work in iron and brass, Ex. xxxi. 3, 4, and particularly to make proper instruments for warlike purposes. It is melancholy to think, as if men did not die fast enough of themselves, how ingenious and industrious they are to make instruments of death, and to find out ways and means to kill one another. The smith blows the coals in the fire, to make his iron malleable, to soften it first, that it may be hardened into steel, and so he may bring forth an instrument proper for their work that seek to destroy. It is the iron age that is the age of war. But God has created the smith, and therefore can tie his hands, so that the project of the enemy shall miscarry, as many a project has done, for want of arms and ammunition. Or, the smith that forges the weapons, is perhaps put here for the council of war that forms the design, blows the coals of contention, and brings forth the plan of the war; these can do no more than God will let them.

2*nd.* They cannot carry it on without men, they must have soldiers, and it is God that createth the waster to destroy. Military men value themselves upon their great offices and splendid titles, and even the common soldiers call themselves gentlemen, but God calls them wasters made to destroy, for wasting and destruction is their business. They think their own ingenuity, labour, and experience made them soldiers, but it was God that created them, and gave them strength and spirit for that hazardous employment, and therefore he not only can restrain them, but will serve his own purposes and designs by them.

Secondly. The promise of God concerning the church's safety solemnly laid down, as "the heritage of the servants of the Lord," ver. 17, as that which they may depend upon, and be confident of:—that God will protect them from their adversaries both in camps and courts.

1*st.* From their field adversaries, that think to destroy them by force, and violence, and dint of sword; "No weapon that is formed against thee," though never so artfully formed by the smith that blows the coals, ver. 16, though never so skilfully managed by the waster that seeketh to destroy, "shall prosper;" it shall not prove strong enough to do any harm to the people of God; it shall miss its mark, shall fall out of the hand, or perhaps recoil in the face of him that useth it against thee. It is the happiness of the church that no weapon formed against it shall prosper long, and therefore the folly of its enemies will at length be made manifest to all, for they are but preparing instruments of ruin for themselves.

2*nd.* From their law adversaries, that think to run them down, under colour of right and justice. When the weapons of war do not prosper, there are tongues that rise in judgment; both are included in the gates of hell, that seek to destroy the church, for they had their courts of justice, as well as their magazines and military stores, in their gates. The tongues that rise in judgment against the church are such as either demand a dominion over it, as if God's children were their lawful captives, pretending an authority to oppress their consciences, or such as misrepresent them, and falsely accuse them, and by slanders and calumnies endeavour to make them odious to the people, and obnoxious to the government. This the enemies of the Jews did to incense the kings of Persia against them, Ezr. iv. 12; Est. iii. 8. But these insulting, threatening tongues thou shalt condemn; thou shalt have wherewith to answer their insolent demands, and to put to silence their malicious reflections. Thou shalt do it by well-doing, 1 Pet. ii. 15; by doing that which will make thee manifest in the consciences even of thine adversaries, that thou art not what thou art represented to be. "Thou shalt condemn" them, that is, God shall condemn them for thee; "he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light," Ps. xxxvii. 6. Thou shalt condemn them as Noah condemned the old world that reproached him, by building the ark, and so saving his house in contempt of their contempts. The day is coming when God will reckon with wicked men for all their hard speeches which they have spoken against him, Jude 15.

The last words refer not only to this promise, but to all that go before: "This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord." God's servants are his sons, for he has provided an inheritance for them, rich, sure, and indefeasible; God's promises are their heritage for ever, Ps. cxix. 111. "And their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord." God will clear up the righteousness of their cause before men; it is with him, for he knows it; it is with him, for he will plead it. Or, their reward for their righteousness, and for all that which they have suffered unrighteously, is of God, that God who judgeth in the earth, and with whom verily there is a reward for the righteous. Or, their righteousness itself, all that in them that is good and right; it is of God, who works it in them; it is of Christ, who is made righteousness to them. Whoever God designs a heritage for hereafter, in them he will work righteousness now.

CHAPTER LV.

As we had much of Christ in ch. liii., and much of the church of Christ in ch. liv., so in this chapter we have much of the covenant of grace made with us in Christ. The sure mercies of David which are promised here, ver. 3, are understood by the apostle of the benefits which flow to us from the resurrection of Christ, Acts xiii. 34, which may serve as a key to this chapter; not but that it was intended for the comfort of the people of God that lived then, especially of the captives in Babylon, and other the dispersed of Israel; but unto us was this Gospel preached as well as unto them, and much more clearly and fully in the New Testament. Here is, I. A free and gracious invitation to all, to come and take the benefit of Gospel grace, ver. 1. II. Pressing arguments to enforce this invitation, ver. 2—4. III. A promise of the success of this invitation among the Gentiles, ver. 5. IV. An exhortation to repentance and reformation, with great encouragement given to hope for pardon and forgiveness thereupon, ver. 6—9. V. The ratification of all this, with the certain efficacy of the word of God, ver. 10, 11. And a particular instance of the accomplishment of it in the return of the Jews out of their captivity, which was intended for a sign of the accomplishment of all these other promises.

HO, every one that thirsteth,
Come ye to the waters,
And he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat;
Yea, come, buy wine and milk
Without money and without price.
2 Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread?
And your labour for that which satisfieth not?
Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good,
And let your soul delight itself in fatness.
3 Incline your ear, and come unto me:
Hear, and your soul shall live;
And I will make an everlasting covenant with you,
Even the sure mercies of David.
4 Behold, I have given him for a witness to the people,
A leader and commander to the people.
5 Behold, thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not,
And nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee
Because of the LORD thy God, [thee.
And for the Holy One of Israel; for he hath glorified

Here, First. We are all invited to come and take the benefit of that provision which the grace of God has made for poor souls in the new covenant, of that which is the "heritage of the servants of the Lord," ch. liv. 17, and not only their heritage hereafter, but their cup now, ver. 1. Observe,

1. Who are invited; "Ho, every one." Not the Jews only, to whom first the word of salvation was sent, but the Gentiles, the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind, are called to this marriage supper; whoever can be picked up out of the highways and the hedges. It intimates, that in Christ there is enough for all, and enough for each; that ministers are to make a general offer of life and salvation to all; that in gospel times the invitation should be more largely made than it had been, and should be sent to the Gentiles; and that the gospel covenant excludes none that do not exclude themselves. The invitation is published with an Oyez, "Ho," take notice of it; "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

2. What is the qualification required in those that shall be welcome; they must thirst. All shall be welcome to gospel grace, upon those terms only that gospel grace be welcome to them. Those that are satisfied with the world and its enjoyments for a portion, and seek not for a happiness in the favour of God,—those that depend upon the merit of their own works for a righteousness, and see no need they have of Christ and his righteousness,—these do not thirst; they have no sense of their need, are in no pain or uneasiness about their souls, and therefore will not condescend so far as to be beholden to Christ. But those that thirst are invited to the waters, as those that labour and are heavy laden are invited to Christ for rest. Note, Where God gives grace, he first gives to thirst after it; and where he has given to thirst after it, he will give it, Ps. lxxxi. 10.

3. Whither they are invited; "Come ye to the waters." Come to the water side, to the ports, and quays, and wharfs on the navigable rivers, into which goods are imported, thither come and buy, for that is the market-place of foreign commodities; and to us they would have been for ever foreign, if Christ had not brought in an everlasting righteousness. Come to Christ, for he is the fountain opened, he is the rock smitten. Come to holy ordinances, to those streams that make glad the city of our God; come to them, and though they may seem to you plain and common things, like waters, yet to those who believe in Christ the things signified will be as wine and milk, abundantly refreshing. Come to the healing waters, come to the living waters; whoever will, let him come and "take the water of life," Rev. xxii. 17. And our Saviour referred to it, Jno. vii. 37, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink."

4. What they are invited to do; 1st. Come and buy. Never did any tradesman court customers that he hopes to get by so as Christ courts us to that which we only are to be the gainers by; Come and buy, and we can assure you you shall have a good bargain, which you will never repent of, or lose by. Come and buy, that is, make it your own, by an application of the grace of the Gospel to yourselves; make it your own upon Christ's terms, nay, your own upon any terms, and stand not chaffering about the terms, or deliberating whether you shall agree to them. 2nd. Come and eat; make it still more your own, as that which we eat is more our own than that which we only buy. We must buy the truth; not that we may lay it by to be looked at, but that we may feed and feast upon it, and that the spiritual life may be nourished and strengthened by it. We must buy necessary provisions for our souls; be willing to part with any thing, though never so dear to us, so that we may but have Christ, and his graces and comforts; part with sin, because it is an opposition to Christ; part with all opinion of our own righteousness, as standing in competition with Christ; and part with life itself, and its most necessary supports, rather than quit our interest in Christ. And when we have bought what we need, let us not deny ourselves the comfortable use of it, but enjoy it, and eat the labour of our hands; "Buy, and eat."

5. What is the provision they are invited to; "Come, buy wine and milk," which will not only quench the thirst, fair water would do that, but nourish the body, and revive the spirits. The world comes short of our expectations; we promise ourselves at least water in it, but we are disappointed of that, as the troops of Tema, Job vi. 19. But Christ outdoes our expectations; we come to the waters, and would be glad of them, but we find there wine and milk, which were the staple commodities of the tribe of Judah, and which the Shiloh of that tribe is furnished with to entertain the gathering of the people to him, Gen. xlix. 10, 12. "His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk." We must come to Christ to have milk for babes, to nourish and cherish them that are but lately born again; and with him strong men shall find that which will be a cordial to them, they shall have wine to make glad their hearts. We must part with our puddle water, nay, with our poison, that we may procure this wine and milk.

6. The free communication of this provision; Buy it "without money, and without price." A strange way of buying, not only without ready money, that is common enough, but without any money, or the promise of any; yet it seems not so strange to those who have observed Christ's counsel to Laodicea, that was wretchedly poor, to come and buy, Rev. iii. 17, 18. Our buying without money intimates, 1st. That the gifts offered us are invaluable, and such as no price can be set upon: wisdom is that which cannot be gotten for gold. 2nd. That he who offers them has no need of us, or of any returns we can make him; he makes us these proposals, not because he has occasion to sell, but because he has a disposition to give. 3rd. That the things offered are already bought and paid for; Christ purchased them at the full value, with price, not with money, but his own blood, 1 Pet. i. 19. 4th. That we shall be welcome to the benefits of the promise, though we are utterly unworthy of them, and cannot make a tender of any thing that looks like a valuable consideration. We ourselves are not of any value, nor any thing we have, or can do; and we must own it, that if Christ and heaven be ours, we may see ourselves for ever indebted to free grace.

Secondly. We are earnestly pressed and persuaded (and O that we would be prevailed with!) to accept this invitation, and make this good bargain for ourselves.

1. That which we are persuaded to is to hearken to God and to his proposals; "Hearken diligently unto me," ver. 2. Not only give me the hearing, but approve of what I say, and apply it to yourselves, ver. 3. "Incline your ear," as we do to that which we find ourselves concerned in, and pleased with; bow the ear, and let the proud heart stoop to the humbling methods of the Gospel; bend the ear this way, that you may hear with attention and remark; hear "and come unto me," not only come and treat with me, but comply with me, come up to my terms. Accept God's offers, as very advantageous; answer his demands, as very fit and reasonable.

2. The arguments used to persuade us to this are taken,

1st. From the unspeakable wrong we do to ourselves if we neglect and refuse this invitation. "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread," which will not yield you, no, not beggar's food, dry bread, when with me you may have wine and milk without money; wherefore do you spend your labour and toil for that which will not be so much as dry bread to you, for it "satisfieth not." See here, First. The vanity of the things of this world; they are not bread, nor proper food for a soul, they afford no suitable nourishment or refreshment. Bread is the staff of the natural life, but it affords no support at all to the spiritual life. All the wealth and pleasure in the world will not make one meal's meat for a soul. Eternal truth and eternal good are the only food for a rational and immortal soul, the life of which consists in reconciliation and conformity to God, and in union and communion with him, which the things of the world will not at all befriend. They satisfy not, they yield not any solid comfort and content to the soul, nor enable it to say, Now I have what I would have; nay, they do not satisfy even the appetites of the body; the more men have, the more they would have, Eccl. i. 8. Haman was unsatisfied in the midst of his abundance. They flatter, but they do not fill; they please for a while, like the dream of a hungry man who wakes and his soul is empty. They soon surfeit, but they never satisfy; cloy a man, but not content him, or make him truly easy. It is all vanity and vexation. Secondly. The folly of the children of this world; they spend their money and labour for these uncertain, unsatisfying things. Rich people live by their money, poor people by their labour, but both mistake their true interest; while the one is trading, the other toiling, for the world, both promising themselves satisfaction and happiness in it, but both miserably disappointed, God vouchsafes compassionately to reason with them: Wherefore do you thus act against your own interest? Why do you suffer yourselves to be thus imposed upon? Let us reason thus with ourselves, and let the result of these reasonings be a holy resolution not to labour for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endures to everlasting life, Jno. vi. 27. Let all the disappointments we meet with in the world help to drive us to Christ, and to seek for satisfaction in him only. This is the way to make that sure that will be made sure.

2nd. From the unspeakable kindness we do to ourselves if we accept this invitation, and comply with it. First. Hereby we secure to ourselves present pleasure and satisfaction. If you hearken to Christ, you eat that which is good, which is both wholesome and pleasant, good in itself and good for you. God's good word and promise, a good conscience, and the comforts of God's good Spirit, are a continual feast to those that hearken diligently and obediently to Christ. Their souls shall delight themselves in fatness, that is, in the richest and most grateful delights. Here the invitation is not, Come and buy, lest that should discourage, but, Come and eat; come and entertain yourselves with that which will be abundantly pleasing: "Eat, O friends." It is sad to think that men should need to be courted thus to their own bliss. Secondly. Hereby we secure to ourselves lasting happiness; "Hear, and your soul shall live;" you shall not only be saved from perishing eternally, but you shall be eternally blessed, for less than that cannot be the life of an immortal soul. The words of Christ are spirit and life, life to spirits, Jno. vi. 33, 63, the words of this life, Acts v. 20. On what easy terms is happiness offered us! it is but, Hear, and you shall live. Thirdly. The great God graciously secures all this to us: Come to me, and "I will make an everlasting covenant with you," will put myself into covenant relations, and under covenant engagements to you, and thereby settle upon you the "sure mercies of David." Note, 1st. If we come to God to serve him, he will covenant with us to do us good, and make us happy; such is his condescension to us and concern for us. 2nd. God's covenant with us is an everlasting covenant, its contrivance from everlasting, its continuance to everlasting. 3rd. The benefits of this covenant are mercies suited to our case, who being miserable, are the proper objects of mercy; they come from God's mercy, and are ordered every way in kindness to us. 4th. They are the mercies of David, such mercies as God promised to David, Ps. lxxxix. 28, 29, &c., which are called the mercies of David his servant, and are appealed to by Solomon, 2 Chr. vi. 42. It shall be a covenant as sure as that with David, Jer. xxxiii. 25, 26. The covenant of royalty was a figure of the covenant of grace, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Or, rather, by David here we are to understand the Messiah. Covenant mercies are all his mercies; they are purchased by him, they are promised in him, they are treasured up in his hand, and out of his hand they are dispensed to us; he is the mediator and trustee of the covenant; to him this is applied, Acts xiii. 34. They are the τὰ ὅσια, 'the holy things' of David, (the word used there, and by the Seventy here,) for they are confirmed by the holiness of God, Ps. lxxxix. 35, and are intended to advance holiness among men. 5th. They are sure mercies; the covenant being well ordered in all things is sure. It is sure in the general proposal of it; God is real and sincere, serious and in earnest, in the offer of these mercies. It is sure in the particular application of it to believers; God's gifts and callings are without repentance; they are the "mercies of David," and therefore sure, for in Christ the promises are all Yea and Amen.

Thirdly. Jesus Christ is promised for the making good of all the other promises which we are here invited to accept of, ver. 4. He is that David whose sure mercies all the blessings and benefits of the covenant are. And God hath given him in his purpose and promise, hath constituted and appointed him, and in the fulness of time will as surely send him as if he were already come, to be all that to us which is necessary to our having the benefit of these preparations. He has given him freely, for what more free than gift? There was nothing in us to merit such a favour, but Christ is the gift of God. We want one, 1. To attest the truth of the promises which we are invited to take the benefit of; and Christ is given for a witness that God is willing to receive us into his favour upon gospel terms, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers, that we may venture our souls upon those promises with an entire satisfaction. Christ is a faithful witness, we may take his word; a competent witness, for he lay in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and was perfectly apprised of the whole matter. Christ as a prophet testifies the will of God to the world, and to believe is to receive his testimony. 2. To assist us in closing with the invitation, and coming up to the terms of it. We know not how to find the way to the waters where we are to be supplied, but Christ is given to be a leader; nor what to do that we may be qualified for it, and sharers in it, but he is given for a commander, to shew us what to do, and enable us to do it. Much difficulty and opposition lies in our way to Christ; we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, but to animate us for the conflict we have a good captain, like Joshua; a leader and commander to tread our enemies under our feet, and to put us in possession of the land of promise. Christ is commander by his precept, and a leader by his example; our business is to obey him, and follow him.

Fourthly. The master of the feast being fixed, it is next to be furnished with guests, for the provision shall not be lost, or made in vain, ver. 5. 1. The Gentiles shall be called to this feast, shall be invited out of the highways and the hedges. "Thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not," that is, that was not formerly called and owned as thy nation; that thou didst not send prophets to as to Israel, that people which God knew above all the families of the earth. The Gentiles shall now be favoured so as they never were before; their knowing God is said to be rather their being "known of God," Gal. iv. 9. 2. They shall come at the call; "Nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee." Those that had long been afar off from Christ shall be made nigh; that had been running from him shall run to him with the greatest speed and alacrity imaginable. There shall be a concourse of believing Gentiles to Christ, who, being lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to him. Now see the reason, 1st. Why the Gentiles will thus flock to Christ. It is because of the Lord his God, because he is the Son of God, and is declared to be so with power; because they now see his God is one with whom they have to do, and there is no coming to him as their God but by making an interest in his Son. Those that are brought to be acquainted with God, and understand how the concern lies between them and him, cannot but run to Jesus Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, and there is no coming to God but by him. 2nd. Why God will bring them to him. Because he is the Holy One of Israel, true to his promises, and he hath promised to glorify him, by giving him the heathen for his inheritance. When Greeks began to inquire after Christ, he said, "The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified," Jno. xii. 22, 23. And his being glorified in his resurrection and ascension was the great argument by which multitudes were wrought upon to run to him.

6 Seek ye the LORD while he may be found,
Call ye upon him while he is near:
7 Let the wicked forsake his way,
And the unrighteous man his thoughts:
And let him return unto the LORD, and he will have mercy upon him;
And to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.
8 For my thoughts are not your thoughts,
Neither are your ways my ways, saith the LORD.
9 For as the heavens are higher than the earth,
So are my ways higher than your ways,
And my thoughts than your thoughts.
10 For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven,
And returneth not thither,
But watereth the earth,
And maketh it bring forth and bud,
That it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater:
11 So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth:
It shall not return unto me void,
But it shall accomplish that which I please,
And it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.
12 For ye shall go out with joy,
And be led forth with peace: [into singing,
The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you
And all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.
13 Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree,
And instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree:
And it shall be to the LORD for a name,
For an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.

We have here a farther account of that covenant of grace which is made with us in Jesus Christ, both what is required and what is promised in the covenant, and those considerations that are sufficient abundantly to confirm our believing compliance with and reliance on that covenant. And this gracious discovery of God's good will to the children of men is not to be confined either to the Jew or to the Gentile, to the Old Testament or to the New, much less to the captives in Babylon. No, both the precepts and the promises here are given to all, to every one that thirsts after happiness, ver. 1. And who doth not? Hear this and live.

First. Here is a gracious offer made of pardon, and peace, and all happiness, to poor sinners, upon gospel terms, ver. 6, 7.

1. Let them pray, and their prayers shall be heard and answered; ver. 6, "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found." Seek him whom you have left by revolting from your allegiance to him; and whom you have lost by provoking him to withdraw his favour from you. "Call upon him" now "while he is near," and within call. Observe here, 1st. The duties required. First. Seek the Lord, seek to him, and inquire of him as your oracle; "ask the law at his mouth." "What wilt thou have me to do?" Seek for him, and inquire after him as your portion and happiness; seek to be reconciled to him, and acquainted with him, and to be happy in his favour. Be sorry that you have lost him, be solicitous to find him; take the appointed method of finding him, making use of Christ as your way, the Spirit as your guide, and the word as your rule. Secondly. Call upon him, pray to him to be reconciled, and, being reconciled, pray to him for every thing else you have need of. 2nd. The motives made use of to press these duties upon us; "While he may be found, while he is near." First. It is implied that now God is near, and will be found, so that it shall not be in vain to seek him, and to call upon him. Now his patience is waiting on us, his word is calling to us, and his Spirit striving with us; now improve your advantages and opportunities, for "now is the accepted time." But, Secondly. There is a day coming when he will be afar off, and will not be found; when the day of his patience is over, and his Spirit will strive no more. There may come such a time in this life, when the heart is incurably hardened; however, at death and judgment the door will be shut, Lu. xvi. 26; xiii. 25, 26. Mercy is now offered, but then judgment without mercy will take place.

2. Let them repent and reform, and their sins shall be pardoned, ver. 7. Here is a call to the unconverted, to the wicked, and the unrighteous man; to the wicked that live in known gross sins, to the unrighteous that live in the neglect of plain duties; to them is the word of this salvation sent, and all the assurance given that can be, that penitent sinners shall find God a pardoning God. Observe here, 1st. What it is to repent. There are two things in it: First. It is to turn from sin, it is to forsake it; it is to leave it, and to leave it with loathing and abhorrence, never to return to it again. The wicked must forsake his way, his evil way, as one would forsake a false way that will never bring us to the happiness we aim at; and a dangerous way, that leads to destruction. Let him not take one step more in that way. Nay, there must be not only a change of the way, but a change of the mind; the unrighteous must forsake his thoughts; repentance, if it be true, strikes at the root, and washeth the heart from wickedness. We must alter our judgments concerning persons and things, dislodge the corrupt imaginations, and quit the vain pretences which an unsanctified heart shelters itself with. Note, It is not enough to break off from evil practices, but we must enter a caveat against evil thoughts. Yet this is not all. Secondly. To repent is to return to the Lord; to return to him as our God; return to him as to our sovereign Lord, against whom we have rebelled, and to whom we are concerned to reconcile ourselves; as to the fountain of life and living waters, which we had forsaken for broken cisterns. 2nd. What encouragement we have thus to repent. If we do so, First. God will have mercy; he will not deal with us as our sins have deserved, but will have compassion on us. Misery is the object of mercy. Now, both the consequences of sin, by which we are become truly miserable, Eze. xvi. 5, 6, and the nature of repentance, by which we are made sensible of our misery, and are brought to bemoan ourselves, Jer. xxxi. 18, both make us objects of pity, and with God there are tender mercies. Secondly. "He will abundantly pardon." He will 'multiply to pardon,' so the word is, as we have multiplied to offend. Though our sins have been very great, and very many; and though we have often backslidden, and are still prone to offend, yet God will repeat his pardon, and welcome even backsliding children that return to him in sincerity.

Secondly. Here are encouragements given us to accept this offer, and to venture our souls upon it; for, look which way we will, we find enough to confirm us in our belief of the validity and value of it.

1. If we look up to heaven, we find God's counsels there high and transcendent, his thoughts and ways infinitely above ours, ver. 8, 9. The wicked are told to forsake their evil ways and thoughts, (ver. 7,) and to return to God; that is, to bring their ways and thoughts to concur and comply with his, for, saith he, My thoughts and ways are not as yours; yours are conversant only about things beneath, they are of the earth, earthy; but mine are above, as the heaven is high above the earth; and if you would approve yourselves true penitents, yours must be so too, and your affections be set on things above. Or rather, it is to be understood as an encouragement to us to depend upon God's promise to pardon sin upon repentance. Sinners may be ready to fear that God will not be reconciled to them, because they could not find in their hearts to be reconciled to one that had so basely and so frequently offended them; but, saith God, My thoughts in this matter are not as yours, but as far above them as heaven above the earth. They are so in other things. Men's sentiments concerning sin, and Christ, and holiness, concerning this world and the other, are vastly different from God's; but in nothing more than in the matter of reconciliation. We think God apt to take offence, and backward to forgive; that if he forgives once he will not forgive a second time. Peter thought it a great deal to forgive seven times, Mat. xviii. 21. A hundred pence goes far with us, but God meets returning sinners with pardoning mercy; he forgives freely, and as he gives: it is without upbraiding. We forgive, and cannot forget; but when God forgives sin he remembers it no more. Thus God invites sinners to return to him, by possessing them with good thoughts of him, as Jer. xxxi. 20.

2. If we look down to this earth, we find God's word there, powerful and effectual, and answering all its great intentions, ver. 10, 11. Observe here,

1st. The efficacy of God's word in the kingdom of nature; "He saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth," appoints when it shall come, to what degree, and how long it shall lie there; he saith so to "the small rain and the great rain of his strength," Job xxxvii. 6; and, according to his order, they come down from heaven, and do "whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the world, whether it be for correction, or for his land, or for mercy," as it follows here, ver. 12, 13. It returneth not re infecta,—'without having accomplished its end,' but watereth the earth, which he is therefore said to do from his chambers, Ps. civ. 13. And the watering of the earth is in order to its fruitfulness; thus he "maketh it to bring forth and bud," for the products of the earth depend upon the dews of heaven; and thus it gives not only bread to the eater, present maintenance to the owner and his family, but seed likewise to the sower, that he may have food for another year. The husbandman must be a sower as well as an eater, else he will soon see the end of what he has.

2nd. The efficacy of his word in the kingdom of providence and grace, which is as certain as the former; "So shall my word be," as powerful in the mouth of prophets as it is in the hand of Providence; "it shall not return unto me void," as unable to effect what it was sent for, or meeting with an insuperable opposition; no, "it shall accomplish that which I please," for it is the declaration of his will, according to the counsel of which he worketh all things, "and it shall prosper in the thing for which I sent it." This assures us, First. That the promises of God shall all have their full accomplishment in due time, and not one iota or tittle of them shall fail, 1 Kin. viii. 56. These promises of mercy and grace shall have as real an effect upon the souls of believers, for their sanctification and comfort, as ever the rain had upon the earth to make it fruitful. Secondly. That, according to the different errands on which the word is sent, it will have its different effects; if it be not a savour of life unto life it will be a savour of death unto death. If it doth not convince the conscience, and soften the heart, it will sear the conscience, and harden the heart; if it do not ripen for heaven, it will ripen for hell: see ch. vi. 9. One way or other it will take effect. Thirdly. That Christ's coming into the world, as the dew from heaven, (Hos. xiv. 5,) will not be in vain. For if Israel is not gathered, he will be glorious in the conversion of the Gentiles; to them, therefore, the tenders of grace must be made, when the Jews refuse them, that the wedding may be furnished with guests, and the Gospel not return void.

3. If we take a special view of the church, we shall find what great things God hath done and will do for it; ver. 12, 13, "Ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace." This refers, 1st. To the deliverance and return of the Jews out of Babylon; they shall go out of their captivity, and be led forth towards their own land again. God will go before them as surely, though not as sensibly, as before their fathers in the pillar of cloud and fire. They shall go out, not with trembling, but with triumph; not with any regret to part with Babylon, or any fear of being fetched back, but with joy and peace. Their journey home over the mountains shall be pleasant, and they shall have the good will and good wishes of all the countries they pass through. The hills and their inhabitants shall, as in a transport of joy, break forth into singing; and, if the people should altogether hold their peace, even the trees of the field would attend them with their applauses and acclamations. And when they come to their own land, it shall be ready to bid them welcome; for whereas they expected to find it all overgrown with briars and thorns, it shall be set with fir-trees and myrtle-trees; for, though it lay desolate, yet it enjoyed its sabbaths, Lev. xxvi. 34, which when they were over, like the land after the sabbatical year, it was the better for. And this shall redound much to the honour of God, and be to him for a name. But, 2nd. Without doubt it looks farther, this shall be "for an everlasting sign;" that is, First. The redemption of the Jews out of Babylon shall be a ratification of those promises that relate to gospel times. The accomplishment of the predictions relating to that great deliverance would be a pledge and earnest of the performance of all the other promises, for thereby it shall appear that "he is faithful who hath promised." Secondly. It shall be a representation of the blessings promised, and a type and figure of them. 1st. Gospel grace will set those at liberty that were in bondage to sin and Satan. They shall go out, and be led forth; Christ shall make them free, and then they shall be free indeed. 2nd. It will fill those with joy that were melancholy; Ps. xiv. 7, "Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad." The earth, and the inferior part of the creation, shall share in the joy of this salvation, Ps. xcvi. 11, 12. 3rd. It will make a great change in men's characters. Those that were as thorns and briars, good for nothing but the fire, nay, hurtful and vexatious, shall become graceful and useful as the fir-tree and the myrtle-tree. Thorns and briars came in with sin, and were the fruits of the curse, Gen. iii. 18; the raising of pleasant trees in the room of them, signifies the removal of the curse of the law, and the introduction of gospel blessings. The church's enemies were as thorns and briars, but instead of them God will raise up friends to be her protection and ornament. Or, it may note the world's growing better; instead of a generation of thorns and briars, there shall come up a generation of fir-trees and myrtles; the children shall be wiser and better than the parents. And, lastly, in all this God shall be glorified; "It shall be to him for a name," by which he will be made known and praised, and by it the people of God shall be encouraged. It shall be "for an everlasting sign" of God's favour to them, assuring them that, though it may for a time be clouded, it shall never be cut off. The covenant of grace is an everlasting covenant, for the present blessings of it are signs of everlasting ones.

CHAPTER LVI.

After the exceeding great and precious promises of gospel grace, typified by temporal deliverances, which we had in the foregoing chapter, we have here, I. A solemn charge given to us all to make conscience of our duty, as we hope to have the benefit of those promises, ver. 1, 2. II. Great encouragement given to strangers that were willing to come under the bonds of the covenant, assuring them of the blessings of the covenant, ver. 3—8. III. A high charge drawn up against the watchmen of Israel that were careless and unfaithful in the discharge of their duty, ver. 9—12; which seems to be the beginning of a new sermon, by way of reproof and threatening, which is continued in the following chapters. And the word of God was intended for conviction, as well as for comfort and instruction in righteousness.

THUS saith the LORD,
Keep ye judgment, and do justice:
For my salvation is near to come,
And my righteousness to be revealed.
2 Blessed is the man that doeth this,
And the son of man that layeth hold on it;
That keepeth the sabbath from polluting it,
And keepeth his hand from doing any evil.

The scope of these verses is to shew that when God is coming towards us in a way of mercy we must go forth to meet him in a way of duty.

First. God here tells us what are his intentions of mercy to us; ver. 1, "My salvation is near to come." The great salvation wrought out by Jesus Christ, (for that was the salvation of which "the prophets inquired and searched diligently," 1 Pet. i. 10,) typified by the salvation of the Jews from Sennacherib, or out of Babylon. Observe, 1. The Gospel salvation is the salvation of the Lord; it was contrived and brought about by him, he glories in it as his. 2. In that salvation God's righteousness is revealed, which is so much the beauty of the Gospel that St. Paul makes this the ground of his glorying in it, Rom. i. 17, "Because therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith." The law revealed that righteousness of God by which all sinners stand condemned, but the Gospel reveals that by which all believers stand acquitted. 3. The Old Testament saints saw this salvation coming, and drawing near to them, long before it came; and they had notice by the prophets of its approach. As Daniel understood by Jeremiah's books the approach of the redemption out of Babylon at the end of seventy years, so others understood by Daniel's books the approach of our redemption by Christ at the end of seventy weeks of years.

Secondly. He tells us what are his expectations of duty from us in consideration thereof. Say not, We see the salvation near, and therefore we may live as we list, for there is no danger now of missing it, or coming short of it,—that is turning the grace of God into wantonness; but, on the contrary, when the salvation is near double your guard against sin. Note, The fuller assurances God gives us of the performance of his promises the stronger obligations he lays us under to obedience. Now the salvation here spoken of is come; yet, there being still a farther salvation in view, the apostle presseth duty upon us Christians with the same argument, Rom. xiii. 11, "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed." That which is here required to qualify and prepare us for the approaching salvation is,

1. That we be honest and just in all our dealings. "Keep ye judgment, and do justice;" walk by rule, make conscience of what ye say and do, that you do no wrong to any; render to all their due exactly, and in exacting what is due to you keep up a court of equity in your own bosom, to moderate the rigours of the law. Be ruled by that golden rule of doing as you would be done by. Magistrates must administer justice wisely and faithfully. This is required to evidence the sincerity of our faith and repentance, and to open the way of mercy. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." God is true to us, let us be so to one another.

2. That we religiously observe the sabbath day, ver. 2. We are not just if we rob God of his time. Sabbath sanctification is here put for all the duties of the first table, the fruit of our love to God, as justice and judgment for all those of the second table, the fruits of our love to our neighbour. Observe, 1st. The duty required, which is to keep the sabbath; to keep it as a talent we are to trade with, as a treasure we are intrusted with; keep it holy, keep it safe, keep it with care and caution, keep it from polluting it; allow neither yourselves nor others either to violate the holy rest nor omit the holy work of that day. If this be intended primarily for the Jews in Babylon, it was fit they should be particularly put in mind of this; because, when by reason of their distance from the temple they could not observe the other institutions of their law, yet they might distinguish themselves from the heathen by putting a difference between God's day and other days; but it being required more generally of man, and the son of man, it intimates that sabbath sanctification should be a duty in gospel times, when the bounds of the church should be enlarged, and other rites and ceremonies abolished. Observe, Those that would keep the sabbath from polluting it must put on resolution; must not only do this, but lay hold on it, for sabbath time is precious; but it is very apt to slip away if we take not great care; and therefore we must lay hold on it, and keep our hold; must do it, and persevere in it. 2nd. The encouragement we have to do this duty; Blessed is he that doeth it. The way to have the blessing of God upon our employments all the week is to make conscience and make a business of sabbath sanctification; and in doing so we shall be the better qualified to do judgment and justice. The more godliness the more honesty, 1 Tim. ii. 2.

3. That we have nothing to do with sin. Blessed is the man that keepeth his hand from doing evil; any wrong to his neighbour, in body, goods, or good name; or, more generally, any thing that is displeasing to God, and hurtful to his own soul. Note, The best evidence of our having kept the sabbath well will be a care to keep a good conscience all the week. By this it will appear we have been in the mount with God, if our faces shine in a holy conversation before men.

3 Neither let the son of the stranger, that hath joined himself to the LORD, speak, [people:
Saying, The LORD hath utterly separated me from his Neither let the eunuch say, Behold, I am a dry tree.
4 For thus saith the LORD unto the eunuchs
That keep my sabbaths,
And choose the things that please me,
And take hold of my covenant;
5 Even unto them will I give in mine house
And within my walls a place and a name
Better than of sons and of daughters:
I will give them an everlasting name,
That shall not be cut off. [LORD,
6 Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the
To serve him, and to love the name of the LORD,
To be his servants,
Every one that keepeth the sabbath from polluting it,
And taketh hold of my covenant;
7 Even them will I bring to my holy mountain,
And make them joyful in my house of prayer:
Their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted
upon mine altar;
For mine house shall be called an house of prayer unto all people. [saith,
8 The Lord GOD which gathereth the outcasts of Israel
Yet will I gather others to him,
Beside those that are gathered unto him.

The prophet is here, in God's name, encouraging those that were hearty in joining themselves to God, and yet laboured under great discouragements.

First. Some were discouraged because they were not of the seed of Abraham. They had joined themselves to the Lord, had bound their souls with a bond to be his for ever. This is the root and life of religion, to break off from the world and the flesh, and devote ourselves entirely to the service and honour of God; but they questioned whether God would accept of them, because they were of the sons of the stranger, ver. 3. They were Gentiles that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and aliens to the covenants of promise; and therefore feared they had no part or lot in the matter. They said, "The Lord hath utterly separated me from his people," and will not own me as one of them, nor admit me to their privileges. It was often said that there should "be one law for the stranger and for him that was born in the land," Ex. xii. 49, and yet they may make this melancholy conclusion. Note, Unbelief many times suggests things to the discouragement of good people which are directly contrary to what God himself hath said; things which he hath expressly guarded against. Let not the sons of the stranger therefore say thus, for they have no reason to say it. Note, Ministers must have answers ready to the disquieting fears and jealousies of weak Christians; which, how unreasonable soever, they must take notice of.

Secondly. Others were discouraged because they were not fathers in Israel. The eunuch said, "Behold, I am a dry tree;" so he looked upon himself, and it was his grief; so others looked upon him, and it was his reproach. He was thought to be of no use, because he had no children, nor was ever likely to have any. This was then the more grievous, because eunuchs were not admitted to be priests, Lev. xxi. 20, nor to enter into the congregation, Deu. xxiii. 1; and because the promise of a numerous posterity was the particular blessing of Israel, and the more valuable because from among them the Messiah was to come. Yet God would not have the eunuchs to make the worst of their case, nor to think that they should be excluded from the gospel church, and from being spiritual priests, because they were shut out from the congregation of Israel, and the Levitical priesthood. No; as the taking down of the partition wall (contained in ordinances) admitted the Gentiles, so it let in likewise those that had been kept out by ceremonial pollutions. Yet, by the reply here given to this suggestion it should seem the chief thing which the eunuch laments in his case is his being written childless. Now, suitable encouragements are given to each of these.

1. To those that have no children of their own, that, though they had the honour to be the children of the church and the covenant themselves, yet had none to whom they might transmit that honour; none to receive the sign of circumcision, and the privileges secured by that sign. Now observe, 1st. What a good character they have, though they lie under this ignominy and affliction; and those only are entitled to the following comforts who in some measure answer these characters. First. They keep God's sabbaths as he hath appointed them to be kept. In the primitive times, if a Christian were asked, 'Hast thou kept holy the Lord's day?' he would readily answer, 'I am a Christian, and dare not do otherwise.' Secondly. In their whole conversation they choose those things that please God. They do that which is good; they do it with a sincere design to please God in it; they do it of choice, and with delight. And if sometimes through infirmity they come short of doing that which pleased God, yet they choose it, they endeavour it, and aim at it. Note, Whatever is God's pleasure should, without dispute, be our choice. Thirdly. They take hold of his covenant, and that is a thing that pleaseth God as much as any thing. The covenant of grace is proposed and proffered to us in the Gospel; to take hold on it, is to consent to it, to accept the offer, and come up to the terms, deliberately and sincerely to take God to be to us a God, and to give up ourselves to him, to be to him a people. Taking hold of the covenant notes an entire and resolute consent to it; taking hold, as those that are afraid of coming short; catching at it as a good bargain, and as those that are resolved never to let it go, for it is our life; and we take hold of it as a criminal took hold of the horns of the altar to which he fled for refuge. 2nd. What a great deal of comfort they may have if they answer this character, though they are not built up into families; ver. 5, "Unto them will I give a better place and name." It is supposed that there is a place and a name, which we have from sons and daughters, that is valuable and desirable. It is a pleasing notion we have that we live in our children when we are dead. But there is a better place, and a better name, which those have that are in covenant with God, and it is sufficient to balance the want of that. A place, and a name, rest, and reputation; a place to live comfortably in themselves, and a name to live creditably with among their neighbours; they shall be happy, and may be easy both at home and abroad. Though they have not children to be the music of their house, or arrows in their quiver, to keep them in countenance when they speak with their enemies in the gate, yet they shall have a place and a name more than equivalent. For, First. God will give it them, will give it them by promise; he will himself be both their habitation and their glory, their place and their name. Secondly. He will give it them in his house, and within his walls; there they shall have a place, shall be planted so as to take root, Ps. xcii. 13; shall dwell all the days of their life, Ps. xxvii. 4. They shall be at home in communion with God, as Anna, that departed not from the temple night or day. There they shall have a name. A name for good things with God and good people is "a name better than that of sons and daughters." Our relation to God, our interest in Christ, our title to the blessings of the covenant, and our hopes of eternal life, are things that give us in God's house a blessed place and a blessed name. Thirdly. It shall be an everlasting name, that shall never be extinct, shall never be cut off; like the place and name of angels, who therefore marry not because they die not. Spiritual blessings are unspeakably better than those of sons and daughters; for children are a certain care, and may prove the greatest grief and shame of a man's life; but the blessings we partake of in God's house are a sure and constant joy and honour, comforts which cannot be embittered.

2. To those that are themselves the children of strangers.

1st. It is here promised that they shall now be welcome to the church, ver. 6, 7. When God's Israel come out of Babylon, let them bring as many of their neighbours along with them as they can persuade to come, and God will find room enough for them all in his house. And here, as before, we may observe,

First. Upon what terms they shall be welcome. Let them know that God's Israel, when they come out of Babylon, will not be plagued as they were when they came out of Egypt with a mixed multitude that went with them, but were not cordially for them; no, the sons of the stranger shall have a place and a name in God's house, provided, 1*st.* That they forsake other gods, all rivals and pretenders whatsoever, and "join themselves to the Lord," so as to become one spirit, 1 Cor. vi. 17. 2*nd.* That they join themselves to him, as subjects to their prince, and soldiers to their general, by an oath of fidelity and obedience to serve him, not occasionally, as one would serve a turn, but to be constantly his servant, entirely subject to his command, and devoted to his interest. 3*rd.* That they join themselves to him as friends to his honour, and the interests of his kingdom in the world, "to love the name of the Lord," to be well pleased with all the discoveries he hath made of himself, and all the memorials they make of him. Observe, Serving him and loving him go together; for those that love him truly will serve him faithfully; and that obedience is most acceptable to him which flows from a principle of love, as well as most pleasant to us; for then "his commandments are not grievous," 1 Jno. v. 3. 4*th.* That they "keep the sabbath from polluting it;" for "the stranger that is within thy gates" is particularly required to do that. 5*th.* That "they take hold of the covenant;" that is, that they come under the bonds of it, and put in for the benefits of it.

Secondly. To what privileges they shall be welcome, ver. 7. Three things are here promised them in their coming to God: 1*st.* Assistance. "I will bring them to my holy mountain;" not only bid them welcome when they come, but incline them to come; will shew them the way, and lead them in it. David himself prays that God, by his light and truth, would bring him to his holy hill, Ps. xliii. 4. And the sons of the stranger shall be under the same conduct. The church is God's holy hill, on which he hath set his King; and in bringing them to Zion hill he brings them to be subjects to Zion's King, as well as worshippers in Zion's holy temple. 2*nd.* Acceptance. "Their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted on mine altar;" and be never the less acceptable for being theirs, though they are sons of the stranger. The prayers and praises (these spiritual sacrifices) of devout Gentiles shall be as pleasing to God as those of the pious Jews, and no difference shall be made between them; for though they are Gentiles by birth, yet, through grace, they shall be looked upon as the believing seed of faithful Abraham, and the praying seed of wrestling Jacob; for "in Christ Jesus there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision." 3*rd.* Comfort. They shall not only be accepted, but they themselves shall have the pleasure of it; "I will make them joyful in my house of prayer." They shall have grace not only to serve God, but to serve him cheerfully and with gladness; and that shall make the service the more acceptable to him; for when we sing in the ways of the Lord, then great is the glory of our God. They shall go away and eat their bread with joy, because God now accepteth their works, Eccl. ix. 7. Nay, though they came mourning to the house of prayer, they shall go away rejoicing, for they shall there find such ease by casting their cares and burthens upon God, and referring themselves to him, that, like Hannah, they shall go away, and their countenance shall be no more sad. Many a sorrowful spirit has been made joyful in the house of prayer.

2nd. It is here promised that multitudes of the Gentiles shall come to the church; not only those few that come dropping in shall be bid welcome, but that great numbers shall come in, and the door be thrown open to them; "My house shall be called a house of prayer for all people." The temple was then God's house, and to that Christ applies these words, Mat. xxi. 13; but with an eye to it as a type of the gospel church, Heb. ix. 8, 9; for Christ calls it his house, Heb. iii. 6. Now, concerning this house it is promised, First. That it shall not be a house of sacrifice, but a house of prayer. The religious meetings of God's people shall be meetings for prayer; in which they shall join together as a token of their united faith and mutual love. Secondly. That it shall be a house of prayer, not for the people of the Jews only, but for all people. This was fulfilled when Peter was made, not only to perceive it himself, but to tell it the world, that "in every nation he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him," Acts x. 35. It had been declared again and again that "the stranger that comes nigh shall be put to death;" but Gentiles shall now be looked upon no longer as strangers and foreigners, Eph. ii. 19. And it appears, by Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, both that it was primarily intended for a house of prayer and that strangers should be welcome to it, 1 Kin. viii. 30, 41.

And it is intimated here, ver. 8, that when the Gentiles are called in they shall be incorporated into one body with the Jews, that, as Christ saith, Jno. x. 16, "there may be one fold, and one shepherd;" for, 1*st.* God "will gather the outcasts of Israel." Many of the Jews that had by their unbelief cast themselves out shall by faith be brought in again, "a remnant according to the election of grace," Rom. xi. 5. Christ came "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," Mat. xv. 24, to gather their outcasts, Ps. cxlvii. 2, and restore their preserved, ch. xlix. 6, and to be their glory, Lu. ii. 32. 2*nd.* He will gather others also to him, besides his own outcasts that are gathered to him; or, though some of the Gentiles have come over now and then into the church, that shall not serve, as some may think, to answer the extent of these promises; no, there are still more and more to be brought in; I will gather others to him besides these; these are but the firstfruits, in comparison with the harvest that shall be gathered for Christ in the nations of the earth, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in. Note, The church is a growing body; when some are gathered to it, yet still we may hope there shall be more, till the mystical body be completed: "Other sheep I have."

9 All ye beasts of the field, come to devour,
Yea, all ye beasts in the forest.
10 His watchmen are blind: they are all ignorant,
They are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark;
Sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber.
11 Yea, they are greedy dogs which can never have enough,
And they are shepherds that cannot understand:
They all look to their own way,
Every one for his gain, from his quarter.
12 Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine,
And we will fill ourselves with strong drink;
And to morrow shall be as this day,
And much more abundant.

From words of comfort the prophet here, by a very sudden change of his style, passeth to words of reproof and conviction, and goes on in that strain, for the most part, in the three following chapters; and therefore some here begin a new sermon. He had assured the people that in due time God would deliver them out of captivity; which was designed for the comfort of those that should live when God would do this. Now here he shews what their sins and provocations were, for which God would send them into captivity; and this was designed for the conviction of those that lived in his own time, near a hundred years before the captivity, who were now filling up the measure of the nation's sin; and to justify God in what he brought upon them. God will lay them waste by the fierceness of their enemies, for the falseness of their friends.

First. Desolating judgments are here summoned up, ver. 9. The sheep of God's pasture are now to be made the sheep of his slaughter, to fall as victims to his justice; and therefore the beasts of the field and the forest are called to come and devour. They are beasts of prey, and do it from their own ravenous disposition; but God permits them to do it, nay, he employs them as his servants in doing it; the ministers of his justice, though they "mean not so, neither doth their heart think so." If this refers primarily to the descent made upon them by the Babylonians, and their devouring of them, yet it may look farther to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans, after these outcasts of them, mentioned ver. 8, were gathered into the Christian church. The Roman armies came upon them as beasts of the forest to devour them, and they quite took away their place and nation. Note, When God has bloody work to do he has beasts of prey within call to be employed in doing it.

Secondly. The reason of these judgments is here given. The shepherds that should have been the watchmen of the flock, to discover the approaches of the beasts of prey, to keep them off and protect the sheep, were treacherous and careless, minded not their business, nor made any conscience of the trust reposed in them, and so they became an easy prey to the wild beasts. Now this may refer to the false prophets that lived in Isaiah's, Jeremiah's, and Ezekiel's time, that flattered the people in their wicked ways, and told them they should have peace, though they went on; and to the priests that bare rule by their means, or to the wicked princes, the sons of Josiah, that did evil in the sight of the Lord, and other wicked magistrates under them that betrayed their trust, were vicious and profane, and instead of making up the breach at which the judgments of God were breaking in upon them, made it wider, and augmented the fierce anger of the Lord, instead of doing any thing to turn it away. They should have kept judgment and justice, ver. 1, but they abandoned both, Jer. v. 1. Or it may refer to those who were the nation's watchmen in our Saviour's time, the chief priests and the scribes, who should have discerned the signs of the times, and have given notice to the people of the approach of the Messiah; but instead of that opposed him, and did all they could to keep people from coming to the knowledge of him, and to prejudice them against him. It is a very sad character that is here given of these watchmen. Woe unto thee, O land, when thy guides are such.

1. They had no sense or knowledge of their business; they were wretchedly ignorant of their work, and were very unfit to teach others, who were so ill taught themselves. "His watchmen are blind," and therefore utterly unfit to be watchmen. If the seers see not, who shall see for us? "If the light that is in us be darkness, how great is that darkness!" Christ describes the Pharisees to be blind leaders of the blind, Mat. xv. 14. The beasts of the field come to devour, and the watchmen are blind, and are not aware of them. They are "all ignorant," ver. 10; "Shepherds that cannot understand," ver. 11; that know not what is to be done about the sheep, nor can feed them with understanding, Jer. iii. 15.

2. What little knowledge they had they made no use of it; nobody was the better for it. As they were blind watchmen that could not discern the danger, so they were dumb dogs that would not give warning of it. And why are the dogs set to guard the sheep, if they cannot bark to awaken the shepherd and frighten the wolf? Such were these; they that had the charge of souls never reproved men for their faults, nor told them what would be in the end thereof; never gave them notice of the judgments of God that were breaking in upon them. They barked at God's prophets, and bit them too, and worried the sheep, but made no opposition to the wolf or thief.

3. They were very lazy, and would take no pains; they loved their ease, and hated business; were "always sleeping, lying down, and loving to slumber." They were not overcome and overpowered by sleep, as the disciples, through grief and fatigue; but they lay down on purpose to invite sleep, and said, "Soul, take thine ease; yet a little sleep." It is bad with a people when their shepherds slumber, Nah. iii. 18; and well for God's people that their shepherd, "the keeper of Israel, neither slumbers nor sleeps."

4. They were very covetous and eager after the world; "greedy dogs, that can never have enough." If they had never so much, they would think it too little; they so love silver as never to be satisfied with silver, Eccl. v. 10. All their inquiry is what they shall get, not what they shall do. Let them have the wages, and they care not whether the work be done or no; they feed not the flock, but fleece it. They are every one "looking to his own way," minding his own private interests, and have no regard at all to the public welfare. It was St. Paul's complaint of the watchmen in his time, Phil. ii. 21, "All seek their own, not the things that are Jesus Christ's." Every one is for propagating his own opinion, advancing his own party, raising his own family, and having every thing to his own mind, while the common concerns of the public are wretchedly neglected and postponed. They "look every one to his gain from his quarter," from his end or part of the work; they are for gain from every quarter; Rem, rem, quocunque modo rem,—'Money, money, by fair means or foul, we must have money;' but especially from their own quarter, where they will be sure to take care that they lose nothing, nor miss any thing that is to be got. He that putteth not into their mouths, they not only will do him no service, but they prepare war against him, Mic. iii. 5.

5. They were perfect epicures, given to their pleasures, never so much in their element as in their drunken revels; ver. 12, "Come ye," say they, "I will fetch wine." They have that at command; their cellars are better furnished than their closets, "and we will fill ourselves," or be drunk, "with strong drink." They were often drunk, not overseen, as we say, or overtaken in drink, but designedly. The watchmen did thus invite and encourage one another to drink to excess; or, they courted the people to sit and drink with them, and so confirmed them in their wicked ways and hardened their hearts, whom they should have reproved. How could they think it any harm to be drunk, when the watchmen themselves joined with them and led them to it?

6. They were mighty secure and confident of the continuance of their prosperity and ease; they said, "To-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant." We shall have as much to spend upon our lusts to-morrow as we have to-day. They had no thought at all of their own frailty and mortality, though they were shortening their days and hastening their deaths by their excesses. They had no dread of the judgments of God, though they were daily provoking him and making themselves liable to his wrath and curse. They never considered the uncertainty of all the delights and enjoyments of sense, how they perish in the using, and pass away with the lusts of them. They resolved to continue in this wicked course, whatever their consciences said to the contrary, to be as merry to-morrow as they are to-day. But "boast not thyself of to-morrow," when perhaps "this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

CHAPTER LVII.

The prophet, in this chapter, makes his observations, I. Upon the deaths of good men, comforting them that were taken away in their integrity, and reproving those that did not make a due improvement of such providences, ver. 1, 2. II. Upon the gross idolatries, and spiritual whoredoms which the Jews were guilty of, and the destroying judgments they were thereby bringing upon themselves, ver. 3—12. III. Upon the gracious returns of God to his people, to put an end to their captivity, and re-establish their prosperity, ver. 13—21.

THE righteous perisheth, and no man layeth it to heart:
And merciful men are taken away, none considering
That the righteous is taken away from the evil to come.

2 He shall enter into peace:
They shall rest in their beds,
Each one walking in his uprightness.

The prophet, in the close of the foregoing chapter, had condemned the watchmen for their ignorance and sottishness; here he shews the general stupidity and senselessness of the people likewise. No wonder they were inconsiderate, when their watchmen were so, that should have awakened them to consideration. We may observe here,

First. The providence of God removing good men apace out of this world. "The righteous" as to this world "perish;" they are gone, and their place knows them no more. Piety exempts none from the arrests of death; nay, in persecuting times, the most righteous are most exposed to the violences of bloody men; the first that died died a martyr. Righteousness delivereth from the sting of death, but not from the stroke of it. They are said to perish, because they are utterly removed from us, and to express the great loss which this world sustains by the removal of them; not that their death is their undoing, but it often proves an undoing to the places where they lived and were useful. Nay, even "merciful men are taken away;" those good men that are distinguished from the righteous, for whom some would even dare to die, Rom. v. 7. Oftentimes those are removed that could be worst spared; the fruitful trees are cut down by death, and the barren left still to cumber the ground. Merciful men are often taken away by the hand of men's malice; many good works they have done, and for some of them they are stoned. Before the captivity in Babylon perhaps there was a more than ordinary mortality of good men, so that there were scarce any left, Jer. v. 1. The godly ceased and the faithful failed, Ps. xii. 1.

Secondly. The careless world slighting these providences and disregarding them; "No man lays it to heart," none considers it. There are very few that lament it as a public loss, very few that take notice of it as a public warning. The death of good men is a thing to be laid to heart and considered more than common deaths. Serious inquiries ought to be made wherefore God contends with us; what good lessons are to be learned by such providences; what we may do to help to make up the breach, and to fill up the room of those that are removed. God is justly displeased when such events are not laid to heart; when the voice of the rod is not heard, nor the intentions of it answered, much more when it is rejoiced in, as the slaying of the witnesses is, Rev. xi. 10. Some of God's choicest blessings to mankind being thus easily parted with, are really undervalued, and it is an evidence of very great incogitancy. Little children, when they are little, least lament the death of their parents, because they know not what a loss it is to them.

1. They are "taken away from the evil to come," then when it is just coming, 1st. In compassion to them that they may not see the evil, 2 Kin. xxii. 20, nor share in it, nor be in temptation by it. When the deluge is coming they are called into the ark, and have a hiding-place and rest in heaven, where there was none for them under heaven. 2nd. In wrath to the world, to punish them for all the injuries they have done to the righteous and merciful ones. These are taken away that stood in the gap to turn away the judgments of God; and then what can be expected but a deluge of them? It is a sign God intends war when he calls home his ambassadors.

2. They go to be easy out of the reach of that evil. The righteous man that, while he lived, walked in his uprightness, when he dies enters into peace, and rests in his bed. Note, 1st. Death is gain, and rest, and bliss to those only that walked in their uprightness, and that, when they die, can appeal to God concerning it, as Hezekiah, 2 Kin. xx. 3, "Now, Lord, remember it." 2. They that practised uprightness, and persevered in it to the end, shall find it well with them when they die. Their souls then enter into peace, into the world of peace, where peace is in perfection, and where there is no trouble, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Their bodies rest in their beds. Note, The grave is a bed of rest to all the Lord's people; there they rest from all their labours, Rev. xiv. 13; and the more weary they were the more welcome will that rest be to them, Job iii. 17. This bed is made in the darkness, but that makes it the more quiet. It is a bed out of which they shall rise refreshed in the morning of the resurrection.

3 But draw near hither, ye sons of the sorceress,
The seed of the adulterer and the whore.
4 Against whom do ye sport yourselves?
Against whom make ye a wide mouth,
And draw out the tongue?
Are ye not children of trangression, a seed of falsehood,
5 Enflaming yourselves with idols
Under every green tree,
Slaying the children in the valleys
Under the clifts of the rocks?
6 Among the smooth stones of the stream is thy portion;
They, they are thy lot:
Even to them hast thou poured a drink offering,
Thou hast offered a meat offering.
Should I receive comfort in these?
7 Upon a lofty and high mountain hast thou set thy bed:
Even thither wentest thou up to offer sacrifice.
8 Behind the doors also and the posts hast thou set up thy remembrance:
For thou hast discovered thyself to another than me,
And art gone up; thou hast enlarged thy bed,
And made thee a covenant with them;
Thou lovedst their bed where thou sawest it.
9 And thou wentest to the king with ointment,
And didst increase thy perfumes,
And didst send thy messengers far off,
And didst debase thyself even unto hell.
10 Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way;
Yet saidst thou not, There is no hope:
Thou hast found the life of thine hand;
Therefore thou wast not grieved.
11 And of whom hast thou been afraid or feared,
That thou hast lied,
And hast not remembered me, nor laid it to thy heart?
Have not I held my peace even of old,
And thou fearest me not?
12 I will declare thy righteousness,
And thy works; for they shall not profit thee.

We have here a high charge, but a just one no doubt, drawn up against that wicked generation out of which God's righteous ones were removed, because the world was not worthy of them. Observe,

First. The general character here given of them, or the name and title by which they stand indicted, ver. 3. They are bid to draw near and hear the charge, are set to the bar and arraigned there as sons of the sorceress, or of a witch, the seed of an adulterer and a whore; that is, they were such themselves, they were strongly inclined to be such, and their ancestors were such before them. Sin is sorcery and adultery, for it is departing from God and dealing with the devil, and they were children of disobedience. Come, saith the prophet, draw near hither, and I will read you your doom. To the righteous death will bring peace and rest, but not to you, "You are children of transgressors and a seed of falsehood," ver. 4, that have it by kind, and have it woven into your very nature, to backslide from God and to deal treacherously with him, ch. xlviii. 8.

Secondly. The particular crimes laid to their charge:

1. Scoffing at God and his word. They were a generation of scorners, ver. 4, "Against whom do you sport yourselves?" You think it is only against the poor prophets whom you trample upon as contemptible men; but really it is against God himself, who sends them, and whose message they deliver. Mocking the messengers of the Lord was Jerusalem's measure-filling sin, for what was done to them God took as done to himself. When they were reproved for their sins and threatened with the judgments of God, they ridiculed the word of God with all the rude, indecent gestures and expressions of disdain that could be. They sported themselves and made themselves merry with that which should have made them serious, and under which they should have humbled themselves. They made wry mouths at the prophets and drew out the tongue, contrary to all the laws of good breeding. Nor did they treat God's prophets with the common civility with which they would have treated a gentleman's servant that had been sent to them of an errand. Note, Those who mock at God, and bid defiance to his judgments, had best consider who it is towards whom they carry it so insolently.

2. Idolatry. This was that sin which the people of the Jews were most notoriously guilty of before the captivity, but that affliction cured them of it. In Isaiah's time it abounded, witness the abominable idolatries of Ahaz, which some think are particularly referred to here, and of Manasseh. 1st. They were dotingly fond of their idols, were inflamed with them, as those that burn in unlawful, unnatural lusts, Rom. i. 27; they were "mad upon their idols," Jer. l. 38. They inflamed themselves with them by their violent passions in the worship of them, as those of Baal's prophets, that leaped upon the altar and cut themselves, 1 Kin. xviii. 26, 28. Note, Vile corruptions, the more they are gratified the more they are inflamed. They worshipped their "idols under every green tree," in the open air and in the shade; yet that did not cool the heat of their impetuous lusts, but rather, the charming beauty of the green trees made them the more fond of their idols which they worshipped there. Thus that in nature which is pleasing, instead of drawing them to the God of nature, drew them from him. The flame of their zeal in the worship of false gods may shame us for our coldness and indifferency in the worship of the true God. They strove to inflame themselves, but we distract and deaden ourselves. 2nd. They were barbarous and unnaturally cruel in the worship of their idols. They slew their children and offered them in sacrifice to their idols, not only in the valley of the son of Hinnom, the head-quarters of that monstrous idolatry, but in other valleys in imitation of that, and under the clefts of the rocks, in dark and solitary places, the fittest for such works of darkness. 2nd. They were abundant and insatiable in their idolatries; they never thought they could have idols enough, nor could spend enough upon them and do enough in their service. The Syrians had once a notion of the God of Israel that he was a god of the hills, but not a god of the valleys, 1 Kin. xx. 28; but these idolaters, to make sure work, had both.

First. They had gods of the valleys, which they worshipped in the low places by the water side; ver. 6, "Among the smooth stones of the valley," or brook, "is thy portion." If they saw a smooth, carved stone, though set up but for a waymark or a mere stone, they were ready to worship it, as the Papists do crosses. Or in stony valleys they set up their gods, which they called their portion, and took for their lot, as God's people take him for their lot and portion. But these gods of stone would really be no better a portion for them, no better a lot, than the smooth stones of the stream, near which they were set up, for sometimes they worshipped their rivers. They, they are thy lot, which thou trustest to and art pleased with; but thou shalt be put off with it for thy lot, and miserable will thy case be. See the folly of sinners, who take the smooth stones of the stream for their portion, when they might have the precious stones of God's Jerusalem and the high priest's ephod to portion themselves with. Having taken these idols for their lot and portion, they stick at no charge in doing honour to them, "To them hast thou poured a drink offering and offered a meat offering," as if they had given thee thy meat and drink. They loved their idols better than their children, for their own tables must be robbed to replenish the altars of their idols. Have we taken the true God for our portion? Is he, even he, our lot? Let us then serve him with our meat and drink, not as they did, by depriving ourselves of the use of it, but by eating and drinking to his glory. Here, in a parenthesis, comes in an expression of God's just resentment of this wickedness of theirs, "Should I receive comfort in these," in such a people as this? Can they expect that God should take any pleasure in them, or accept their devotions at his altar, who thus serve Baal with the gifts of his providence? God takes comfort in his people while they are faithful to him; but what comfort can he take in them, when they that should be his witnesses against the idolatries of the world do themselves fall in with them? 'Should I have compassion on these?' so some; or, 'Should

I repent me concerning these?' so others. How can they expect that I should spare them, and either adjourn or abate their punishment, when they are so very provoking? "Shall I not visit for these things?" Jer. v. 7, 9.

Secondly. They had gods of the hills too; ver. 7, "Upon a lofty and high mountain" (as if thou wouldst vie with the High and Lofty One himself, ver. 15) "hast thou set thy bed," thine idol, thine idol's temple and altar, the bed of thine uncleanness, where thou committest spiritual whoredom with all the wantonness of an idolatrous fancy, and in direct violation of the covenant of thy God. "Thither wentest thou up" readily enough, though it was uphill, "to offer sacrifice." Some think this speaks the impudence they arrived to in their idolatries; at first they had some sense of shame, when they worshipped their idols in the valleys, in obscure places, but they soon conquered that, and came to do it upon the lofty high mountains; they were not ashamed, neither could they blush.

Thirdly. As if these were not enough, they had household gods too, their lares and penates; ver. 8, "Behind the doors and the posts;" where the law of God should be written for a memorandum to them of their duty, there they "set up the remembrance of their idols;" not so much to keep up their own remembrance of them, they were so fond of them they could not forget them, but to shew to others how mindful they were of them, and to put their children in mind of them, and possess them betimes with a veneration for those dunghill deities.

4th. As they were insatiable in their idolatries, so they were inseparable from them. They were hardened in their wickedness; they worshipped their idols openly, and in public view, as being neither ashamed of the sin nor afraid of the punishment; they went as publicly, and in as great crowds, to the idol temples as ever they had gone to God's house. This was like an impudent harlot; "discovering themselves to another than to God,"—making profession of other than the true religion. They took a pride in making proselytes to their idolatries; and not only went up themselves to their high places, but enlarged their bed, that is, their idol temples, and (as the margin reads the following words) 'thou hewedst for thyself larger than theirs,'—than theirs from whom thou copiedst it, and tookest the platform of it, as Ahaz of his altar, from that which he saw at Damascus, 2 Kin. xvi. 10; and, being thus involved over head and ears as it were in their idolatries, there is no parting them from them. Ephraim is now joined to idols, both in love and league. First. In league. "Thou hast made a covenant with them," with the idols, with the idol-worshippers, to live and die together. This was a complete renunciation of their covenant with God, and an avowed resolution to persist in their apostacy from him. Secondly. In love. "Thou lovedst their bed," that is, the temple of an idol, "wherever thou sawest it." Justly, therefore, were they given up to their own hearts' lusts.

3. Another sin charged upon them is their trusting in and seeking to foreign aids and succours, and contracting a communion with the Gentile powers; ver. 9, "Thou wentest to the king," which some understand of the idol they worshipped, particularly Moloch, which signifies a king; thou didst every thing to ingratiate thyself with those idols, didst offer incense and sweet ointments at their altars. Or, it may be meant of the king of Assyria, whom Ahaz made his court to; or of the king of Babylon, whose ambassadors Hezekiah caressed; or of other the kings of the nations, whose idolatrous usages they admired, and were desirous to learn and imitate; and for that end went and sent to cultivate an acquaintance and correspondence with them, that they might be like them, and strengthen themselves by an alliance with them. See here, 1st. What an expence they were at in forming and procuring this grand alliance. They went with ointment and perfumes, either bestowed upon themselves, to beautify their own faces, and so make themselves considerable, and worthy the friendship of the greatest king, or to be presented to those whose favour they were ambitious of, because "a man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men." When the first present of rich perfumes was thought too little, thou didst increase them; and thus "many seek the ruler's favour," forgetting that, after all, "every man's judgment proceedeth from the Lord." So fond were they of those heathen princes, that they not only went themselves, in all their airs, to those that were near them, but sent messengers to those that were afar off, ch. xviii. 2. 2nd. How much they hereby disparaged themselves, and laid the honour of their crown and nation in the dust; "Thou didst debase thyself even unto hell;" so they did by their idolatries. It is a dishonour to the children of men, that are endued with the powers of reason, to worship that as their God which is the creature of their own fancy, and the work of their own hands, to "bow down to the stock of a tree." It is much more a dishonour to the children of God, that are blessed with the privilege of Divine revelation, to forsake such a God as they know theirs to be, for a thing of nought; their own mercies for lying vanities. They likewise debase themselves by truckling to their heathen neighbours, and depending upon them, when they had a God to go to that is all-sufficient, and in covenant with them. How did they shame themselves to the highest degree, and sink themselves to the lowest, that forsook the Fountain of life for broken cisterns, and the Rock of ages for broken reeds. Note, Sinners disparage and debase themselves; the service of sin is an ignominious slavery, and they who thus debase themselves to hell will justly have their portion there.

Thirdly. The aggravations of their sin.

1. They had been tired with disappointments in their wicked courses, and yet they would not be convinced of the folly of them; ver. 10, "Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way;" thou hast undertaken a mighty task to find out true satisfaction and happiness in that which is vanity and a lie. Those that set up idols instead of God for the object of their worship, and princes instead of God for the object of their hope and confidence, and think thus to better themselves and make themselves easy, go a great way about, and will never come to their journey's end. "Thou art wearied in the multitude," or multiplicity of thy ways, so some read it; those that forsake the only right way wander endlessly in a thousand bypaths, and lose themselves in the many inventions which they have sought out. They weary themselves with fresh chases, and fierce ones, but never gain their point; like the Sodomites, that wearied themselves to find the door, Gen. xix. 11, and could not find it at last. The pleasures of sin will soon surfeit, but never satisfy; a man may quickly tire himself in the pursuit of them, but can never repose himself in the enjoyment of them. They found this by experience, the idols they had often worshipped never did them any kindness; the kings they courted distressed them, and helped them not; and yet they were so wretchedly besotted, that they could not say, "There is no hope." It is in vain any longer to expect that satisfaction in creature confidences, and in the worship of idols, which we have so often looked for, and never met with. Note, Despair of happiness in the creature, and of satisfaction in the service of sin, is the first step towards a well grounded hope of happiness in God, and a well fixed resolution to keep to his service. And those are inexcusable who have had sensible conviction of the vanity of the creature, and yet will not be brought to say, There is no hope to be happy short of the Creator.

2. Though they were convinced that the way they were in was a sinful way, yet, because they had found some present sensual pleasure and worldly profit by it, they could not persuade themselves to be sorry for it. "Thou hast found the life of thy hand," or the living of it; thou boastest how fortune smiles upon thee, and therefore thou art not grieved, no more than Ephraim, when he said, (Hos. xii. 8,) "I am become rich, I have found me out substance." Note, Prosperity in sin is a great bar to conversion from sin. Those that live at ease in their sinful pleasures, and raise estates by their sinful projects, are tempted to think God favours them, and therefore they have nothing to repent of. Some read it ironically, or by way of question, 'Thou hast found the life of thy hand,' hast found true satisfaction and happiness; no doubt thou hast, hast thou not? And therefore thou art so far from being grieved that thou "blessest thyself in thine own evil way;" but review thy gains once more, and come to a balance of profit and loss, and then say what fruit thou hast of those things whereof thou art ashamed, and for which "God shall bring thee into judgment," Rom. vi. 21.

3. They had dealt very unworthily with God by their sin; for, 1st. It should seem they pretended that the reason why they left God was, because he was too terrible a majesty for them to deal with, they must have gods that they could be more free and familiar with; but, saith God, "of whom hast thou been afraid or feared, that thou hast lied?" that is, that thou hast dealt falsely and treacherously with me, and dissembled in thy covenants with me, and prayers to me; 'What did I ever do to frighten thee from me?' What occasion have I given thee to think hardly of me, that thou hast gone to seek a kinder master? 2nd. However, it is certain they had no true reverence of God, nor any awful regard to him. So that question is commonly understood, "Of whom hast thou been afraid, or feared?" Of none; for thou hast not feared me, whom thou shouldest fear; for "thou hast lied to me." Those that dissemble with God make it to appear they stand in no awe of him. "Thou hast not remembered me," neither what I have said nor what I have done, neither the promises nor the threatenings, nor the performances of either; thou hast not laid them to thy heart, as thou wouldest have done if thou hadst feared me. Note, Those who lay not the word of God and his providences to their hearts, it is a sign they have not the fear of God before their eyes. And multitudes are ruined by fearlessness, forgetfulness, and mere carelessness; they do not aright, nor to good purpose, fear any thing, remember any thing, nor lay any thing to heart. Nay, 3rd. They were hardened in their sin, by the patience and forbearance of God; "Have not I held my peace of old," and for a long time? "these things thou hast done, and I kept silence." And therefore, as it follows here, "thou fearest me not," as if, because God had spared long, he would never punish, Eccl. viii. 11. Because he kept silence, the sinner thought him altogether such a one as himself, and stood in no awe of him.

Lastly. Here is God's resolution to call them to an account, though he had long borne with them; ver. 12, "I will declare," like that, Ps. l. 21, "But I will reprove thee." "I will declare thy righteousness," which thou makest thy boast of, and let the world see, and thyself too, to thy confusion, that it is all a sham, all a cheat, it is not what it pretends to be. When thy righteousness comes to be examined it will be found unrighteousness, and that there is no sincerity in all thy pretensions. I will declare thy works, what they have been, and what the gain thou pretendest to have gotten by them; and it will appear, that at long run "they shall not profit thee," nor turn to any account. Note, Sinful works, as they are works of darkness, and there is no reason or righteousness in them, so they are unfruitful works, and there is nothing got by them; and, however they look now, it will be made to appear so another day, Sin doth not profit, nay, it doth ruin and destroy.

13 When thou criest, let thy companies deliver thee;
But the wind shall carry them all away;
Vanity shall take them:
But he that putteth his trust in me
Shall possess the land,
And shall inherit my holy mountain;
14 And shall say, Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way,
Take up the stumblingblock out of the way of my people.
15 For thus saith the high and lofty One
That inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy;
I dwell in the high and holy place,
With him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit,
To revive the spirit of the humble,
And to revive the heart of the contrite ones.
16 For I will not contend for ever,
Neither will I be always wroth:
For the spirit should fail before me,
And the souls which I have made.

Here, First, God shews how insufficient idols and creatures were to relieve and succour those that worshipped them, and confided in them; ver. 13, "When thou criest" in thy distress and anguish, lamentest thy misery, and callest for help, "let thy companies deliver thee," thy idol gods, which thou hast heaped to thyself companies of, the troops of the confederate forces which thou hast relied so much upon; let them deliver thee if they can; expect no other relief but what they can give. Thus God said to Israel, when in their trouble they called upon him, Jud. x. 14, "Go and cry to the gods which you have chosen, let them deliver you." But in vain is salvation hoped for from them; "The wind shall carry them all away," the wind of God's wrath, that breath of his mouth, which shall slay the wicked; they have made themselves as chaff, and therefore the wind will of course hurry them away. Vanity they are, and vanity shall take them away; to vanity they shall be reduced, and vanity shall be their recompence. Both the idols and their worshippers shall come to nothing.

Secondly. He shews that there was a sufficiency, an all-sufficiency, in him for the comfort and deliverance of all those that put their confidence in him, and made their application to him. And their safety and satisfaction appears the more comfortable, because their hopes are crowned with fruition, when those that seek to other helpers have their hopes frustrated; "but he that putteth his trust in me," and in me only, he shall be happy, both for soul and body, for this world and the other. 1. They that trust in God's providence take the best course to secure their secular interests; "They shall possess the land," as much of it as is good for them, and what they have they shall have it from a good hand, and hold it by a good title; Ps. xxxvii. 3, "They shall dwell in the land, and verily they shall be fed." 2. They that trust in God's grace take the best course to secure their sacred interests; "They shall inherit my holy mountain,"

They shall enjoy the privileges of the church on earth, and be brought at length to the joys of heaven, and no wind shall carry them away. More particularly,

1st. The captives that trust in God shall be released; ver. 14, "They shall say," that is, the messengers of his word, and all the ministers of his providence, in that great event shall say, "Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way." When God's time is come for their deliverance, the way of bringing it about shall be made plain and easy; obstacles shall be removed, difficulties that seemed insuperable shall presently be got over, and all things shall concur both to accelerate and to facilitate their return: see ch. xl. 3, 4. This refers to the provision which the Gospel, and the grace of it, hath made for our ready passage through this world to a better. The way of religion is now cast up; it is a highway; ministers' business is to direct people in it, and to help them over the discouragements they meet with, that nothing may offend them.

2nd. The contrite that trust in God shall be revived, ver. 15. They that trusted in idols and creatures for help went with their ointments and perfumes, ver. 9, but here God shews that those who may expect help from him are such as are destitute of, and set themselves at a distance from, the gaieties of the world, and the delights of sense. God's glory appears here very bright,

First. In his greatness and majesty. He is "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity." Let this possess us with very high and honourable thoughts of the God with whom we have to do. 1*st.* That his being and perfections are exalted infinitely above every creature, not only above what they have themselves, but above what they can conceive concerning him, "far above all" their "blessing and praise," Neh. ix. 5. He is "the high and lofty One," and there is no creature like him, nor any to be compared with him. It speaks likewise his sovereign dominion over all, and the incontestable right he has to give both law and judgment to all. He is higher than the highest, Eccl. v. 8; than the highest heavens, Ps. cxiii. 4. 2*nd.* That with him there is neither beginning of days, nor end of life, nor change of time; he is both immortal and immutable; he only hath immortality, 1 Tim. vi. 16; he hath it of himself, and he hath it constantly; he inhabits it, and cannot be dispossessed of it. We must shortly remove into eternity, but God always inhabits it. 3*rd.* That there is an infinite rectitude in his nature, and an exact conformity with himself, and a steady design of his own glory in all that he doth; and this appears in every thing by which he has made himself known; for his name is holy, and all that desire to be acquainted with him must know him as a holy God. 4*th.* That the peculiar residence and discovery of his glory is in the mansions of light and bliss above; "I dwell in the high and holy place," and will have all the world to know it. Whoever have any business with God must direct to him as their Father in heaven, for there he dwells. These great things are here said of God to possess us with a holy reverence of him, to encourage our confidence in him, and to magnify his compassion and condescension to us; that though he is thus high, yet he hath respect unto the lowly. He that rides on the heavens by his name Jah, stoops to concern himself for poor widows and fatherless, Ps. lxviii. 4, 5.

Secondly. In his grace and mercy. He hath a tender pity for the humble and contrite; for those that are so in respect to their state, if they be his people, he will not overlook them, though they are poor and low in the world, and despised and trampled upon by men. But it refers to the temper of their mind; he will have a tender regard to those that, being in affliction, accommodate themselves to their affliction, and bring their mind to their condition, be it never so low, and never so sad, and sorely broken; those that are truly penitent for sin, and mourn in secret for it, and have a dread of the wrath of God, which they have made themselves obnoxious to, and are submissive under all his rebukes. Now, 1*st.* With these God will dwell; he will visit them graciously, will converse familiarly with them, by his word and Spirit, as a man doth with those of his own family; he will be always nigh to them, and present with them; he that dwells in the highest heavens dwells in the lowest hearts, and inhabits sincerity as surely as he inhabits eternity; in these he delights. 2*nd.* He will revive their heart and spirit; will speak that to them, and work that in them, by the word and Spirit of his grace, which will be reviving to them, as a cordial to one that is ready to faint. He will give them reviving joys and hopes, sufficient to balance all the griefs and fears that break their spirits. He dwells with them, and his presence is reviving.

3rd. Those he contends with, if they trust in him, shall be relieved, and received into favour, ver. 1. He will "revive the heart of the contrite ones," for he will not contend for ever. Nothing makes a soul contrite so as God's contending, and therefore nothing revives it so as his ceasing his controversy. Here is, First. A gracious promise. It is not promised that he will never be angry with his people, for their sins are displeasing to him; or that he will never contend with them, for they must expect the rod; but he "will not contend for ever," nor be always wroth. As he is not soon angry so he is not long angry; "he will not always chide." Though he contend with them by convictions of sin, he will not contend for ever; but, instead of the spirit of bondage they shall receive the spirit of adoption: he hath torn, but he will heal. Though he contend with them by the rebukes of providence, yet the correction shall not last always, shall not last long; no longer than there is need, 1 Pet. i. 6; no longer than they can bear, and no longer than till it has done its work. Though their whole life be calamitous, yet their end will be peace, and so will their eternity be. Secondly. A very compassionate consideration, upon which this promise is grounded; "If I should contend for ever, the spirit would fail before me, even the souls which I have made." Note, 1*st.* God is the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9; it is the soul that he has made, that he gave being to by creation, and a new being to by regeneration. 2*nd.* Though the Lord is for the body, yet he concerns himself chiefly for the souls of his people, that the spirit do not fail, and its graces and comforts. 3*rd.* When troubles last long, the spirit, even of good men, is apt to fail. They are tempted to entertain hard thoughts of God, to think it in vain to serve him. They are ready to put comfort away from them, and to despair of relief, and then the spirit fails. 4*th.* It is in consideration of this that God will not contend for ever; for he will not forsake the work of his own hands, nor defeat the purchase of his Son's blood. The reason is taken, not from our merit, but from our weakness and infirmity; for "He remembers that we are flesh," Ps. lxxviii. 39, and the flesh is weak.

17 For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth,
And smote him: I hid me, and was wroth,
And he went on frowardly in the way of his heart.
18 I have seen his ways, and will heal him:
I will lead him also, and restore comforts
Unto him and to his mourners.
19 I create the fruit of the lips;
Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near,
Saith the LORD; and I will heal him.
20 But the wicked are like the troubled sea,
When it cannot rest,
Whose waters cast up mire and dirt.
21 There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.

The body of the people of Israel, in this account of God's dealings with them, is spoken of as a particular person, ver. 17, 18; but divided into two sorts, that were differently dealt with; some that were sons of peace, to whom peace is spoken, ver. 19, and others that were not, who have nothing to do with peace, ver. 20, 21. Observe here,

First. The just rebukes which that people were brought under for their sin; "For the iniquity of his covetousness I was wroth, and smote him." Covetousness was a sin that abounded very much among that people; Jer. vi. 13, "From the least to the greatest of them, every one is given to covetousness." Those that did not worship images yet were carried away by this spiritual idolatry, for so covetousness is, it is making money the god, Col. iii. 5. No marvel the people were covetous, when their watchmen themselves were notoriously so, ch. lvi. 11. Yet, as covetous as they were, in the service of their idols they were prodigal, ver. 6; and it is hard to say whether their profuseness in that, or their covetousness in every thing else, was more provoking. But for this iniquity, among others, God was angry with them, and brought one judgment after another upon them, and their destruction at last by the Chaldeans. 1. God was wroth, he resented it, took it very ill that a people who were devoted to himself, and portioned in himself, should be so entirely given up to the world, and choose that for their portion. Note, Covetousness is an iniquity that is very displeasing to the God of heaven; it is a heart-sin, but he sees it, and therefore hates it, and looks upon it with jealousy, because it sets up a rival with him in the soul. It is a sin which men bless themselves in, Ps. xlix. 18, and in which their neighbours bless them, Ps. x. 3, but God abhors it. 2. He smote him, reproved him for it by his prophets, corrected him by his providence, punished him in those very things he so doted upon, and was covetous of. Note, Sinners shall be made to feel from the anger of God. Whom he is wroth with he smites; and covetousness particularly lays men under the tokens of God's displeasure. They that set their hearts upon the wealth of this world, either they are disappointed of it or it is embittered to them; it is either clogged with a cross or turned into a curse. 3. God hid himself from him when he was under these rebukes; and continued wroth with him. When we are under the rod, if God manifest himself to us, we may bear it the better; but if he both smite us, and hide himself from us, send us no prophets, speak to us no comfortable word, shew us no token for good, if he tear and go away, Hos. v. 14, we are very miserable.

Secondly. Their obstinacy and incorrigibleness under these rebukes. "He went on frowardly in the way of his heart," in his evil way. He was not sensible of the displeasure of God that he was under; he felt the smart of the rod, but had no regard at all to the hand; the more he was crossed in his worldly pursuits the more eager he was in them. He either would not see his error, or, if he saw it, would not amend it. Covetousness was the way of his heart, it was what he was inclined to, and intent upon, and he would not be reclaimed, but in his distress he trespassed yet more, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. See the strength of the corruption of men's hearts, and the sinfulness of sin; it will take its course in despite of God himself, and all the flames of his wrath. See also how insufficient afflictions of themselves are to reform men, unless God's grace work with them.

Thirdly. God's wonderful return in mercy to them, notwithstanding the obstinacy of the generality of them. The greater part of them went on frowardly; but there were some among them that were mourners for the obstinacy of the rest, and with an eye to them, or rather, for his own name's sake, God determines not to contend for ever with them. With the froward God may justly shew himself froward, Ps. xviii. 26, and walk contrary to those that walk contrary to him, Lev. xxvi. 24. When this sinner here "went on frowardly in the way of his heart," one would think it should have followed, "I have seen his ways," and will destroy him, will abandon him, will never have any thing more to do with him; no, such are the riches of Divine mercy and grace, and so do they rejoice against judgment, that it follows, "I have seen his ways, and will heal him." See how God's goodness takes occasion from man's badness to appear so much the more illustrious; and "where sin hath abounded, grace doth much more abound." God's reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself, for in us there appears nothing but what is provoking. "I have seen his ways, and yet I will heal him," for my own name's sake. God knew how bad that people were, and yet would not cast them off. But observe the method; God will first give him grace, and then, and not till then, give him peace. "I have seen his ways," that he will never turn to me of himself, and therefore I will turn him. Those whom God has mercy in store for he has grace in readiness for, to prepare and qualify them for that mercy, which they were as fast as they could running from. 1. God will heal him of his corrupt and vicious disposition, will cure him of his covetousness, though it be never so deeply rooted in him, and his heart has been long exercised to covetous practices. There is no spiritual disease so inveterate, but Almighty grace can conquer it. 2. God will lead him also; not only amend what was amiss in him, that he may cease to do evil, but direct him into the way of duty, that he may learn to do well. He goes on frowardly, as Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter; but God will lead him into a better mind, a better path. And then, 3. He will restore those comforts to him which he had forfeited and lost, and for the return of which he had thus prepared him. There was a wonderful reformation wrought upon the captives in Babylon, and then a wonderful redemption wrought for them; which brought comfort to them, that is, to their mourners; to those among them that mourned for their own sins, and the sins of their people, and the desolations of the sanctuary. To those mourners the mercy would be most comfortable, and to them God had an eye in working it out. "Blessed are they that mourn," for to them comfort belongs, and they shall have it.

Fourthly. Now, as when that people went into captivity, some of them were good figs, very good; others of them bad figs, very bad; and accordingly their captivity was to them for their good, or for their hurt, Jer. xxiv. 8, 9, so when they came out of captivity, still some of them were good, others bad, and accordingly the deliverance was to them.

1. To those among them that were good, their return out of captivity was peace, such peace as was a type and earnest of the peace which should be preached by Jesus Christ; ver. 19, "I create the fruit of the lips, peace." 1st. God designed to give them matter for praise and thanksgiving; for that is the fruit of the lips, Heb. xiii. 15, the calves of the lips, Hos. xiv. 2; I create this. Creation is out of nothing, and this is surely out of worse than nothing, when God creates matter of praise for those that went on frowardly in the way of their heart. 2nd. In order to this, peace shall be published, "Peace, peace," perfect peace, all kinds of peace, "to him that is afar off" from the general rendezvous, or from the head-quarters, as well "to him that is near." Peace with God; though he has contended with them, he will be reconciled, and let fall his controversy; peace of conscience, a holy security, and serenity of mind, after the many reproaches of conscience, and tosses of spirit they had been under in their captivity. Thus God creates the fruit of the lips, fresh matter for thanksgiving; for when he speaks peace to us we must speak praises to him. This peace is itself of God's creating; he, and he only, can work it; it is the fruit of the lips; of his lips, he commands it; of the ministers' lips, he speaks it by them, ch. xl. 1. It is the fruit of preaching lips, and praying lips; it is the fruit of Christ's lips, whose lips drop as a honeycomb; for to him this is applied, Eph. ii. 17, "He came and preached peace to you who were afar off," you Gentiles, as well as to the Jews who were nigh; to after ages, who were afar off in time, as well as to those of the present age.

2. To those among them that were wicked, though they might return with the rest, yet to them their return was no peace, ver. 20. The wicked, whereever he is, in Babylon or in Jerusalem, carries about with him the principle of his own uneasiness, and is like the troubled sea. God healed those to whom he spoke peace; ver. 19, "I will heal them," all shall be well again, and set to rights; but the wicked would not be healed by the grace of God, and therefore shall not be healed by his comforts. They are always like the sea in a storm, for they carry about with them, 1st. Unmortified corruptions. Those are not cured and conquered, and their ungoverned lusts and passions make them "like the troubled sea when it cannot rest," vexatious to all about them, and therefore uneasy to themselves; noisy and dangerous. When the intemperate heats of the spirit break out in scurrilous and abusive language, then the troubled sea casts forth mire and dirt. 2nd. Unpacified consciences. They are under a frightful apprehension of guilt and wrath, that they cannot enjoy themselves; when they seem settled they are in a toss; when they seem merry, they are in heaviness; like Cain, that always dwelt in the land of shaking. The terrors of conscience muddy all their enjoyments, and cast forth such mire and dirt as make them a burthen to themselves. Though this doth not appear, it may be, at present, yet it is a certain truth, what this prophet had said before, ch. xlviii. 22, and here repeats, ver. 21, "There is no peace to the wicked;" no reconciliation to God, nor can they be upon good terms with him, while they "go on still in their trespasses;" no quietness or satisfaction in their own mind, no real good, no peace in death, because no hope. My God hath said it, and all the world cannot unsay it, that there is no peace to those that allow themselves in any sin; what have they to do with peace?

CHAPTER LVIII.

The prophet in this chapter hath his commission and charge renewed to reprove the sinners in Zion, particularly the hypocrites, to shew them their transgressions, ver. 1; and it is intended for admonition and warning to all hypocrites, and is not to be confined to those of any one age. Some refer it primarily to those at that time when Isaiah prophesied: see ch. xxxiii. 14; xxix. 13. Others to the captives in Babylon; the wicked among them, to whom the prophet had declared there was no peace, ch. lvii. 21. Against the terror of that word they thought to shelter themselves with their external performances, particularly their fastings, which they kept up in Babylon, and for some time after their return to their own land, Zec. vii. 3, &c. The prophet therefore here shews them that their devotions would not entitle them to peace, while their conversations were not all of a piece with them. Others think it is principally intended against the hypocrisy of the Jews, especially the Pharisees, before and in our Saviour's time; they boasted of their fastings, but Christ, as the prophet here, shewed them their transgressions, Mat. xxiii.; much the same with those they are here charged with. Observe, I. The plausible profession of religion which they made, ver. 2. II. The boasts they made of that profession, and the blame they laid upon God, for taking no more notice of it, ver. 3. III. The sins they are charged with, which spoiled the acceptableness of their fasts, ver. 4, 5. IV. Instructions given them how to keep fasts aright, ver. 6, 7. V. Precious promises made to those who do so keep fasts, ver. 8—12. VI. The like precious promises made to those that sanctify sabbaths aright, ver. 13, 14.

CRY aloud, spare not,
Lift up thy voice like a trumpet,
And shew my people their transgression,
And the house of Jacob their sins.
2 Yet they seek me daily,
And delight to know my ways,
As a nation that did righteousness,
And forsook not the ordinance of their God:
They ask of me the ordinances of justice;
They take delight in approaching to God.

When our Lord Jesus promised to send the Comforter, he added, "When he is come, he shall convince," Jno. xvi. 7, 8; for conviction must prepare for comfort, and must also separate between the precious and the vile, and mark out those to whom comfort doth not belong. God had appointed this prophet to comfort his people, ch. xl. 1; here he appoints him to convince them, and shew them their sins.

First. He must tell them how very bad they really were, ver. 1.

1. He must deal faithfully and plainly with them. Though they were called the people of God, and the house of Jacob, though they were an honourable title and character, by which they were interested in many glorious privileges, yet do not flatter them, but "shew them their transgressions and their sins;" be particular in telling them their faults, what sins are committed among them which they do not know of; nay, what sins are committed by them, which they do not acknowledge to be sins. Though in some things they are reformed, let them know that in other things they are still as bad as ever. "Shew them their transgressions and their sins;" that is, 'all their transgressions in their sins;' their sins, and all the aggravations of them, Lev. xvi. 21. Note, 1st. God sees sin in his people, in the house of Jacob, and is displeased with it. 2nd. They are oftentimes unapt and unwilling to see their own sins, and need to have them shewed them, and to be told, "Thus and thus thou hast done."

2. He must be vehement and in good earnest herein, must cry aloud, and not spare. Not spare them, not touch them with his reproofs as if he were afraid of hurting them, but search the wound to the bottom; lay it bare to the bone; not spare himself or his own pains, but cry as loud as he can. Though he spend his strength and waste his spirits; though he get their ill-will by it, and get himself into an ill name; yet he must not spare. He must lift up his voice like a trumpet, to make those hear of their faults that were apt to be deaf on that ear. He must give his reproofs in the most powerful and pressing manner possible, as one who desired to be heeded. The trumpet doth not give an uncertain sound, but, though loud and shrill, is intelligible. So must his alarms be, giving them warning of the fatal consequences of sin, Eze. xxxiii. 3.

Secondly. He must acknowledge how very good they seemed to be notwithstanding; ver. 2, "Yet they seek me daily." When the prophet went about to shew them their transgressions, they pleaded they could see no transgressions they were guilty of; for they were diligent and constant in attending on God's worship; and what more would he have of them? Now, 1. He owns the matter of fact to be true. As far as hypocrites do that which is good, they shall not be denied the praise of it; let them make their best of it. It is owned that they have a form of godliness. 1st. They go to church, and observe their hours of prayer; "They seek me daily;" they are very constant in their devotions, and never omit them, nor suffer any thing to put them by. 2nd. They love to hear good preaching; They "delight to know my ways," as Herod, who heard John gladly, and the stony ground, that received the seed of the word with joy; it is to them as a lovely song, Eze. xxxiii. 32. 3rd. They seem to take a great pleasure in the exercises of religion, and to be in their element when they are at their devotions; "They delight in approaching to God," not for his sake to whom they approach, but for the sake of some pleasing circumstance, the company, or the festival. 4th. They are inquisitive concerning their duty, and seem desirous only to know it, making no question but that then they should do it; "They ask of me the ordinances of justice," the rules of piety in the worship of God, the rules of equity in their dealings with men, both which are ordinances of justice. 5th. They appear to the eye of the world as if they made conscience of doing their duty. They are "as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinances of their God." Others took them for such, and they themselves took on them to be such; nothing lay open to view that was a contradiction to their profession, but they seemed to be such as they should be. Note, Men may go a great way towards heaven, and yet come short; nay, may go to hell with a good reputation. But, 2. He intimates that this was so far from being a cover or excuse for their sin, that really it was an aggravation of it. Shew them their sins which they go on in, notwithstanding their knowledge of good and evil, sin and duty, and the convictions of their consciences concerning it.

3 Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?
Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge?
Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure,
And exact all your labours.
4 Behold, ye fast for strife and debate,
And to smite with the fist of wickedness:
Ye shall not fast as ye do this day,
To make your voice to be heard on high.
5 Is it such a fast that I have chosen?
A day for a man to afflict his soul?
Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush,
And to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast,
And an acceptable day to the LORD?
6 Is not this the fast that I have chosen?
To loose the bands of wickedness,
To undo the heavy burdens,
And to let the oppressed go free,
And that ye break every yoke?
7 Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, [house?
And that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy
When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him;
And that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?

Here we have,

First. The displeasure which these hypocrites conceived against God, for not accepting the services which they themselves had a mighty opinion of; ver. 3, "Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?" Thus they went in the way of Cain, who was angry at God, and resented it as a mighty affront, that his offering was not accepted. Having gone about to put a cheat upon God by their external services, here they go about to pick a quarrel with God for not being pleased with their services, as if he had not done fairly or justly by them. Observe, 1. How they boast of themselves, and magnify their own performances. "We have fasted and afflicted our souls;" not only sought God daily, ver. 2, but have kept some certain times of more solemn devotion. Some think it refers to the yearly fast, which was called the day of atonement; others to their arbitrary, occasional fasts. Note, It is common for unhumbled hearts to be proud of their professions of humiliation, as the Pharisee, Lu. xviii. 12, "I fast twice in the week." 2. What they expected from their performances. They thought God should take great notice of, and own himself a debtor to them for, their services. Note, It is a common thing for hypocrites, while they perform the external services of religion, to promise themselves that acceptance with God which he hath promised only to the sincere; as if they must be accepted of course, or for a compliment. 3. How heinously they take it that God had not put some particular marks of his favour upon them; that he had not presently delivered them out of their troubles, and advanced them to honour and prosperity. They charge God with injustice and partiality; and seem resolved to throw up their religion, and justify themselves in doing so with this, that they had found no profit in praying to God, Job xxi. 14, 15; Mal. iii. 14. Note. Reigning hypocrisy often breaks out in daring impiety and an open contempt and reproach of God and religion for that which the hypocrisy itself must bear all the blame of. Sinners reflect upon religion as a hard and melancholy service, and which there is nothing to be got by; when really it is long of themselves that it seems so to them, because they are not sincere in it.

Secondly. The true reason assigned why God did not accept their fastings, nor answer the prayers they made on their fast-days. It was because they did not fast aright; to God, even to him, Zec. vii. 5. They fasted indeed, but they persisted in their sins, and did not, as the Ninevites, turn every one from his evil way; but in the day of their fast, and notwithstanding the professed humiliations and covenants of that day, they went on to find pleasure; that is, to do whatsoever seemed right in their own eyes, lawful or unlawful, quicquid libet, licet,—'making their inclinations their law;' though they seemed to afflict their souls, they still gratified their lusts as much as ever. 1. They were as covetous and unmerciful as ever. "Ye exact all your labours" from your servants, and will neither release them according to the law nor relax the rigour of their servitude: see Jer. xxxiv. 8, where we find this to be their fault before the captivity; and Neh. v. 2, where we find it to be no less their fault after their captivity, notwithstanding all their solemn fasts. 'Ye exact all your dues,' or debts, so some read it; are as rigorous and severe in extorting what you demand from those that are poor as ever you were, though it was at the close of the yearly fast that the release was proclaimed. 2. They were contentious and spiteful; ver. 4, "Behold, ye fast for strife and debate." When they proclaimed a fast to deprecate God's judgments, they pretended to search for those sins which provoked God to threaten them with his judgments; and, under that pretence, perhaps, particular persons were falsely accused, as Naboth in the day of Jezebel's fast, 1 Kin. xxi. 12. Or, the contending parties among them, upon those occasions, were bitter and severe in their reflections one upon another; one side crying out, It is long of you; and the other, It is long of you, that our deliverance is not wrought. Thus, instead of judging themselves, which is the proper work of a fast-day, they condemned one another. They fasted for strife; that is, with emulation, which should make the most plausible appearance on a fast-day, and humour the matter best. Nor was it only tongue quarrels that were fomented in the times of their fasting, but they came to blows too. "Ye smite with the fists of wickedness." The cruel taskmasters beat their servants, and the creditors their insolvent debtors, whom they delivered to the tormentors. They abused poor innocents with wicked hands. Now while they thus continued in sin, in those very sins which were directly contrary to the intention of a fasting day, 1st. God would not allow them the use of such solemnities. "Ye shall not fast" at all, if ye fast "as ye do this day, causing your voice to be heard on high," in the heat of your clamours one against another; or, in your devotions, which you perform so as to make them to be taken notice of for ostentation. Bring me no more of these empty, noisy, vain oblations, ch. i. 13. Note, Those are justly forbidden the honour of a profession of religion that will not submit to the power of it. 2nd. He would not accept of them in the use of them. "Ye shall not fast;" that is, it shall not be looked upon as a fast, nor shall the voice of your prayers on those days be heard on high in heaven. Note, Those that fast and pray, and yet go on in their wicked ways, do but mock God, and deceive themselves.

Thirdly. Plain instructions given concerning the true nature of a religious fast. In general a fast is intended, 1. For the honouring and pleasing of God. It must be such a performance as he hath chosen, ver. 5. It must be an acceptable day to the Lord, in the duties of which we must study to approve ourselves to him, and obtain his favour; else it is not a fast, else there is nothing done to any purpose. 2. For the humbling and abasing of ourselves. A fast is a day to afflict the soul; if it do not express a genuine sorrow for sin, and do not promote a real mortification of sin, it is not a fast. The law of the day of atonement was, that on that day they should afflict their souls, Lev. xvi. 29. That must be done on a fast-day which is a real affliction to the soul, as far as it is yet unregenerate and unsanctified, though a real pleasure and advantage to the soul, as far as it is itself. It concerns us therefore to inquire on a fast-day, what it is that will be acceptable to God, and afflictive to our corrupt nature, and tending to its mortification.

1st. We are here told negatively what is not the fast that God hath chosen, and which doth not amount to the afflicting of the soul. First. It is not enough to look demure, to put on a grave and melancholy aspect, "to bow down the head like a bulrush" that is withered and broken; as the hypocrites, that were "of a sad countenance, and disfigured their faces, that they might appear unto men to fast," Mat. vi. 16. Hanging down the head did indeed well enough become the publican, whose heart was truly humbled and broken for sin, and therefore, in token of that, "would not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven," Lu. xviii. 13. But when it was only mimicked, (as here it was justly ridiculed,) it is but hanging down the head like a bulrush, which nobody regards, or takes any notice of. As the hypocrite's humiliations are but like the hanging down of a bulrush, so his elevations in his hopes are but like the flourishing of a bulrush, Job viii. 11, 12, which, "while it is yet in its greenness, withers before any other herb." Secondly. It is not enough to do penance to mortify the body a little, while the body of sin is untouched. It is not enough for a man "to spread sackcloth and ashes under him," which doth indeed give him some uneasiness for the present, but is soon forgotten when he returns to stretch himself upon his beds of ivory, Am. vi. 4. "Wilt thou call this a fast?" No, it is but the shadow and carcase of a fast. Wilt thou call this "an acceptable day to the Lord?" No; so far from being so, that the hypocrisy of it is an abomination to him. Note, The shows of religion, though they shew never so well in the eye of the world, will not be accepted of God without the substance of it.

2nd. We are here told positively what is the fast that God hath chosen; what that is which will recommend a fast day to the Divine acceptance, and what is indeed afflicting the soul; that is, crushing and subduing the corrupt nature. It is not 'afflicting the soul for a day,' (as some read it, ver. 5,) that will serve; no, it must be the business of our whole lives. It is here required,

First. That we be just to those with whom we have dealt hardly. The fast that God hath chosen consists in reforming our lives, and undoing what we have done amiss; ver. 6, "To loose the bands of wickedness," that is, the bands which we have wickedly tied, and by which others are bound out from their right, or bound down under severe usage. Those which perhaps were at first bands of justice, tying men to pay a due debt, yet, when the debt is exacted with rigour from those whom Providence hath reduced and emptied, they become bands of wickedness, and they must be loosed, or they will bring us into bonds of guilt, much more terrible. It is "to undo the heavy burthen," laid on the back of the poor servant, under which he is ready to sink. It is "to let the oppressed go free" from the oppression which makes his life bitter to him; let the prisoner for debt, that has nothing to pay, be discharged; let the vexatious action be let fall; let the servant, that is forcibly detained beyond the time of his servitude, be released; and thus break every yoke. Not only let go those that are wrongfully kept under the yoke, but break the yoke of slavery itself, that it may not serve again another time, nor any be made again to serve under it.

Secondly. That we be charitable to those that stand in need of charity, ver. 7. The particulars in the former verse may be taken as acts of charity; that we not only release those whom we have unjustly oppressed, that is justice, but that we contribute to the rescue and ransom of those that are oppressed by others, to the release of captives, and the payment of the debts of the poor; but those in this verse are plainly acts of charity. This, then, is the fast that God hath chosen, 1*st.* To provide food for those that want it; that is put first as the most necessary, and which the poor can but a little while live without. It is "to break thy bread to the hungry." Observe, It must be thy bread; that which is honestly got, not that which thou hast robbed others of; the bread which thou thyself hast occasion for, the bread of thine allowance. We must deny ourselves that we "may have to give to him that needeth." Thy bread which thou hast spared from thyself and thy family on the fast-day, if that, or the value of it, be not given to the poor, it is the miser's fast, which he makes a hand of; it is fasting for the world, not for God. It is "to break thy bread to the hungry." Not only to give them that which is already broken meat, but break bread on purpose for them; give them loaves, and do not put them off with scraps. 2*nd.* To provide lodging for those that want it. It is to take care of the poor that are cast out, that are forced from their dwellings, turned out of house and harbour; are cast out as rebels, so some critics render it; that are attainted, and whom therefore it is highly penal to protect, yet if they suffer unjustly, make no difficulty of sheltering them; do not only find out quarters for them, and pay for their lodging elsewhere, but, which is a greater act of kindness, bring them to thine own house, make them thine own guests. "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers;" for, though thou mayest not (as some have done) thereby entertain angels, thou mayest entertain Christ himself, who will recompense it in the resurrection of the just. "I was a stranger, and ye took me in." 3*rd.* To provide clothing for those that want it; "When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him;" both to shelter him from the injuries of the weather, and to enable him to appear decently among his neighbours. Give him clothes to come to church in; and in these, and other instances, "hide not thyself from thine own flesh." Some understand it more strictly of thine own kindred and relations; if those of thine own house and family fall into decay, thou art worse than an infidel if thou dost not provide for them, 1 Tim. v. 8. Others more generally; all that partake of the human nature are to be looked upon as our own flesh; for have we not all one Father? And for this reason we must not hide ourselves from them, not contrive to be out of the way when a poor petitioner inquires for us; not look another way, when a moving object of charity and compassion presents itself. Let us remember they are flesh of our flesh, and therefore we ought to sympathize with them; and in doing good to them we really do good to our own flesh and spirit too at long run; for thus we lay up for ourselves a good foundation, a good bond, for the time to come.

8 Then shall thy light break forth as the morning,
And thine health shall spring forth speedily:
And thy righteousness shall go before thee;
The glory of the LORD shall be thy rereward.
9 Then shalt thou call, and the LORD shall answer;
Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am.
If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke,
The putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity;
10 And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry,
And satisfy the afflicted soul;
Then shall thy light rise in obscurity,
And thy darkness be as the noon day:
11 And the LORD shall guide thee continually,
And satisfy thy soul in drought,
And make fat thy bones: [of water,
And thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring
Whose waters fail not. [places:
12 And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste
Thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations;
And thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach,
The restorer of paths to dwell in.

Here are precious promises for those to feast freely and cheerfully upon by faith, who keep the fasts that God has chosen. Let them know that God will make it up to them. Here is,

First. A farther account of the duty to be done, in order to our interest in these promises, ver. 9, 10. And here, as before, it is required that we both do justly and love mercy; that we "cease to do evil, and learn to do well." 1. We must abstain from all acts of violence and fraud. Those must be taken away from the midst of thee, from the midst of thy person; that is, out of thy heart, so some. Thou must not only refrain from the practice of injury, but mortify in thee all inclination and disposition towards it. Or, from the midst of thy people. Those in authority must not only not be oppressive themselves, but must do all they can to prevent and restrain it in all within their jurisdiction. They must not only break the yoke, ver. 6, but take away the yoke, that those who have been oppressed may never be re-enslaved, as they were, Jer. xxxiv. 10, 11. They must likewise forbear threatening, Eph. vi. 9, and take away the putting forth of the finger; which seems to have been then, as sometimes with us, a sign of displeasure, and the indication of a purpose to correct. Let not the finger be put forth, to point at those that are poor and in misery, and so to expose them to contempt. Such expressions of contumely as are provoking, and the products of ill nature, ought to be banished from all societies; and let them not speak vanity, flattery, or fraud, to one another, but let all conversation be governed by sincerity. And perhaps that dissimulation which is the bane of friendship is meant by the putting forth of the finger, as Pr. vi. 13; by touching with the finger; or, it is putting forth the finger with the ring on it, which was the badge of authority, and which therefore they produced when they spake iniquity, that is, gave unrighteous sentences. 2. We must abound in all acts of charity and beneficence. We must not only give alms according as the necessities of the poor require, but, 1st. We must give freely and cheerfully, and from a principle of charity. We must draw out our soul to the hungry, ver. 10. Not only draw out the money, and reach forth the hand, but do this from the heart, heartily, and without grudging; from a principle of compassion, and with a tender affection to such as thou seest to be in misery. Let the heart go along with the gift, for God loves a cheerful giver, and so doth a poor man too. When our Lord Jesus healed and fed the multitude, it was with a compassion on them. 2nd. We must give plentifully and largely, so as not to tantalize, but to satisfy the afflicted soul. Do not only fill the belly of the hungry, but gratify the desire of the afflicted, and, if it lies in your power, make them easy. What are we born for, and what have we our abilities of body, mind, and estate for, but to do all the good we can in this world with them? And the poor we have always with us.

Secondly. Here is a full account of the blessings and benefits which attend the performance of this duty. If a person, a family, a people, be thus disposed to every thing that is good, let them know for their comfort that they shall find God their bountiful rewarder, and what they lay out in works of charity shall be abundantly made up to them.

1. God will surprise them with the return of mercy after great affliction, which shall be as welcome as the light of the morning after a long and dark night; ver. 8, "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning;" and, ver. 10, "Thy light shall rise in obscurity." Though thou hast been long buried alive, thou shalt recover thine eminency; long overwhelmed with grief, thou shalt again look pleasant as the dawning day. They that are cheerful in doing good, God will make them cheerful in enjoying good; and this also is a special gift of God, Eccl. ii. 24. They that have shewed mercy shall find mercy. Job, who in his prosperity had done a great deal of good, though he was reduced, yet God then raised him up friends that helped to set him up again, and his light rose in obscurity. And not only thy light which is sweet, but thy health too, or the healing of the wounds thou hast long complained of, shall spring forth speedily. All thy grievances shall be redressed, and thou shalt renew thy youth, and recover thy vigour. Those that have helped others out of trouble, God will help them when it is their turn.

2. God will put honour upon them. Good works shall be recompensed with a good name. This is included in that light which riseth out of obscurity. Though a man's extraction be mean, his family obscure, and he has no external advantages to gain him honour, yet, if he do good in his place, that will procure him respect and veneration, and his darkness shall by this means become as the noonday, that is, he shall become very eminent, and shine bright in his generation. See here, what is the surest way for a man to make himself illustrious; let him study to do good. He that would be the greatest of all, and best beloved, let him, by humility and industry, make himself a servant of all. "Thy righteousness shall" then "go before thee," that is, it shall introduce thee into the esteem of many, and make thee an interest; "Thy righteousness shall answer for thee," as Jacob saith, Gen. xxx. 33; that is, it shall silence reproaches; nay, it shall bespeak thee more praises than thy humility can be pleased with. He that "hath given to the poor, his righteousness endures for ever," that is, the honour of it, Ps. cxii. 9.

3. They shall always be safe under the Divine protection. "Thy righteousness shall go before thee," as the vanguard, to secure thee from enemies that charge thee in the front; and "the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward," the gathering host, to bring up those of thee that are weary, and are left behind, and to secure thee from the enemies that, like Amalek, fall upon thy rear. Observe, How good people are safe on all sides; look which way they will, behind them, before them, look back, look forward, they see themselves safe, and find themselves easy, and quiet from the fear of evil. And observe what it is that is their defence. It is their righteousness, and the glory of the Lord, that is, Christ, so some understand it; for it is by him that we are justified, and God is glorified. He it is that goes before us, and is the Captain of our salvation, as he is the Lord our righteousness. He it is that is our rearward, on whom alone we can depend for safety, when our sins pursue us, and are ready to take hold on us. Or, God himself, in his providence and grace, shall both go before thee, as thy guide to conduct thee and attend thee, as thy rearward to protect thee. And this shall be the reward of thy righteousness, and so shall be for the glory of the Lord as the rewarder of it.

4. God will be always nigh unto them to hear their prayers, ver. 9. As on the one hand, "he that shuts his ears to the cry of the poor shall himself cry, and God will not hear him," so, on the other hand, he that is liberal to the poor, his prayers shall come up with his alms for a memorial before God, as Cornelius' did, Acts x. 4. "Then shalt thou call" on thy fast-days, (which ought to be days of prayer,) "and the Lord shall answer," shall give thee the things thou callest to him for; "thou shalt cry," when thou art in any distress, or sudden fright, "and he shall say, Here I am," which is a very condescending expression of God's readiness to hear prayer. When God calls to us by his word, it becomes us to say, "Here we are; what saith our Lord unto his servants?" But that God should say to us, "Behold me, here I am," is strange. When we cry to him, as if he were at a distance, he will let us know that he is near, even at our right hand, nearer than we thought he was; "It is I, be not afraid." When danger is near, our Protector is nearer, a very present help; "Here I am," ready to give you what you want, and do for you what you desire. What have you to say to me? God is attentive to the prayers of the upright, Ps. cxxx. 2. No sooner do they call to him, but he answers, Ready, ready. Wherever they are praying, God saith, Here I am hearing; I am in the midst of you, nigh unto them in all things, Deu. iv. 7.

5. God will direct them in all difficult and doubtful cases; ver. 11, "The Lord shall guide thee continually." Whilst we are here in the wilderness of this world, we have need of continual direction from Heaven; for if at any time we be left to ourselves we shall certainly miss our way; and therefore it is to those who are good in God's sight, he gives that wisdom which in all cases is profitable to direct, and will be to them instead of eyes, Eccl. ii. 26. And his providence will make their way plain to them, both what is their duty and what will be most for their comfort.

6. God will give them abundance of satisfaction in their own minds. The world, as it is a wilderness in respect of wanderings, so that they need to be guided continually, so also in respect of wants, which makes it necessary that they have continual supplies; as Israel, in the wilderness, had not only the pillar of cloud to guide them continually, but manna, and water out of the rock, to satisfy their souls in drought, in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is, Ps. lxiii. 1. To a good man God gives not only wisdom and knowledge, but joy; he is satisfied in himself with the testimony of his conscience, and the assurances of God's favour. These will satisfy the soul, will put gladness into the heart, even in the drought of affliction. These will make fat the bones, and fill them with marrow; will give thee that pleasure which will be a support to thee, as the bones to the body, that joy of the Lord which will be thy strength. He shall give thy bones rest, so some read it; rest from pain and sickness, which they have laboured under, and been chastened with. So it agrees with that promise made to the merciful, Ps. xli. 1, 2, "The Lord shall make all his bed in his sickness." "Thou shalt be like a watered garden," so flourishing and fruitful in graces and comforts, "and like a spring of water," like a garden that has a spring of water in it, "whose waters fail not" either in droughts or frosts. The principle of holy love in those that are good shall be a well of living water, Jno. iv. 14; as a spring of water, though it is continually sending forth its streams, yet is always full, so the charitable man abounds in good, as he abounds in doing good, and is never the poorer for his liberality. "He that watereth shall himself be watered."

7. They and their families shall be public blessings. It is a good reward to those that are fruitful and useful, to be more so; and especially to have those who descend from them to be so too. This is here promised, ver. 12. They that now are of thee, thy princes and nobles, and great men, shall have such authority and influence as they never had. Or, those that hereafter shall be of thee, thy posterity, shall be serviceable to their generation, as thou art to thine; which completes the satisfaction of a good man as to this world, to think that those that come after him shall be doing good when he is gone. 1st. They shall re-edify cities that have been long in ruins; "shall build the old waste places," which had lain so long desolate, that the rebuilding of them was quite despaired of. This was fulfilled when the captives, after their return, repaired the cities of Judah, and dwelt in them, and many of those in Israel too, which had lain waste ever since the carrying away of the ten tribes. 2nd. They shall carry on and finish that good work which was begun long before, and shall be helped over the obstructions that had retarded the progress of it. They shall raise up to the top that building, the foundation of which was laid long since, and has been for many generations in the rearing. This was fulfilled when the building of the temple was revived, after it had stood still for many years, Ezr. v. 1. Or, they shall raise up foundations, which shall continue for many generations yet to come; they shall do that good which shall be of lasting consequence. 3rd. They shall have the blessing and praise of all about them; "Thou shalt be called," and celebrated as "the repairer of the breach," the breach made by the enemy in the wall of a besieged city, which whoso has the courage and dexterity to make up, or make good, gains great applause. Happy they who make up the breach at which virtue is running out, and judgments breaking in. Thou shalt be "the restorer of paths," safe and quiet paths, not only to travel in, but "to dwell in;" so safe and quiet, that people shall make no difficulty of building their houses by the roadside. The sum is, that if they keep such fasts as God hath chosen, he will settle them again in their former peace and prosperity, and there shall be none to make them afraid: see Zec. vii. 5, 9; viii. 3—5. And it teacheth us that those who do justly, and love mercy, shall have the comfort of it in this world.

13 If thou turn away thy foot from the sabbath,
From doing thy pleasure on my holy day;
And call the sabbath a delight,
The holy of the LORD, honourable;
And shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways,
Nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own
14 Then shalt thou delight thyself in the LORD; [words:
And I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth,
And feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father:
For the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it.

Great stress was always laid upon the due observation of the sabbath day; and it was particularly required from the Jews when they were captives in Babylon, because by keeping that day in honour of the Creator they distinguished themselves from the worshippers of the gods that have not made the heavens and the earth: see ch. lvi. 1, 2, where keeping the sabbath is joined, as here, with keeping judgment and doing justice. Some indeed understand this of the day of atonement which they think is the fast spoken of in the former part of the chapter, and which is called a sabbath of rest, Lev. xxiii. 32; but as the fasts before spoken of seem to be those that were occasional, so this sabbath is doubtless the weekly sabbath, that great sign between God and his professing people; his appointing it, a sign of his favour to them, and their observing it, a sign of their obedience to him. Now observe here,

First. How the sabbath is to be sanctified, ver. 13; and, there remaining still a sabbatism for the people of God, this law of the sabbath is still binding to us on our Lord's day.

1. Nothing must be done that puts contempt upon the sabbath day, or looks like having mean thoughts of it, when God has so highly dignified it. We must turn away our foot from the sabbath, from trampling upon it, as profane atheistical people do, from travelling on that day; so some. Turn away our foot from doing our pleasure on that holy day; that is, from living at large, and taking a liberty to do what we please on sabbath days, without the control and restraint of conscience; or, from indulging ourselves in the pleasures of sense, in which the modern Jews wickedly place the sanctification of the sabbath, though it is as great a profanation of it as any thing. On sabbath days we must not do our own ways, that is, not follow our callings; not find our own pleasure, that is, not follow our sports and recreations. Nay, we must not speak our own words, not words that concern either our callings or our pleasures; we must not allow ourselves a liberty of speech on that day as on other days, for we must then mind God's ways, make religion the business of the day, must choose the things that please him, and speak his words, speak of Divine things as we sit in the house, and walk by the way. In all we say and do, we must put a difference between this day and other days.

2. Every thing must be done that puts an honour on the day, and is expressive of our high thoughts of it. We must call it a delight, not a task and a burthen; must delight ourselves in it, in the restraints it lays upon us, and the services it obligeth us to. We must be in our element when we are worshipping God, and in communion with him: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" We must not only count it a delight, but call it so; must openly profess the complacency we take in the day and the duties of it; call it so to God in thanksgiving for it, and earnest desire of his grace, to enable us to do the work of the day in its day, because we delight in it; call it so to others, to invite them to come share in the pleasure of it; and we must call it so to ourselves, that we may not entertain the least thought of wishing the sabbath gone, that we may sell corn. We must call it the Lord's holy day, and honourable; call it holy, separated from common use, and devoted to God, and to his service; call it the holy of the Lord, the day which he hath sanctified to himself. Even in the Old Testament times, the sabbath was called the Lord's day, and therefore is fitly called so still; and for a farther reason, it is the Lord Christ's day, Rev. i. 10. It is holy, because it is the Lord's day; and upon both accounts it is honourable. It is a beauty of holiness that is upon it: and it is ancient, and its antiquity is its honour; and we must make it appear that we look upon it as honourable, by honouring him, that is, God, on that day. We then put honour upon the day, when we give honour to him that instituted it, and to whose honour it is dedicated.

Secondly. What the reward is of sabbath sanctification, ver. 14. If we thus "remember the sabbath day to keep it holy,"

1. We shall have the comfort it; the work will be its own wages. If we "call the sabbath a delight," then shall we delight ourselves in the Lord; he will more and more manifest himself to us, as the delightful subject of our thoughts and meditations, and the delightful object of our best affections. Note, The more pleasure we take in serving God, the more pleasure we shall find in it. If we go about duty with cheerfulness, we shall go from it with satisfaction, and shall have reason to say, "It is good to be here," good to draw near to God.

2. We shall have the honour of it: "I will make thee to ride upon the high places of the earth;" which notes not only great security, as that, ch. xxxiii. 16, "He shall dwell on high," but great dignity and advancement, Thou shalt ride in state, shalt appear conspicuous, and the eyes of all thy neighbours shall be upon thee. It was said of Israel, when God led them triumphantly out of Egypt, that he "made them to ride on the high places of the earth," Deu. xxxii. 12, 13. Those that honour God and his sabbath, he will thus honour them. If God by his grace enable us to live above the world, and so to manage it, as not only not to be hindered by, but to be furthered and carried on by it, in our journey towards heaven, then he makes us to ride on the high places of the earth.

3. We shall have the profit of it: "I will feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father;" that is, with all the blessings of the covenant, and all the precious products of Canaan, which was a type of heaven, and which were the heritage of Jacob. Observe, the heritage of believers is what they shall not only be portioned with hereafter, but fed with now; fed with the hopes of it, and not flattered; fed with the earnests and foretastes of it; and they that are so fed have reason to say that they are well fed. And that we may depend upon it, it is added, "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." You may take God's word for it, for he cannot lie nor deceive. What his mouth hath spoken his hand will give, his hand will do; and not one iota or tittle of his good promise shall fall to the ground. Blessed, therefore, thrice blessed, is he that doth this, and lays hold on it, that keeps the sabbath from polluting it.

CHAPTER LIX.

In this chapter we have sin appearing exceeding sinful, and grace appearing exceeding gracious; and as what is here said of the sinner's sin, ver. 7, 8, is applied to the general corruption of mankind, Rom. iii. 15, so what is here said of a redeemer, ver. 20, is applied to Christ, Rom. xi. 26. I. It is here charged upon this people, that they had themselves stopped the current of God's favours to them, and the particular sins are instanced in, which kept good things from them, ver. 1—8. II. It is here charged upon them, that they had themselves procured the judgments of God upon them; and they are told both what the judgments were which they had brought upon their own heads, ver. 9—11, and what the sins were that provoked God to send those judgments, ver. 12—15. III. It is here promised that, notwithstanding this, God would work deliverance for them, purely for his own name's sake, ver. 16—19; and would reserve mercy in store for them, and entail it upon them, ver. 20, 21.

BEHOLD, the LORD's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save;
Neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear: [God,
2 But your iniquities have separated between you and your
And your sins have hid his face from you, that he will 3 For your hands are defiled with blood, [not hear.
And your fingers with iniquity; [perverseness.
Your lips have spoken lies, your tongue hath muttered
4 None calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth:
They trust in vanity, and speak lies;
They conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity,
5 They hatch cockatrice' eggs,

PHRYGIAN BOA AND CERASTES.

And weave the spider's web:
He that eateth of their eggs dieth,
And that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper.
6 Their webs shall not become garments,
Neither shall they cover themselves with their works:
Their works are works of iniquity,
And the act of violence is in their hands.
7 Their feet run to evil,
And they make haste to shed innocent blood:
Their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity;
Wasting and destruction are in their paths.
8 The way of peace they know not;
And there is no judgment in their goings:
They have made them crooked paths:
Whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace.

The prophet here rectifies the mistake of those who had been quarrelling with God because they had not the deliverances wrought for them which they had been often fasting and praying for, ch. lviii. 3. Now here he shews,

First. That it was not owing to God. They had no reason to lay the fault upon him, that they were not saved out of the hands of their enemies. For, 1. He was still as able to help as ever; "His hand is not shortened," that is, his power is not at all lessened, straitened, or abridged, whether we consider the extent of his power or the efficacy of it. God can reach as far as ever, and with as strong a hand as ever. Note, The church's salvation comes from the hand of God, and that is not waxed weak, nor at all shortened. "Is the Lord's hand waxen short?" saith God to Moses, Num. xii. 23. No, it is not; he will not have it thought so. Neither length of time, nor strength of enemies, nor weakness of instruments, can shorten or straiten the power of God, with which it is "all one to save by many or by few." 2. He was still as ready and willing to help as ever, in answer to prayer. "His ear is not heavy, that it cannot hear." Though he has many prayers to hear and answer, and though he has been long hearing prayer, yet he is still as ready to hear prayer as ever. The prayer of the upright is as much his delight as ever it was; and the promises which are pleaded and put in suit and prayer are still Yea and Amen, inviolably sure. More is implied than is expressed; not only his ear is not heavy, but he is quick of hearing, even before they call he answers, ch. lxv. 24. If our prayers be not answered, and the salvation we wait for be not wrought for us, it is not because God is weary of hearing prayer, but because we are weary of praying; not because his ear is heavy when we speak to him, but because our ears are heavy when he speaks to us.

Secondly. That it was owing to themselves; they stood in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. God was coming towards them in ways of mercy, and they hindered him; "Your iniquities have kept good things from you," Jer. v. 25.

1. See what mischief sin doth. 1st. It hinders God's mercies from coming down upon us; it is a partition wall, that separates between God and us. Notwithstanding the infinite distance that is between God and man by nature, there was a correspondence settled between them, till sin set them at variance, justly provoked God against man, and unjustly alienated man from God. Thus it separates between them and God. He is your God, yours in profession; and therefore there is so much the more malignity and mischievousness in sin, which separates between us and him. It hides his face from us, which notes great displeasure, Deu. xxxi. 17. It provokes him in anger to withdraw his gracious presence, to suspend the tokens of his favour, and the instances of his help. He hides his face, as refusing to be seen or spoken with. See here sin in its colours, sin exceeding sinful, withdrawing the creature from his allegiance to his Creator; and see sin in its consequence, sin exceeding hurtful, separating us from God, and so separating us not only from all good, but to all evil, Deu. xxix. 13, which is the very quintessence of the curse. 2nd. It hinders our prayers from coming up unto God; it provokes him to hide his face, that he will not hear, as he hath said, ch. i. 15. If we regard iniquity in our heart, if we indulge it, and allow ourselves in it, God will not hear our prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18. We cannot expect he should countenance us while we go on to affront him.

2. Now, to justify God in hiding his face from them, and proceeding in his controversy with them, the prophet shews very largely, in the following verses, how many and great their iniquities were, according to the charge given him, ch. lviii. 1, to shew God's people their transgressions; and it is a black bill of indictment that is here drawn up against them, consisting of many particulars, any one of which was enough to separate between them and a just and holy God. Let us endeavour to reduce these articles of impeachment to proper heads.

1st. We must begin with their thoughts, for there all sin begins, and thence it takes its rise. Their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity, ver. 7. Their imaginations are so, only evil continually; their projects and designs are so, they are continually contriving some mischief or other, how to compass the gratification of some base lust; ver. 4, "They conceive mischief" in their fancy, purpose, counsel, and resolution; thus the embryo receives its shape and life and then "they bring forth iniquity," put it in execution when it is ripened for it. Though it be in pain, perhaps, that the iniquity is brought forth, through the oppositions of providence, and the checks of their own consciences, yet when they have compassed their wicked purpose, they look upon it with as much pride and pleasure as if it were a man child born into the world. "Thus when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin," Jas. i. 15; this is called, ver. 5, "hatching the cockatrice' eggs, and weaving the spider's web." See how the thoughts and contrivances of wicked men are employed, and about what they set their wits on work. First. At the best it is about that which is foolish and frivolous. Their thoughts are vain, like weaving the spider's web, which the poor silly animal takes a great deal of pains about, and when all is done it is a weak insignificant thing, a reproach to the place where it is, and which the besom sweeps away in an instant. Such are the thoughts which worldly men entertain themselves with, building castles in the air, and pleasing themselves with imaginary satisfactions; like the spider, that takes hold with her hands very finely, Pr. xxx. 28, but cannot keep her hold. Secondly. Too often it is about that which is malicious and spiteful; "They hatch the eggs of the cockatrice," or adder, which are poisonous, and produce venomous creatures. Such are the thoughts of the wicked that delight in doing mischief. "He that eats of their eggs," that is, that has any dealing with them, "dieth," that is, he is in danger of having some mischief or other done him; "and that which is crushed" in order to be eaten of, or which begins to be hatched, and you promise yourself some useful fowl from it, it "breaks out into a viper," which it is at your peril if you meddle with it. Happy they that have least to do with such ill men. Even the spider's web they wove was with a spiteful design to catch flies in it, and make a prey of them; for, rather than not be doing mischief, they will play at small game.

2nd. Out of this abundance of wickedness in the heart their mouth speaks; and yet it doth not always speak out the wickedness that is within, but, for the more effectual compassing of the mischievous design, it is dissembled and covered with much fair speech; ver. 3, "Your lips have spoken lies;" and again, ver. 4, they speak lies, pretending kindness, where they intend the greatest mischief. Or, by slanders and false accusations, they blasted the credit and reputation of those they had a spite to, and so did them a real mischief unseen; and perhaps, by suborning witnesses against them, took from them their estates and lives. For a false tongue is sharp arrows and coals of juniper, and every thing that is mischievous. "Your tongue has muttered perverseness." When they could not for shame speak their malice against their neighbours aloud, or durst not, for fear of being disproved and put to confusion, they muttered it secretly. Backbiters are called whisperers.

3rd. Their actions were all of a piece with their thoughts and words. They were guilty of shedding innocent blood, a crime of the most heinous nature; "Your hands are defiled with blood," ver. 3. For blood is defiling, leaves an indelible stain of guilt upon the conscience, which nothing but the blood of Christ can cleanse it from; and this not by surprise, or when there was something of a force put upon them, ver. 7, their feet run to this evil, naturally and eagerly, and hurried on by the impetus of their malice and revenge; "They make haste to shed innocent blood," as if they were afraid of losing an opportunity to do a barbarous thing, Pr. i. 16; Jer. xxii. 17. "Wasting and destruction are in their paths." Wherever they go they carry mischief along with them; and the tendency of their way is to lay waste and destroy, nor do they care what havock they make. Nor do they only thirst after blood; but with other iniquities are their fingers defiled, ver. 3. They wrong people in their estates, and make every thing their own that they can lay their hands on; "They trust in vanity," ver. 4, that is, they depend upon their arts of cozenage to enrich themselves with, which will prove vanity to them, and their deceiving others will but deceive themselves. Their work, which they take so much pains about, and have their hearts so much upon, are all works of iniquity. Their whole business is one continued course of oppressions and vexations, and the act of violence is in their hands, according to the arts of violence that are in their heads, and the thoughts of violence in their hearts.

4th. No methods are taken to redress these grievances, and reform these abuses; ver. 4, "None calleth for justice." None complains of the violation of the sacred laws of justice, nor seeks to right those that suffer wrong, or to get the laws put in execution against vice and profaneness, and those lewd practices which are the shame, and threaten to be the bane, of the nation. Note, When justice is not done, there is blame to be laid, not only upon the magistrates that should administer justice, but upon the people that should call for it. Private persons ought to contribute to the public good, by discovering secret wickedness, and giving those an opportunity to punish it that have it in the power of their hands; but it is ill with a state when princes rule ill, and the people love to have it so. Truth is opposed, and there is not any that pleadeth for it, nor any that has the conscience and courage to appear in defence of an honest cause, and confront a prosperous fraud and wrong. The way of peace is as little regarded as the way of truth. They know it not; that is, they never study the things that make for peace. No care is taken to prevent or punish the breakers of the peace, and to accommodate matters in difference among neighbours; they are utter strangers to every thing that looks quiet and peaceable, and affect that which is blustering and turbulent. "There is no judgment in their goings," that is, they have not any sense of justice in their dealings; it is a thing they make no account of at all, but can easily break through all its fences, if they stand in the way of their malicious covetous designs.

5th. In all this they act foolishly, very foolishly, and as much against their interest as against reason and equity. They that practise iniquity trust in vanity, which will certainly deceive them; ver. 4, "Their webs" which they weave with so much art and industry, "shall not become garments, neither shall they cover themselves," either for shelter or for ornament, "with their works," ver. 6. They may do hurt to others with their projects, but can never do any real service or kindness to themselves by them. There is nothing to be got by sin; and so it will appear, when profit and loss come to be compared. Those paths of iniquity are crooked paths, ver. 8, which will perplex them, but will never bring them to their journey's end. Whosoever goes therein, though they say they shall have peace, though they go on, deceive themselves; for they shall not know peace, as appears by the following verses.

9 Therefore is judgment far from us,
Neither doth justice overtake us:
We wait for light, but behold obscurity;
For brightness, but we walk in darkness.
10 We grope for the wall like the blind,
And we grope as if we had no eyes:
We stumble at noon day as in the night;
We are in desolate places as dead men.
11 We roar all like bears,
And mourn sore like doves:
We look for judgment, but there is none;
For salvation, but it is far off from us.
12 For our transgressions are multiplied before thee,
And our sins testify against us:
For our transgressions are with us;
And as for our iniquities, we know them;
13 In transgressing and lying against the LORD,
And departing away from our God,
Speaking oppression and revolt,
Conceiving and uttering from the heart words of falsehood.
14 And judgment is turned away backward,
And justice standeth afar off:
For truth is fallen in the street,
And equity cannot enter.
15 Yea, truth faileth;
And he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey:
And the LORD saw it,
And it displeased him that there was no judgment.

The scope of this paragraph is the same with that of the last, to shew that sin is the great mischief-maker; as it is that that keeps good things from us, so it is that that brings evil things upon us. But, as there it is spoken by the prophet in God's name to the people for their conviction and humiliation, and that God might be justified when he speaketh, and clear when he judgeth, so here it seems to be spoken by the people to God, as an acknowledgment of that which was there told them, and an expression of their humble submission and subscription to the justice and equity of God's proceedings against them. Their uncircumcised hearts here seem to be humbled in some measure, and they are brought to confess,—the confession is at least extorted from them,—that God hath justly walked contrary to them, because they had walked contrary to him.

First. They acknowledge that God had contended with them, and had walked contrary to them. Their case was very deplorable, ver. 9—11. 1. They were in distress, trampled upon, and oppressed by their enemies; unjustly dealt with, and ruled with rigour, and God did not appear for them to plead their just and injured cause. "Judgment is far from us, neither doth justice overtake us." Though, as to our persecutors, we are sure we have right on our side, and they are the wrong-doers, yet we are not relieved, we are not righted, we have not done justice to one another, and therefore God suffers our enemies to deal thus unjustly with us, and we are as far as ever from being restored to our right, and recovering our property again. Oppression is near us, and "judgment is far from us;" our enemies are far from giving our case its due consideration, but still hurry us on with the violence of their oppressions, and "justice does not overtake us," to rescue us out of their hands. 2. Herein their expectations were sadly disappointed, which made their case the more sad. "We wait for light," as they that wait for the morning, "but behold obscurity;" we cannot discern the least dawning of the day of our deliverance; "we look for judgment, but there is none," ver. 11; neither God nor man appears for our succour. "We look for salvation," because God, we think, has promised it, and we have prayed for it with fasting. We looked for it as for brightness, "but it is far off from us," as far off as ever, for aught we can perceive, and still "we walk in darkness;" and the higher our expectations have been raised the sorer is the disappointment. 3. They were quite at a loss what to do to help themselves, and were at their wit's end; ver. 10, "We grope for the wall like the blind;" we see no way open for our relief, nor know which way to expect it, or what to do in order to it. If we shut our eyes against the light of Divine truth, it is just with God to hide from our eyes the things that belong to our peace; and, if we use not our eyes as we should, to let us be as if we had no eyes. They that will not see their duty shall not see their interest. They whom God hath given up to a judicial blindness are strangely infatuated; "they stumble at noonday as in the night;" they see not either those dangers or those advantages which all about them see. Quos Deus vult perdere, eos dementat,—'God infatuates those whom he means to destroy.' Those that love darkness rather than light, so shall their doom be. 4. They sunk into despair, and were quite overwhelmed with grief, the marks of which appeared in every man's countenance; they grew melancholy upon it, shunned conversation, and affected solitude. "We are in desolate places as dead men." The state of the Jews in Babylon is represented by dead and dry bones, Eze. xxxvii. 1, and the reddition of the comparison there, ver. 11, explains this text, "Our hope is lost, we are cut off for our parts." In this despair the sorrow and anguish of some was loud and noisy, "We roar like bears;" the sorrow of others was silent, and preyed more upon their spirits, "We mourn sore like doves," like doves of the valleys; we mourn both for our iniquities, Eze. vii. 16, and "for our calamities." Thus they own that "the hand of the Lord was gone out against them."

Secondly. They acknowledge that they had provoked God thus to contend with them; that he had done right, for they had done wickedly, ver. 12—15. 1. They owned that they had sinned, and that to this day they were in a great trespass, as Ezra speaks, Ezr. x. 7, "Our transgressions are with us," the guilt of them is upon us, the power of them prevails among us. We are not yet reformed, nor have we parted with our sins, though they have done us so much mischief; nay, "our transgressions are multiplied," they are more numerous, and more heinous than they have been formerly. Look which way we will, we cannot look off them; all places, all orders and degrees of men, are infected. The sense of our transgression is with us, as David said, "My sin is ever before me;" it is too plain to be denied or concealed, too bad to be excused or palliated. God is a witness to them; they are multiplied before thee, in thy sight, under thine eye. We are witnesses against ourselves; "As for our iniquities we know them," though they may have foolishly endeavoured to cover them; nay, they themselves are witnesses; our sins stare us in the face, and testify against us, so many have they been, and so deeply aggravated. 2. They own the great evil and malignity there is in sin, in their sin; it is "transgressing and lying against the Lord," ver. 13. The sins of those that profess themselves God's people, and bear his name, are, upon this account, worse than the sins of others, that, in transgressing, they "lie against the Lord;" that is, they falsely accuse him; they misrepresent and belie him, as if he had dealt hardly and unfairly with them; or they perfidiously break covenant with him, and falsify their most sacred and solemn engagements to him. That is lying against him; it is departing away from our God, to whom we are obliged as ours, and to whom we ought to cleave with purpose of heart. From him we have departed, as the rebellious subject from his allegiance to his rightful prince, and the adulterous wife from the guide of her youth, and the covenant of her God. 3. They own that there was a general decay of moral honesty; and it is not strange that those who were false to their God are never faithful to one another. They spoke oppression, declared openly for that, though it was a revolt from their God, and a revolt from truth, by the sacred bonds of which we should always be tied, and held fast. They "conceived and uttered words of falsehood." Many an ill thing is conceived in the mind, yet is prudently stifled there, and not suffered to go any farther; but these sinners were so impudent, so daring, that whatever wickedness they conceived they gave it an imprimatur,—'a sanction,' and made no difficulty of publishing it. To think an ill thing is bad, but to say it is much worse. Many a word of falsehood is uttered in haste, for want of consideration; but these were conceived and uttered, were uttered deliberately, and of malice prepense. They were words of falsehood, and yet they are said to be uttered from the heart; because, though they differed from the real sentiments of the heart, and therefore were words of falsehood, yet they agreed with the malice and wickedness of the heart, and were the natural language of that; it was a double heart, Ps. xii. 2. Those who by the grace of God kept themselves free from these enormous crimes yet put themselves into the confession of sin, because members of that nation which was generally thus corrupted. 4. They own that that was not done which might have been done to reform the land, and to amend what was amiss; ver. 14, "Judgment," that should go forward, and bear down the opposition that is made to it, that should run its course like a river, like a mighty stream, "is turned away backward" a contrary course. The administration of justice is become but an umbrage to the greatest injustice. "Judgment," that should check the proceedings of fraud and violence, "is driven back," and so they go on triumphantly. "Justice stands afar off," even from our courts of judicature, which are so crowded with the patrons of oppression, that "equity cannot enter," cannot have admission into the court, cannot be heard, or at least shall not be heeded. Equity enters not into the unrighteous decrees which they decree; ch. x. 1, "Truth is fallen in the street," and there she may lie, to be trampled upon by every foot of pride, and she has never a friend that will lend a hand to help her up; yea, truth faileth in common conversation, and in dealings between man and man, so that one knows not whom to believe, nor whom to trust. 5. They own that there was a prevailing enmity in men's minds to those that were good. He that doth evil goes unpunished, but "he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey" to those beasts of prey that were before described. It is crime enough with them for a man not to do as they do; and they treat him as an enemy that will not partake with them in their wickedness. 'He that departeth from evil is accounted mad,' so the margin reads it. Sober singularity is branded as folly; and he is thought next door to a madman that swims against the stream that runs so strong. 6. They own that all this could not but be very displeasing to the God of heaven. The evil was done in his sight; they knew very well, though they were not willing to acknowledge it, that "the Lord saw it;" though it was done secretly, and gilded over with specious pretences, yet it could not be concealed from his all-seeing eye. All the wickedness that is in the world is naked and open before the eyes of God; and as he is of quicker eyes than not to see iniquity, so he is of purer eyes than to behold it with the least approbation or allowance. He "saw it, and it displeased him;" though it was among his own professing people that he saw it, "it was evil in his eyes;" he saw the sinfulness of all this sin, and that which was most offensive to him was, that "there was no judgment," no reformation. Had he seen any signs of that, though the sin displeased him, he would soon have been reconciled to the sinners, upon their returning from their evil way. Then the sin of a nation becomes national, and brings public judgments, when it is not restrained by public justice.

16 And he saw that there was no man,
And wondered that there was no intercessor:
Therefore his arm brought salvation unto him;
And his righteousness, it sustained him.
17 For he put on righteousness as a breastplate,
And an helmet of salvation upon his head;
And he put on the garments of vengeance for clothing,
And was clad with zeal as a cloke.
18 According to their deeds, accordingly he will repay,
Fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies;
To the islands he will repay recompence.
19 So shall they fear the name of the LORD from the west,
And his glory from the rising of the sun.
When the enemy shall come in like a flood,
The Spirit of the LORD shall lift up a standard against him.
20 And the Redeemer shall come to Zion,
And unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob,
saith the LORD.
21 As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the LORD;
My spirit that is upon thee,
And my words which I have put in thy mouth,
Shall not depart out of thy mouth,
Nor out of the mouth of thy seed,
Nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the LORD,
From henceforth and for ever.

How sin abounded, we have read, to our great amazement, in the former part of the chapter; how grace doth much more abound, we read in these verses. And, as sin took occasion from the commandment to become more exceeding sinful, so grace took occasion from the transgression of the commandment to appear more exceeding gracious. Observe,

First. Why God wrought salvation for this provoking people, notwithstanding their provocations. It was purely for his own name's sake; because there was nothing in them either to bring it about or to induce him to bring it about for them; no merit to deserve it, no might to effect it; he would do it himself, would be exalted in his own strength, for his own glory. 1. He took notice of their weakness and wickedness; "he saw that there was no man" that would do any thing for the support of the bleeding cause of religion and virtue among them; not a man that would execute judgment, Jer. v. 1; that would bestir himself in a work of reformation. Those that complained of the badness of the times yet had not zeal and courage enough to appear and act against it; there was a universal corruption of manners, and nothing done to stem the tide. Most were wicked, and those that were not so, yet were weak, and durst not attempt any thing in opposition to the wickedness of the wicked. "There was no intercessor;" either none to intercede with God, to stand in the gap, by prayer to turn away his wrath, (it would have pleased him to be thus met, and he wondered that he was not,) or rather, none to interpose for the support of justice and truth, that were trampled upon, and run down, ver. 14; no advocate to speak a good word for those that were made a prey of, because they kept their integrity, ver. 15. They complained God did not appear for them, ch. lviii. 3; but God, with much more reason, complains that they did nothing for themselves, intimating how ready he would have been to do them good, if he had found among them the least motions towards a reformation. 2. He engaged his own strength and righteousness for them. They shall be saved for all this. And,

1st. Because they have no strength of their own, nor any active men that will set to it in good earnest, to redress the grievances either of their iniquities or of their calamities, therefore his own arm shall bring salvation to him; that is, to his people, or to him whom he would raise up to be the deliverer, Christ the power of God and arm of the Lord, that man of his right hand whom he made strong for himself. The work of reformation,—that is the first and principal article of the salvation,—shall be wrought by the immediate influence of the Divine grace on men's consciences. Since magistrates and societies for reformation fail of doing their part,—one will not do justice, nor the other call for it,—God will let them know he can do it without them, when his time is come thus to prepare his people for mercy. And then the work of deliverance shall be wrought by the immediate operations of the Divine providence on men's affections and affairs. When God stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, and brought his people out of Babylon, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, then his own arm, which is never shortened, brought salvation.

2nd. Because they have no righteousness of their own to merit these favours, and to which God might have an eye in working for them, therefore his own "righteousness it sustained him," and bore him out in it. Divine justice, which by their sins they had armed against them, through grace appears for them. Though they can expect no favour as due to them, yet he will be just to himself, to his own purpose, and promise, and covenant with his people; he will in righteousness punish the enemies of his people: see Deu. ix. 5, "Not for thy righteousness, but for the wickedness of these nations," they are driven out. In our redemption by Christ, since we had no righteousness of our own to produce, on which God might proceed in favour to us, he brought in a righteousness by the merit and mediation of his own Son; it is called "the righteousness which is of God by faith," Phil. iii. 9; and this righteousness sustained him, and bore him out in all his favours to us, notwithstanding our provocations. "He put on righteousness as a breastplate," securing his own honour as a breastplate doth the vitals, in all his proceedings, by the justice and equity of them; and then he put a "helmet of salvation upon his head." So sure is he to effect the salvation he intends, that he takes salvation itself for his helmet, which therefore must needs be impenetrable, and in which he appears very illustrious; formidable in the eyes of his enemies, and amiable in the eyes of his friends. When righteousness is his coat of arms, salvation is his crest. In allusion to this, among the pieces of a Christian's armour, we find "the breastplate of righteousness, and for a helmet the hope of salvation," Eph. vi. 14, 17; 1 Thes. v. 8; and it is called the armour of God, because he wore it first, and so fitted it for us.

3rd. Because they have no spirit or zeal to do any thing for themselves, God will "put on the garments of vengeance for clothing, and clad himself with zeal as a cloak;" that is, he will make his justice upon the enemies of his church and people, and his jealousy for his own glory and the honour of religion and virtue among men, to appear evident and conspicuous in the eye of the world; and in these he will shew himself great, as a man shews himself in his rich attire, or in the distinguishing habit of his office. If men be not zealous against sin, God will, and will take vengeance on it for all the injury it has done to his honour, and his people's welfare. And this was the business of Christ in the world, to take away sin, and be revenged on it.

Secondly. What the salvation is that shall be wrought out by the righteousness and strength of God himself.

1. There shall be a present temporal salvation wrought out for the Jews in Babylon, or elsewhere, in distress and captivity. This is promised, ver. 18, 19, as a type of something farther. When God's time is come, he will do his own work, though those fail that should forward it. It is here promised,

1st. That God will reckon with his enemies, and will render to them "according to their deeds;" to the enemies of his people abroad, that have oppressed them; to the enemies of justice and truth at home, that have oppressed them, for they also are God's enemies; and when the day of vengeance comes, he will deal with both as they have deserved; 'according to retributions,' so the word is; the law of retribution, Rev. xiii. 10; or, according to former retributions, as he has rendered to his enemies formerly, "accordingly he will" now "repay fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies." His fury shall not exceed the rules of justice, as men's fury commonly doth. Even "to the islands," that lie most remote, if they have appeared against him, "he will repay recompence;" for "his hand shall find out all his enemies," Ps. xxi. 8, and his arrows reach them. Though God's people have carried themselves so ill that they do not deserve to be delivered, yet his enemies carry themselves so much worse that they do deserve to be destroyed.

2nd. That whatever attempts the enemies of God's people may afterwards make upon them to disturb their peace, they shall be baffled, and brought to nought. "When the enemy shall come in like a flood," like a high spring-tide, or a land-flood, which threaten to bear down all before them without control, then "the Spirit of the Lord," by some secret, undiscerned power, "shall lift up a standard against him;" and so, as the margin reads it, 'put him to flight.' He that hath delivered will still deliver. When God's people are weak and helpless, and have no standard to lift up against the invading power, God will "give a banner to them that fear him," Ps. lx. 4; will, by his Spirit, lift up a standard, which will draw multitudes together to appear on the church's behalf. Some read it, 'He shall come,' (that is, the name of the Lord, and his glory before foreseen of the Messiah promised,) 'like a straight river, the Spirit of the Lord lifting him up for an ensign.' Christ, by the preaching of his Gospel, shall cover the earth with the knowledge of God, as with the waters of a flood; the Spirit of the Lord setting up Christ as a standard to the Gentiles, ch. xi. 10.

3rd. That all this should redound to the glory of God, and the advancement of religion in the world; ver. 19, "So shall they fear the name of the Lord and his glory," in all nations that lie eastward or westward. The deliverance of the Jews out of captivity, and the destruction brought on their oppressors, would awaken multitudes to inquire concerning the God of Israel, and induce them to serve and worship him, and enlist themselves under the standard which the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up. God's appearances for his church shall occasion the accession of many to it. This had its full accomplishment in gospel times, when many came from the east and west to fill up the places of the children of the kingdom that shall be cast out, when there were set up eastern and western churches, Mat. viii. 11.

2. There shall be a more glorious salvation wrought out by the Messiah in the fulness of time; which salvation all the prophets upon all occasions had in view. We have here the two great promises relating to that salvation:

1st. That the Son of God shall come to us to be our Redeemer; ver. 20, "The Redeemer shall come." It is applied to Christ, Rom. xi. 26, "There shall come the Deliverer." The coming of Christ as the Redeemer is the summary of all the promises both of the Old and New Testament; and this was the redemption in Jerusalem which the believing Jews looked for, Lu. ii. 38. Christ is our goel, our next kinsman, that redeems both the person and the estate of the poor debtor. Observe, First. The place where this Redeemer shall appear. He shall come to Zion, for there, on that holy hill, the Lord would set him up as his King, Ps. ii. 6. In Zion the chief corner-stone was to be laid, 1 Pet. ii. 6. He came to his temple there, Mal. iii. 1. There salvation was to be placed, ch. xlvi. 13; for thence the law was to go forth, ch. ii. 3. Zion was a type of the gospel church, for which the Redeemer acts in all his appearances. The Redeemer shall come for the sake of Zion, so the Seventy read it. Secondly. The persons that shall have the comfort of the Redeemer's coming, that shall then lift up their heads, knowing that their redemption draws nigh. He shall come to those that turn from ungodliness in Jacob, to those that are in Jacob, to the praying seed of Jacob, in answer to their prayers; yet not to all that are in Jacob, that are within the pale of the visible church, but to those only that turn from transgression, that repent and reform, and forsake those sins which Christ came to redeem them from. The sinners in Zion will fare never the better for the Redeemer's coming to Zion if they go on still in their trespasses.

2nd. That the Spirit of God shall come to us to be our Sanctifier, ver. 21. In the Redeemer there was a new covenant made with us, a covenant of promises; and this is the great and comprehensive promise of that covenant, that God will give and continue his word and Spirit to his church and people throughout all generations. God's giving the Spirit to them that ask him includes the giving them all good things, Lu. xi. 13; Mat. vii. 11. This covenant is here said to be made with them; that is, with them that turn from transgression; for they that cease to do evil shall be taught to do well. But the promise is made to a single person, "My Spirit that is upon thee;" being directed either, First. To Christ, as the head of the church, who received that he might give. The Spirit promised to the church was first upon him, and from his head that precious ointment descended to the skirts of his garments; and the word of the Gospel was first put into his mouth, for it began to be spoken by the Lord. And all believers are his seed, in whom he prolongs his days, ch. liii. 10. Or, Secondly. To the church; and so it is a promise of the continuance and perpetuity of the church in the world to the end of time, parallel to those promises that the throne and seed of Christ shall endure for ever, Ps. lxxxix. 29, 36; xxii. 30. Observe, 1*st.* How the church shall be kept up. In a succession, as the world of mankind is kept up, by the seed, and the seed's seed; as one generation passeth away another generation shall come; "instead of the fathers shall be the children." 2*nd.* How long it shall be kept up. "From henceforth and for ever," always, "even unto the end of the world;" for, the world being left to stand for the sake of the church, we may be sure that as long as it doth stand, Christ will have a church in it, though not always visible. 3*rd.* By what means it shall be kept up. By the constant residence of the word and Spirit in it. (1.) The Spirit that was upon Christ shall always continue in the hearts of the faithful. There shall be some in every age on whom he shall work, and in whom he shall dwell; and thus the Comforter shall abide with the church for ever, Jno. xiv. 16. (2.) The word of Christ shall always continue in the mouths of the faithful; that is, there shall be some in every age who, believing with the heart unto righteousness, shall with the tongue make confession unto salvation. The word shall never depart out of the mouth of the church, for there shall still be a seed to speak Christ's holy language, and profess his holy religion. Observe, The Spirit and the word go together, and by them the church is kept up; for the word in the mouths of our ministers, nay, the word in our own mouths, will not profit us unless the Spirit work with the word, and give us an understanding. But the Spirit doth his work by the word, and in concurrence with it; and whatever is pretended to be a dictate of the Spirit must be tried by the Scriptures. On these foundations the church is built, stands firm, and shall stand for ever, Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.

CHAPTER LX.

This whole chapter is all to the same purpose, all in the same strain. It is a part of God's covenant with his church, which is spoken of in the last verse of the foregoing chapter; and the blessings here promised are the fruits of the word and Spirit there promised. The long continuance of the church, even unto the utmost ages of time, was there promised; and here the large extent of the church, even unto the utmost regions of the earth; and both these tend to the honour of the Redeemer. It is here promised, I. That the church should be enlightened and shined upon, ver. 1, 2. II. That it should be enlarged, and great additions made to it, to join with it in the service of God, ver. 3—8. III. That the new converts should be greatly serviceable to the church, and to the interests of it, ver. 9—13. IV. That the church shall be in great honour and reputation among men, ver. 14—16. V. That it shall enjoy a profound peace and tranquillity, ver. 17, 18. VI. That the members of it being all righteous, the glory and joy of it shall be everlasting, ver. 19—22. Now this has some reference to the peaceable and prosperous condition which the Jews were sometimes in, after their return out of captivity into their own land; but it certainly looks farther, and was to have its full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, the enlargement of that kingdom by the bringing in of the Gentiles into it, and the spiritual blessings in heavenly things by Christ Jesus, with which it should be enriched; and all these earnests of eternal joy and glory.

ARISE, shine; for thy light is come,
And the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee.
2 For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth,
And gross darkness the people:
But the LORD shall arise upon thee,
And his glory shall be seen upon thee.
3 And the Gentiles shall come to thy light,
And kings to the brightness of thy rising.
4 Lift up thine eyes round about, and see:
All they gather themselves together, they come to thee:
Thy sons shall come from far,
And thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side.
5 Then thou shalt see, and flow together,
And thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged; [thee,
Because the abundance of the sea shall be converted unto
The forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee.
6 The multitude of camels shall cover thee,
The dromedaries of Midian and Ephah;
All they from Sheba shall come:
They shall bring gold and incense;
And they shall shew forth the praises of the LORD.
7 All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered together unto
The rams of Nebaioth shall minister unto thee: [thee,
They shall come up with acceptance on mine altar,
And I will glorify the house of my glory.
8 Who are these that fly as a cloud,
And as the doves to their windows?

It is here promised that the Gospel temple shall be very lightsome, and very large.

First. It shall be very lightsome; "Thy light is come." When the Jews returned out of captivity they had light and gladness, and joy and honour; they were then made to know the Lord, and to rejoice in his great gladness; and upon both accounts their light came. When the Redeemer came to Zion he brought light with him, he himself came to be a light. Now observe, 1. What this light is, and whence it springs. "The Lord shall arise upon thee," ver. 2; that is, the glory of the Lord, ver. 1, that shall be seen upon thee. God is the father and fountain of lights, and it is in his light that we shall see light. As far as we have the knowledge of God in us, and the favour of God towards us, our light is come. When God appears to us, and we have the comfort of his favour, then the glory of the Lord riseth upon us as the morning light. When he appears for us, and we have the credit of his favour, when he shews us some token for good, and proclaims his favour to us, then his glory is seen upon us, as it was upon Israel in the pillar of cloud and fire. When Christ arose as the Sun of righteousness, and in him the dayspring from on high visited us, then the glory of the Lord was seen upon us, the glory as of the firstbegotten of the Father. 2. What a foil there shall be to this light; "Darkness shall cover the earth." But though it be gross darkness, darkness that might be felt, like that of Egypt, that shall overspread the people, yet the church, like Goshen, shall have light at the same time. When the case of the nations that have not the Gospel shall be very melancholy, those dark corners of the earth being full of the habitations of cruelty to poor souls, the state of the church shall be very pleasant. 3. What is the duty which the rising of this light calls for; "Arise, shine." Not only receive this light, and, as the margin reads it, be enlightened by it, but reflect this light; arise and shine with rays borrowed from it. The children of light ought to shine as lights in the world. If God's glory be seen upon us to our honour we ought not only with our lips, but in our lives, to return the praise of it to his honour, Mat. v. 16; Phil. ii. 15.

Secondly. It shall be very large. When the Jews were settled again in their own land after their captivity, many of the people of the land joined themselves to them; but it doth not appear that there ever was any such numerous accession to them as would answer the fulness of this prophecy; and therefore we must conclude that this looks farther, to the bringing of the Gentiles into the gospel church: not their flocking to one particular place, though under that type it is here described, (there is no place now that is the centre of the church's unity,) but their flocking to Christ, and coming by faith, and hope, and holy love into that society, which is incorporated by the charter of his Gospel, and of the unity of which he only is the centre; that family which is named from him, Eph. iii. 15. And the gospel church is expressly called Zion and Jerusalem; and under that notion all believers are said to come to it, Heb. xii. 22; "Ye are come unto mount Zion, to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem;" which serves for a key to this prophecy, Eph. ii. 19. Observe,

1. What shall invite such multitudes to the church. "They shall come to thy light, and to the brightness of thy rising," ver. 3. They shall be allured to join themselves to thee, 1st. By the light that shines upon thee; the light of the glorious Gospel, which the churches hold forth, and therefore are called golden candlesticks. This light, which discovers so much of God, and his good will to man, by which life and immortality are brought to light, this shall invite all the serious, well-affected part of mankind to come and join themselves to the church, that they may have the benefit of this light, to inform them concerning truth and duty. 2nd. By the light with which thou shinest. The purity and love of the primitive Christians, their heavenly-mindedness, contempt of the world, and patient sufferings, were the brightness of the church's rising, which drew many into it. The beauty of holiness was the powerful attractive by which Christ had a willing people brought to him in the day of his power, Ps. cx. 3.

2. What multitudes shall come to the church. Great numbers shall come; Gentiles, or "nations of them which are saved," as it is expressed with allusion to this, Rev. xxi. 24. Nations shall be discipled, Mat. xxviii. 19, and even kings, men of figure, power, and influence, shall be added to the church. They come from all parts; ver. 4, "Lift up thine eyes round about and see" them coming; "devout men out of every nation under heaven," Acts ii. 5. See how white the fields are already to the harvest, Jno. iv. 35. See them coming in a body, as one man, and with one consent; "They gather themselves together," that they may strengthen one another's hands, and encourage one another. Come, and let us go, ch. ii. 3. They come from the remotest parts; they come to thee from far, having heard the report of thee, as the Queen of Sheba; or seen thy star in the east, as the wise men, and they will not be discouraged by the length of the journey from coming to thee. There shall come some of both sexes; sons and daughters shall come in the most dutiful manner, as thy sons and thy daughters, resolved to be of thy family, to submit to the laws of thy family, and put themselves under the tuition of it. They shall come to be nursed at thy side; that is, to have their education with thee from their cradle. The church's children must be nursed at her side, not sent out to be nursed among strangers. There, where alone the sincere milk of the word is to be had, must the church's new-born babes be nursed, that they may grow thereby, 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. They that would enjoy the dignities and privileges of Christ's family must submit to the discipline of it.

3. What they shall bring with them, and what advantage shall accrue to the church by their accession to it. They that are brought into the church by the grace of God will be sure to bring all they are worth in with them, which, with themselves, they will devote to the honour and service of God, and do good with in their places. 1st. The merchants shall write "holiness to the Lord" upon their merchandise and their hire, as ch. xxiii. 18; "The abundance of the sea," either the wealth that is fetched out of the sea, the fish, the pearls, or that which is imported by sea, it shall all be converted to thee, and to thy use. The wealth of the rich merchants shall be laid out in works of piety and charity. 2nd. The mighty men of the nations shall employ their might in the service of the church. "The forces," or troops, "of the Gentiles shall come unto thee," to guard thy coasts, strengthen thine interests, and, if occasion be, to fight thy battles. The forces of the Gentiles had often been against the church, but now they shall be for it; for as God, when he pleaseth, can, and when we please him will, make even our enemies to be at peace with us, Pr. xvi. 7, so, when Christ overcomes the strong man armed he divides his spoils, and makes that to serve his interests which had been used against them, Lu. xi. 22. 3rd. The wealth imported by land carriage, as well as that by sea, shall be made use of in the service of God and the church; ver. 6, the camels and dromedaries that bring gold and incense; gold, to make the golden altar of, and incense and sweet perfumes to burn upon it. They of Midian and Sheba shall bring the richest commodities of their country; not to trade with, but to honour God with; and not in small quantities, but camel loads of them. This was in part fulfilled when the wise men of the east, (perhaps some of the countries here mentioned,) drawn by the brightness of the star, came to Christ, and presented to him treasures of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, Mat. ii. 11. 4th. Great number of sacrifices shall be brought to God's altar, acceptable sacrifices; and though brought by Gentiles they shall find acceptance, ver. 7. Kedar was famous for flocks, and it is likely the fattest rams were those of Nebaioth; they shall come up with acceptance on God's altar. God must be served and honoured with what we have, according as he hath blessed us, and with the best we have. This was fulfilled when, by the decree of Darius, the governors beyond the rivers (perhaps of some of these countries) were ordered to furnish the temple at Jerusalem with "bullocks, rams, and lambs, for the burnt offerings of the God of heaven," Ezr. vi. 9. And it had a farther accomplishment, and we trust will have, in the bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles to the church, which is called the sacrificing, or offering up of the Gentiles unto God, Rom. xv. 16. The flocks and rams are precious souls; for they are said to minister to the church, and to come up as living sacrifices, presenting themselves to God by a reasonable service on his altar, Rom. xii. 1.

4. How God shall be honoured by the increase of the church, and the accession of such numbers to it. 1st. They shall intend the honour of God's name in it. When they bring their gold and incense it shall not be to shew the riches of their country, or to gain applause to themselves for piety and devotion, but to "shew forth the praises of the Lord," ver. 6. Our greatest services and gifts to the church are not acceptable farther than we have an eye to the glory of God in them. And this must be our business in our attendance on public ordinances, to give unto the Lord the glory due to his name; and therefore, as these here, we are called out of darkness into light that we should shew forth the praises of him that called us, 1 Pet. ii. 9. 2nd. God will advance the honour of his own name by it. So he hath said, ver. 7, "I will glorify the house of my glory." The church is the house of God's glory, where he manifests his glory to his people, and receives that homage by which they do honour to him; and it is for the glory of this house, and of him that keeps house there, both that the Gentiles shall bring their offerings to it, and that they shall be accepted therein.

5. How the church shall herself be affected with this increase of her numbers, ver. 5. 1st. She shall be in a transport of joy upon this account; Thou shalt see, and flow together, or flow to and fro, as in a pleasing toss about it, surprised at it, but extremely glad of it. 2nd. There shall be a mixture of fear with this joy; "Thine heart shall fear;" doubting whether it be lawful to go in to the uncircumcised, and eat with them. Peter was so possessed with this fear that he needed a vision and voice from heaven to help him over it, Acts x. 28. But, 3rd. When this fear is conquered, thy heart shall be enlarged in holy love; so enlarged that thou shalt have room in it for all the Gentile converts. Thou shalt not have such a narrow soul as thou hast had, nor affections so confined within the Jewish pale. When God intends the beauty and prosperity of his church he gives this largeness of heart, and an extensive charity. 4th. These converts flocking to the church shall be mightily admired; ver. 8, Who are these that fly as a cloud? Observe, First. How the conversion of souls is here described. It is flying to Christ, and to his church; for thither we are directed. It is flying like a cloud, though in great multitudes, so as to overspread the heavens, yet with great unanimity, all as one cloud. They shall come with speed, as a cloud flying on the wings of the wind; and come openly and in the view of all, their very enemies beholding them, Rev. xi. 12, and yet not able to hinder them. They shall fly as "doves to their windows," in great flights, many together; they fly on the wings of the harmless dove, that flies low, noting their innocency and humility. They fly to Christ, to the church, to the word and ordinances, as doves, by instinct, to their own windows, to their own home; thither they fly for refuge and shelter, when they are pursued by the birds of prey; and thither they fly for rest when they have been wandering, and are weary, as Noah's dove to the ark. Secondly. How the conversion of souls is here admired; it is spoken of both with wonder and pleasure. "Who are these?" We have reason to admire with wonder that so many flock to Christ; when we see them all together we shall admire whence they all came; and we have reason to admire with pleasure and affection those that flock to him. Who are these? How excellent, how amiable are they! What a pleasant sight is it to see poor souls hastening to Christ, with a full resolution to abide with him!

9 Surely the isles shall wait for me,
And the ships of Tarshish first,
To bring thy sons from far,
Their silver and their gold with them,
Unto the name of the LORD thy God, [thee.
And to the Holy One of Israel, because he hath glorified
10 And the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls,
And their kings shall minister unto thee:
For in my wrath I smote thee,
But in my favour have I had mercy on thee.
11 Therefore thy gates shall be open continually;
They shall not be shut day nor night;
That men may bring unto thee the forces of the Gentiles,
And that their kings may be brought.
12 For the nation and kingdom
That will not serve thee shall perish;
Yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted.
13 The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee,
The fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together,
To beautify the place of my sanctuary;
And I will make the place of my feet glorious.
14 The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee;
And all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down
at the soles of thy feet;
And they shall call thee, The city of the LORD,
The Zion of the Holy One of Israel.

The promises made to the church in the foregoing verses are here repeated, ratified, and enlarged upon; designed still for the comfort and encouragement of the Jews after their return out of captivity; but certainly looking farther to the enlargement and advancement of the gospel church, and the abundance of spiritual blessings with which it shall be enriched.

First. God will be very gracious and propitious to them. We must begin with that promise, because thence all the rest take rise. The sanctuary that was desolate then begins to be repaired, when God causeth his face to shine upon it, Dan. ix. 17. All the favour that the people of God find with men is owing to the light of God's countenance, and his favour to them, ver. 10. All shall now make court to thee, for "in my wrath I smote thee," while thou wast in captivity. And the sufferings of the church, especially by its corruptions, decays, and divisions, against which these promises here will be its relief, are sad tokens of God's displeasure; but now "in my favour have I had mercy on thee," and therefore have all this mercy in store for thee.

Secondly. Many shall be brought in to the church, even from far countries; ver. 9, "Surely the isles shall wait for me," shall welcome the Gospel, and shall attend God with their praises for it and their ready subjection to it. The ships of Tarshish, transport-ships, shall lie ready to carry members from far distant regions to the church, or, which is equivalent, to carry the ministers of the church to remote parts to preach the Gospel, and to bring in souls to join themselves to the Lord. Observe, 1. Who are brought; Thy sons, that is, such as are designed to be so, those "children of God that are scattered abroad," Jno. xi. 52. 2. What they shall bring with them. They live at such a distance that they cannot bring their flocks and their rams; but like those who lived remote from Jerusalem, when they came up to worship at the feast, because they could not bring their tithes in specie, turned it into money, they shall bring "their silver and their gold with them." Note, When we give up ourselves to God we must, with ourselves, give up all we have to him. If we honour him with our spirits we will honour him with our substance. 3. To whom they shall devote and dedicate themselves and all they are worth. To "the name of the Lord thy God," to God as the Lord of all, and the church's God and King, even to the Holy One of Israel, whom Israel worships as a Holy One, in the beauty of holiness, "because he hath glorified thee." Note, The honour God puts upon his church and people should not only engage us to honour them, but invite us to join ourselves to them; "We will go with you, for God is with you," Zec. viii. 23.

Thirdly. Those that come into the church shall be welcome; for so spacious is the holy city, that though, Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, yet still there is room. "Therefore thy gates shall be open continually," ver. 11, not only because thou hast no reason to fear thine enemies, but because thou hast reason to expect thy friends. And it is usual with us to leave our doors open, or leave some to be ready to open them all night, if we look for a child or a guest to come in late. Note, Christ is always ready to entertain those that come to him, is never out of the way, nor can they ever come unseasonably. The gate of mercy is always open, night and day, or shall soon be opened to them that knock. Ministers, the door-keepers, must be always ready to admit those that offer themselves to the Lord. God not only keeps a good house in his church, but he keeps open house; that at any time, by the preaching of the word, in season and out of season, the forces of the Gentiles, and the kings or commanders of those forces, may be brought into the church. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," and let such welcome guests as these come in.

Fourthly. All that are about the church shall be made, some way or other, serviceable to it. Though dominion is far from being founded in men's grace, it is founded in God's; and he that made the inferior creatures useful to man will make the nations of men useful to the church: the earth helped the woman; all things are for your sakes. So here, ver. 10, even the sons of strangers, that have neither knowledge of thee nor kindness for thee, that have always been aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, even they shall build up thy wall, and their kings shall in that and other things minister unto thee, and not think it any disparagement to them. This was fulfilled when the king of Persia and the governors of the provinces, by his order, were aiding and assisting Nehemiah in building the wall about Jerusalem. Rather than Jerusalem's walls shall lie still in ruins, the sons of the stranger shall be raised up to build them. Even those that do not belong to the church yet may be a protection to it. And the greatest of men should not think it below them to minister to the church, but rejoice that they are in a capacity and have a heart to do it any service; nay, it is the duty of all to do what they can in their places to advance the interest of God's kingdom among men. It is at their peril if they do not: for, ver. 12, "The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish." Not that they must perish by thy sword or thine anathemas, or as if this gave any countenance to the using of external force for the propagating of the Gospel, or as if men might be compelled by penalties and punishments to come into the church; by no means. But those who will not by faith submit to Jesus Christ, the king of the church, and serve him, they shall perish eternally, Ps. ii. 12. They that will not be subject to Christ's golden sceptre, to the government of his word and Spirit, that will not be brought under or kept in by the discipline of his family, shall be broken in pieces by his iron rod; "Bring them forth, and slay them before me," Lu. xix. 27. Nations of such shall be utterly and eternally wasted when Christ comes to take vengeance on those that obey not his Gospel, 2 Thes. i. 8.

Fifthly. There shall be abundance of beauty added to the ordinances of Divine worship, ver. 13. The glory of Lebanon, the strong and stately cedars that grow there, shall come unto thee, as of old to Solomon, when he built the temple, 2 Chron. ii. 16, and with them other timber, proper for the carved work thereof, which the enemy had broken down, Ps. lxxiv. 5, 6. The temple, the place of God's sanctuary, shall not only be rebuilt, but beautified; it is the place of his feet, where he rests and resides, Eze. xliii. 7. The ark is called his footstool, because it was under the mercy-seat, Ps. cxxxii. 7. This he will make glorious in the eyes of his people and of all their neighbours. The glory of the latter house, to which this refers, though in many instances inferior, yet was really greater than the glory of the former, because Christ came to that temple, Mal. iii. 1. It was likewise "adorned with goodly stones and gifts," Lu. xxi. 5, to which this promise may have some reference; yet so slightly did Christ speak of them there that we must suppose it to have its full accomplishment in the beauties of holiness, and the graces and comforts of the Spirit, with which gospel ordinances are adorned and enriched.

Sixthly. The church shall appear truly great and honourable, ver. 14. The people of the Jews, after their return out of captivity, by degrees became more considerable, and made a better figure than one would have expected, after they had been so much reduced, and than any of the other nations recovered that had been in like manner humbled by the Chaldeans. It is probable many of those who had oppressed them in Babylon, when they were themselves driven out by the Persians, made their court to the Jews for shelter and supply, and were willing to scrape acquaintance with them. It is farther fulfilled, when those that have been enemies to the church are wrought upon by the grace of God to see their error, and come and join themselves to it. "The sons of them that afflicted thee," if not they themselves, yet their children, shall truckle to thee, shall beg pardon for their folly, and beg an interest in thy favour, and admission into thy family, 1 Sam. ii. 36. A promise like this is made to the church of Philadelphia, Rev. iii. 9; and it is intended to be, 1. A mortification to the proud oppressors of the church, that have afflicted her and despised her, and took a pleasure in doing it. They shall be brought down, their spirits shall be broken, and their condition shall be so mean and miserable, that they shall be glad to be obliged to those whom they have most studied to disoblige. Note, Sooner or later God will pour contempt upon those that put contempt upon his people. 2. An exaltation to the poor oppressed ones of the church. And this is the honour that shall be done them,—they shall have an opportunity of doing good to those who have done evil to them, and saving those alive that have afflicted and despised them. It is a pleasure to a good man, and he accounts it an honour, to shew mercy to those with whom he has found no mercy. Yet this is not all; they shall not only become supplicants to thee for their own interest, but they shall give honour to thee, "They shall call thee the city of the Lord;" they shall at length be convinced that thou art a favourite of heaven, and the particular care of the Divine providence. That city is truly great and honourable, it is strong, it is rich, it is safe, it is beautiful, it is the most desirable place that can be to live in, which is the city of the Lord, which he owns, in which he dwells, in which religion is uppermost. Such a one is Zion; it is the place which God hath chosen to put his name there; it is "the Zion of the Holy One of Israel," therefore we may be sure a holy city, else the Holy One of Israel would never be called the patron of it.

15 Whereas thou hast been forsaken and hated,
So that no man went through thee,
I will make thee an eternal excellency,
A joy of many generations.
16 Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles,
And shalt suck the breast of kings:
And thou shalt know that I the LORD am thy Saviour
And thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob.
17 For brass I will bring gold,
And for iron I will bring silver,
And for wood brass,
And for stones iron:
I will also make thy officers peace,
And thine exactors righteousness.
18 Violence shall no more be heard in thy land,
Wasting nor destruction within thy borders;
But thou shalt call thy walls Salvation,
And thy gates Praise.
19 The sun shall be no more thy light by day;
Neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee:
But the LORD shall be unto thee an everlasting light,
And thy God thy glory.
20 Thy sun shall no more go down;
Neither shall thy moon withdraw itself:
For the LORD shall be thine everlasting light,
And the days of thy mourning shall be ended.
21 Thy people also shall be all righteous:
They shall inherit the land for ever,
The branch of my planting,
The work of my hands, that I may be glorified.
22 A little one shall become a thousand,
And a small one a strong nation:
I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

The happy and glorious state of the church is here farther foretold, referring principally and ultimately to the Christian church, and the spiritual peace of that; but under the type of that little gleam of outward peace which the Jews sometimes enjoyed after their return out of captivity. This is here spoken of,

First. As compared with what it had been. This made her peace and honour the more pleasant, that her condition had been much otherwise.

1. She had been despised, but now she should be honoured, ver. 15, 16. Jerusalem had been forsaken and hated, abandoned by her friends, abhorred by her enemies; no man went through that desolate city, but declined it as a rueful spectacle; it was an astonishment and a hissing. But now it shall be made an eternal excellency, being reformed from idolatry, and having recovered the tokens of God's favour, and it shall be the joy of good people for many generations. Yet, considering how short Jerusalem's excellency was, and how short it came of the vast compass of this promise, we must look for the full accomplishment of it in the perpetual excellences of the gospel church, far exceeding those of the Old Testament church, and the glorious privileges and advantages of the Christian religion, which are indeed the joy of many generations. Two things are here spoken of as her excellency and joy, in opposition to her having been forsaken and hated: 1st. She shall find herself countenanced by her neighbours. The nations and their kings that are brought to embrace Christianity shall lay themselves out for the good of the church, and maintain its interests, with the tenderness and affection that the nurse shews to the child at her breast, ver. 16, "Thou shalt suck the milk of the Gentiles," not suck their blood, that is, not the spirit of the Gospel; thou shalt "suck the breast of kings," which shall be to thee as nursing fathers. 2nd. She shall find herself countenanced by her God; "Thou shalt know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer," shall know it by experience; for such a salvation, such a redemption shall be wrought out for thee, as plainly discovers itself to be the work of the Lord, the work of a mighty One, for it is a great salvation; of the Mighty One of Jacob, for it secures the welfare of all those that are Israelites indeed. They before knew the Lord to be their God; now they know him to be their Saviour, their Redeemer. Their Holy One now appears their Mighty One.

2. She had been impoverished, but now she shall be enriched, and every thing shall be changed for the better with her, ver. 17. When those who were raised out of the dust are set among princes, instead of brass money in their purses they have gold, and silver vessels in their houses instead of iron ones, and other improvements agreeable. So much shall the spiritual glory of the New Testament church exceed the external pomp and splendour of the Jewish economy, which had no glory in comparison with that which quite excels it, 2 Cor. iii. 10. When we had baptism in the room of circumcision, the Lord's supper in the room of the passover, and the gospel ministry in the room of a Levitical priesthood, we had gold instead of brass. Sin turned gold into brass, when Rehoboam made brazen shields, instead of the golden ones he had pawned; but God's favour, when that returns, will turn brass again into gold.

3. She had been oppressed by her own princes, which was sadly complained of, not only as her sin, but as her misery, ch. lix. 14; but now all the grievances of that kind shall be redressed, ver. 17. "I will make thine officers peace;" men of peace shall be made officers, and shall be indeed justices, not patrons of injustice, and justices of peace, not instruments of trouble and vexation. They shall be peace, that is, they shall sincerely seek thy welfare, and by their means thou shalt enjoy good. They shall be peace, for they shall be righteousness; and then the peace is as a river, when the righteousness is as the waves of the sea. Even exactors, whose business it is to demand the public tribute, though they be exact, must not be exacting, but must be just to the subject as well as to the prince; and, according to the instructions John Baptist gave to the publicans, must exact no more than is appointed them, Lu. iii. 13.

4. She had been insulted by her neighbours, invaded, spoiled, and plundered; but now it shall be so no more, ver. 18, "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land," neither the threats and triumphs of those that do violence, nor the outcries and complaints of those that suffer violence, shall again be heard, but every man shall peacefully enjoy his own. There shall be no wasting or destruction, either of persons or possessions, any where within thy borders; but thy walls shall be called salvation, they shall be safe and means of safety to thee, and thy gates shall be praise, praise to thee, every one shall commend thee for the good condition they are kept in, and praise to thy God, who strengthens the bars of thy gates, Ps. cxlvii. 13. When God's salvation is upon the walls, it is fit his praises should be in the gates, the places of concourse.

Secondly. As completed in what it shall be. It should seem that in the close of this chapter we are directed to look farther yet, as far forward as to the glory and happiness of heaven, under the type and figure of the flourishing state of the church on earth, which yet was never such as to come any thing near to what is here foretold; and divers of the images and expressions here made use of we find in the description of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 23, and xxii. 5. As the prophets sometimes insensibly pass from the blessings of the Jewish church to the spiritual blessings of the Christian church, which are eternal, so sometimes they rise from the church militant to the church triumphant, where, and where only, all the promised peace, and joy, and honour, will be in perfection.

1. God shall be all in all in the happiness here promised; so he is always to true believers, ver. 19. The sun and moon shall be no more thy light, that is, God's people, when they enjoy his favour and walk in the light of his countenance, make little account of sun and moon and other the lights of this world, but could walk comfortably in the light of the Lord, though they should withdraw their shining. In heaven there shall be no occasion for sun or moon, for it is "the inheritance of the saints in light," such light as will swallow up the light of the sun as easily as the sun doth that of a candle. Idolaters worshipped the sun and moon, which some have thought the most ancient and plausible idolatry; but those "shall be no more thy light," shall no more be idolised. But the Lord shall be to thee a constant light, both day and night; in the night of adversity as well as in the day of prosperity. Those that make God their only light shall have him their all-sufficient light, their sun and sield; "Thy God, thy glory." Note, God is the glory of those whose God he is, and will be so to eternity. It is their glory that they have him for their God, and they glory in it; it is to them instead of beauty. God's people are, upon this account, an honourable people, that they have an interest in God as theirs in covenant.

2. The happiness here promised shall know no change, period, or allay; ver. 20, "Thy sun shall no more go down," but it shall be eternal day, eternal sunshine with thee. That shall not be thy sun which is sometimes eclipsed, often clouded; and, let it shine never so bright, never so warm, will certainly set, and leave thee in the dark, in the cold, in a few hours; but he shall be a sun, a fountain of light to thee, who is himself the Father of all lights, with whom there is no variableness nor shadow of turning, Jam. i. 17. We read of the sun's standing still once, and not hasting to go down for the space of a day, and it was a glorious day, never was the like. But what was that to the day that shall never have a night? Or, if it had, it should be a light night, for "neither shall thy moon withdraw itself;" it shall never wane, shall never change, but be always at the full. The comforts and joy that are in heaven, the glories provided for the soul, as the light of the sun, and those prepared for the glorified body too, as the light of the moon, shall never know the least cessation or interruption; how should they, when the Lord shall himself be thine everlasting light—a light which never wastes, nor can ever be extinguished? "And the days of thy mourning shall be ended," so as never to return; for all tears shall be wiped away, and the fountains of them, sin and affliction, dried up, so that "sorrow and sighing shall flee away" for ever.

3. Those that are entitled to this happiness, being duly prepared and qualified for it, shall never be put out of the possession of it, ver. 21. "Thy people" that shall inhabit this new Jerusalem "shall be all righteous," all justified by the righteousness of the Messiah, all sanctified by his Spirit; all that people, that Jerusalem, must be righteous, must have that "holiness without which no man shall see the Lord." They are all righteous; for we know that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. There are no people on earth that are all righteous; there is a mixture of some bad in the best societies on this side heaven, but there are no mixtures there. They shall be all righteous, that is, they shall be entirely righteous; as there shall be none corrupt among them, so there shall be no corruption in them; the spirits of just men shall there be made perfect. And there shall be all the righteous together, that shall replenish the new Jerusalem; it is called "the congregation of the righteous," Ps. i. 5. And because they are "all righteous," therefore "they shall inherit the land for ever," for nothing but sin can turn them out of it. The perfection of the saints' holiness secures the perpetuity of their happiness.

4. The glory of the church shall redound to the honour of the church's God; They shall appear to be "the branch of my planting, the work of my hands," and I will own them as such. It was by the grace of God that they were designed to this happiness; they are the branch of his planting, or of his plantations. He broke them off from the wild olive, and grafted them into the good olive; transplanted them out of the field, when they were as tender branches, into his nursery; that, being now planted in his garden on earth, they might shortly be removed to his paradise in heaven. It was by his grace likewise, that they were prepared and fitted for this happiness; they are the work of his hands, Eph. ii. 10; are wrought to the self-same thing, 2 Cor. v. 5. It is a work of time, and, when it shall be finished, will appear a work of wonder; and God will be glorified, who begun it, and carried it on; for the Lord Jesus will then be admired in all them that believe. God will glorify himself in glorifying his chosen.

5. They will appear the more glorious, and God will be the more glorified in them, if we compare what they are with what they were; the happiness they are arrived to with the smallness of their beginnings; ver. 22, "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation." The captives that returned out of Babylon strangely multiplied, and became a strong nation. The Christian church was a little one, a very small one at first; the number of the names was once but one hundred and twenty; yet it became a thousand.

The stone cut out of the mountain without hands swelled so as to fill the earth. The triumphant church, and every glorified saint, will be a thousand out of a little one, a strong nation out of a small one. The grace and peace of the saints was at first like a grain of mustard seed; but it increaseth and multiplieth, and makes a little one to become a thousand, the weak to be as David. When they come to heaven, and look back upon the smallness of their beginning, they will wonder how they got thither; and so wonderful is all this promise that it needed the ratification with which it is closed, "I the Lord will hasten it in his time." All that is here said relating to the Jewish and Christian church, to the militant and triumphant church, and to every particular believer. 1st. It may seem too difficult to be brought about, and therefore may be despaired of; but the God of almighty power hath undertaken it. I the Lord will do it, who can do it, and who have determined to do it. It will be done by him whose power is irresistible and his purposes unalterable. 2nd. It may seem to be delayed and put off so long that we are out of hopes of it; but, as the Lord will do it, so he will hasten it; will do it with all convenient speed. Though much time may be passed before it is done, no time shall be lost; he will hasten it in its time, in the proper time, in the season wherein it will be beautiful. He will do it in the time appointed by his wisdom, though not in the time prescribed by our folly. And this is really hastening it; for, though it seem to tarry, it doth not tarry, if it come in God's time; for we are sure that that is the best time, which he that believes will patiently wait for.

CHAPTER LXI.

In this chapter, I. We are sure to find the grace of Christ, published by himself to a lost world, in the everlasting Gospel, under the type and figure of Isaiah's prophecy, which was to foretell the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, ver. 1—3. II. We think we find the glories of the church of Christ, its spiritual glories, described under the type and figure of the Jews' prosperity after their return out of their captivity. 1. It is promised that the decays of the church shall be repaired, ver. 4; 2. That those from without shall be made serviceable to the church, ver. 5; 3. That the church shall be a royal priesthood, maintained by the riches of the Gentiles, ver. 6; 4. That she shall have honour and joy, in lieu of all her shame and sorrow, ver. 7; 5. That her affairs shall prosper, ver. 8; 6. That posterity shall enjoy these blessings, ver. 9; 7. That righteousness and salvation shall be the eternal matter of the church's rejoicing and thanksgiving, ver. 10, 11. If the Jewish church was ever thus blessed, much more shall the Christian church be so, and all that belong to it.

THE Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me;
Because the LORD hath anointed me
To preach good tidings unto the meek;
He hath sent me to bind up the brokenhearted,
To proclaim liberty to the captives,
And the opening of the prison to them that are bound;
2 To proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD,
And the day of vengeance of our God;
To comfort all that mourn;
3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion,
To give unto them beauty for ashes,
The oil of joy for mourning,
The garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness;
That they might be called trees of righteousness,
The planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified.

He that is the best expositor of Scripture has, no doubt, given us the best exposition of these verses, even our Lord Jesus himself, who read this in the synagogue at Nazareth, (perhaps it was the lesson for the day,) and applied it entirely to himself, saying, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears," Lu. iv. 17, 18, 21. And the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth in opening of this text were admired by all that heard them. As Isaiah was authorized and directed to proclaim liberty to the Jews in Babylon, so was Christ God's messenger, to publish a more joyful jubilee to a lost world. And here we are told,

First. How he was fitted and qualified for this work. "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me," ver. 1. The prophets had the Spirit of God moving them at times, both instructing them what to say and exciting them to say it; but Christ had the Spirit always resting on him without measure; but to the same intent that the prophets had, as a spirit of counsel and a spirit of courage, ch. xi. 1—3. When he entered upon the execution of his prophetical office, the Spirit, as a dove, descended upon him, Mat. iii. 16. This Spirit which was upon him he communicated to those whom he sent to proclaim the same glad tidings, saying to them, when he gave them their commission, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," thereby ratifying it.

Secondly. How he was appointed and ordained to it. The Spirit of God is upon me, because the Lord God has anointed me. What service God called him to he furnished him for; therefore gave him his Spirit, because he had, by a solemn and sacred unction, set him apart to this great office, as kings and priests were of old destined to their offices by anointing. Hence the Redeemer was called the Messiah, the Christ, because he was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows. "He hath sent me." Our Lord Jesus did not go unsent, he had a commission from him that is the fountain of power; the Father sent him, and gave him commandment. This is a great satisfaction to us, that whatever Christ said he had a warrant from heaven for. His doctrine was not his, but his that sent him.

Thirdly. What the work was to which he was appointed and ordained.

1. He was to be a preacher, was to execute the office of a prophet. So well pleased was he with the good will God shewed towards men through him, that he would himself be the preacher of it; that an honour might thereby be put upon the ministry of the Gospel, and the faith of the saints might be confirmed and encouraged. He must "preach good tidings" (so Gospel signifies) "to the meek," to the penitent, and humble, and poor in spirit; to them the tidings of a Redeemer will be indeed good tidings, pure Gospel, faithful sayings, and worthy of all acceptation. The poor are commonly best disposed to receive the Gospel, Jas. ii. 5; and then it is likely to profit us when it is received with meekness, as it ought to be. To such Christ preached good tidings, when he said, "Blessed are the meek."

2. He was to be a healer; was sent "to bind up the broken-hearted;" as pained limbs are rolled to give them ease, as broken bones and bleeding wounds are bound up, that they may knit and close again. Those whose hearts are broken for sin, that are truly humbled under the sense of guilt, and dread of wrath, are furnished in the Gospel of Christ with that which will make them easy, and silence their fears. Those only who have experienced the pains of a penitential contrition may expect the pleasure of Divine cordials and consolations.

3. He was to be a deliverer. He was sent as a prophet to preach, as a priest to heal, and as a king to issue out proclamations; and those of two kinds: 1st. Proclamations of peace to his friends. He shall "proclaim liberty to the captives," (as Cyrus did to the Jews in captivity,) "and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." Whereas by the guilt of sin we are bound over to the justice of God, are his lawful captives, sold for sin till payment be made of that great debt, Christ lets us know that he has made satisfaction to Divine justice for that debt, that his satisfaction is accepted; and if we will plead that, and depend upon it, and make over ourselves and all we have to him, in a grateful sense of the kindness he hath done us, we may by faith sue out our pardon, and take the comfort of it; there is, and shall be no condemnation to us. And whereas by the dominion of sin in us we are bound under the power of Satan, sold under sin, Christ lets us know that he hath conquered Satan; hath destroyed him that had the power of death, and his works, and provided for us grace sufficient, to enable us to shake off the yoke of sin, and to loose ourselves from those bands of our neck. The Son is ready by his Spirit to make us free, and then shall we be free indeed; not only discharged from the miseries of captivity, but advanced to all the immunities and dignities of citizens. This is the Gospel proclamation, and it is like the blowing of the jubilee trumpet, which proclaimed the great year of release, Lev. xxv. 9, 40; in allusion to which it is here called "the acceptable year of the Lord," the time of our acceptance with God, which is the original of our liberties. Or, it is called the year of the Lord, because it publisheth his free grace to his own glory; and an acceptable year, because it brings glad tidings to us, and what cannot but be very acceptable to those who know the capacities and necessities of their own souls. 2nd. Proclamations of war against his enemies. Christ proclaims "the day of vengeance of our God;" the vengeance he takes, First. On sin and Satan, death and hell, and all the powers of darkness, that were to be destroyed, in order to our deliverance. These Christ triumphed over in his cross, having spoiled and weakened them, shamed them, and made a show of them openly, and therein took vengeance on them for all the injury they had done, both to God and man, Col. ii. 15. Secondly. On those of the children of men that stand it out against those fair offers. They shall not only be left as they deserve in their captivity, but be dealt with as enemies. We have the Gospel summed up, Mar. xvi. 16, where that part of it, "He that believeth shall be saved," proclaims "the acceptable year of the Lord," to those that will accept of it; but the other part, "He that believes not shall be damned," proclaims "the day of vengeance of our God," that vengeance which he will take of those that "obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ," 2 Thes. i. 8.

4. He was to be a comforter; and so he is a preacher, healer, and deliverer. He is sent "to comfort all that mourn," and, mourning, seek to him, and not to the world for comfort. Christ not only provides comfort for them, and proclaims it, but he applies it to them; he doth by his Spirit comfort them. There is enough in him to comfort all that mourn, whatever their sore or sorrow is; but this comfort is sure to them that mourn in Zion, that is, that sorrow after a godly sort, according to God, for his residence is in Zion; that mourn because of Zion's calamities and desolations, and mingle their tears by a holy sympathy with those of all God's suffering people, though they themselves are not in trouble; such tears God has a bottle for, Ps. lvi. 8, such mourners he has comfort in store for. As blessings out of Zion are spiritual blessings, so mourners in Zion are holy mourners; such as carry their sorrows to the throne of grace, (for in Zion was the mercy-seat,) and pour them out, as Hannah did, before the Lord. To such as these Christ hath appointed by his Gospel, and will give by his Spirit, ver. 3, those consolations which will not only support them under their sorrows, but turn them into songs of praise. He will give them, 1st. "Beauty for ashes;" whereas they lay in ashes, as was usual in times of great mourning, they shall not only be raised out of their dust, but made to look pleasant. Note, The holy cheerfulness of Christians is their beauty, and a great ornament to their profession. Here is an elegant paronomasia in the original, he will give them pheer,—'beauty,' for epher,—'ashes;' he will turn their sorrow into joy as quickly and as easily as you can transpose a letter, for he speaks and it is done. 2nd. The "oil of joy," which makes the face to shine, instead of mourning, which disfigures the countenance, and makes it unlovely. This oil of joy the saints have from that oil of gladness with which Christ himself was anointed above his fellows, Heb. i. 9. 3rd. "The garments of praise," such beautiful garments as were worn on thanksgiving days, instead of the spirit of heaviness, dimness, or contraction; open joys for secret mournings; the spirit of heaviness they keep to themselves. Zion's mourners weep in secret; but the joy they are recompensed with, they are clothed with, as with a garment, in the eye of others. Observe, Where God gives the oil of joy, he gives the garment of praise. Those comforts which come from God dispose the heart to, and enlarge the heart in, thanksgivings to God. Whatever we have the joy of, God must have the praise and glory of.

5. He was to be a planter; for the church is God's husbandry. Therefore he will do all this for his people, will cure their wounds, release them out of bondage, and comfort them in their sorrows, "that they may be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord;" that they might be so, and be acknowledged to be so; that they may be ornaments to God's vineyard, and may be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness, as the branches of God's planting, ch. lx. 21. All that Christ doth for us is to make us God's people, and some way serviceable to him, as living trees, planted in the house of the Lord, and flourishing in the courts of our God. And all this "that he may be glorified;" that is, that we may be brought to glorify him by a sincere devotion, and an exemplary conversation; for "herein is our Father glorified, that we bring forth much fruit;" and that others also may take occasion from God's favour shining on his people, and his grace shining in them, to praise him; and that he might be for ever glorified in his saints.

4 And they shall build the old wastes,
They shall raise up the former desolations,
And they shall repair the waste cities,
The desolations of many generations.
5 And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks,
And the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.
6 But ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD:
Men shall call you the Ministers of our God:

Ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles,
And in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.
7 For your shame ye shall have double;
And for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion:
Therefore in their land they shall possess the double:
Everlasting joy shall be unto them.
8 For I the LORD love judgment,
I hate robbery for burnt offering;
And I will direct their work in truth,
And I will make an everlasting covenant with them.
9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles,
And their offspring among the people;
All that see them shall acknowledge them,
That they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

Promises are here made to the Jews now returned out of captivity, and settled again in their own land, which are to be extended to the gospel church, and all believers, who through grace are delivered out of spiritual thraldom; for they are capable of being spiritually applied.

First. It is promised that their houses shall be rebuilt, ver. 4; that their cities should be raised out of the ruins in which they had long lain, and should be fitted up for their use again. "They shall build the old wastes;" that is, the old wastes shall be built, the waste cities shall be repaired, the former desolations, even "the desolations of many generations," which it was feared would never be repaired, shall be raised up. The setting up of Christianity in the world repaired the decays of natural religion, and raised up those desolations both of piety and honesty which had been for many generations the reproach of mankind. An unsanctified soul is like a city that is broken down, and has no walls, like a house in ruins; but by the power of Christ's Gospel and grace it is repaired, it is put in order again, and fitted to be a habitation of God through the Spirit. And they shall do this, they that are released out of captivity; for we are brought out of the house of bondage, that we may serve God both in building up ourselves to his glory and helping to build up his church on earth.

Secondly. They that were so lately servants themselves, working for their oppressors, and lying at their mercy, shall now have servants to do their work for them, and be at their command; not of their brethren, they are all the Lord's freemen, but of the strangers, and the sons of the alien, who shall keep their sheep, till their ground, and dress their gardens, the ancient employments of Abel, Cain, and Adam. "Strangers shall feed your flocks," ver. 5. When by the grace of God we attain to a holy indifferency as to all the affairs of this world, buying as though we possessed not, when, though our hands are employed about them, our hearts are not entangled with them, but reserved entire for God and his service, then the sons of the alien are our ploughmen and vinedressers.

Thirdly. They shall not only be released out of their captivity, but highly preferred, and honourably employed, ver. 6. While the strangers are keeping your flocks, you shall be keeping the charge of the sanctuary; instead of being slaves to your taskmasters, "you shall be named the priests of the Lord," a high and holy calling. Priests were princes' peers, and in Hebrew were called by the same name. You shall be the ministers of our God, as the Levites were. Note, Those whom God sets at liberty he sets to work. He delivers them out of the hands of their enemies that they may serve him, Lu. i. 74, 75; Ps. cxvi. 16. But his service is perfect freedom; nay, it is the greatest honour. When God brought Israel out of Egypt, he took them to be to him a kingdom of priests, Ex. xix. 5. And the gospel church is a royal priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 9. All believers are made to our God kings and priests; and they ought to carry themselves so in their devotions, and in their whole conversation, with Holiness to the Lord written upon their foreheads, that men may call them the priests of the Lord.

Fourthly. The wealth and honour of the Gentile converts shall redound to the benefit and credit of the church, ver. 6. The Gentiles shall be brought into the church, those that were strangers shall become fellow-citizens with the saints; and with themselves they shall bring all they have, to be devoted to the glory of God, and used in his service; and the priests, the Lord's ministers, shall have the advantage of it. It will be a great strengthening and quickening, as well as a comfort and encouragement, to all good Christians, to see the Gentiles serving the interests of God's kingdom. 1. They "shall eat the riches of the Gentiles;" not which they have themselves seized by violence, but which is fairly and honourably presented to them, as gifts brought to the altar, which the priests and their families lived comfortably upon. It is not said, Ye shall hoard the riches of the Gentiles, and treasure it, but eat it; for there is nothing better in riches than to use them, and to do good with them. 2. They shall boast themselves in their glory. Whatever was the honour of the Gentile converts before their conversion, their nobility, estates, learning, virtue, or places of trust and power, it shall all turn to the reputation of the church to which they have joined themselves; and whatever is their glory after their conversion, their holy zeal, and strictness of conversation, their usefulness, their patient suffering, and all the instances of that blessed change which Divine grace hath made in them, shall be very much for the glory of God, and therefore all good men shall glory in it.

Fifthly. They shall have abundance of comfort and satisfaction in their own bosoms, ver. 7. The Jews no doubt had so, after their return. They were in a new world, and now knew how to value liberty and property, the pleasures of which were continually fresh and blooming. And much more do all those rejoice whom Christ hath brought into the glorious liberty of God's children, especially when the privileges of their adoption shall be completed in the resurrection of the body. 1. "They shall rejoice in their portion." They shall not only have their own again, but (which is a farther gift of God) they shall have the comfort of it, and a heart to rejoice in it, Eccl. iii. 13. Though the houses of the returned Jews, as well as their temple, be much inferior to what they were before the captivity, yet they shall be well pleased with them, and thankful for them. It is a portion in their land; their own land, the holy land, Immanuel's land; and therefore they shall rejoice in it, having so lately known what it was to be strangers in a strange land. They that have God and heaven for their portion have reason to say they have a worthy portion, and to rejoice in it. 2. "Everlasting joy shall be unto them;" that is, a joyful state of their people, which shall last long, much longer than the captivity had lasted. Yet that joy of the Jewish nation was so much alloyed, so often interrupted, and so soon brought to an end, that we must look for the accomplishment of this promise in the spiritual joy which believers have in God, and the eternal joy they hope for in heaven. 3. This shall be a double recompence to them, and more than double, for all the reproach and vexation they have lain under in the land of their captivity; For your shame you shall have double honour, and in your land you shall possess double wealth to what you lost; the blessing of God upon it, and the comfort you shall have in it, shall make it an abundant reparation for all the damages you have received. You shall not only be owned as God's sons, but as his firstborn, Ex. iv. 22, and therefore entitled to a double portion. As the miseries of their captivity were so great, that in them they are said to have received double for all their sins, ch. xl. 2, so the joys of their return shall be so great, that in them they shall receive double for all their shame. The former is applicable to the fulness of Christ's satisfaction, in which God received double for all our sins; the latter to the fulness of heaven's joys, in which we shall receive more than double for all our services and sufferings. Job's case illustrates this; when God turned again his captivity, he gave him twice as much as he had before.

Sixthly. God will be their faithful guide, and a God in covenant with them; ver. 8, "I will direct their work in truth." God, by his providence, will order their affairs for the best, according to the word of his truth. He will guide them in the ways of true prosperity, by the rules of true policy; he will by his grace direct the works of good people in the right way, the true way, that leads to happiness; he will direct them to be done in sincerity, and then they are pleasing to him. God desires truth in the inward part; and if we do our works in truth he will make an everlasting covenant with us; for to those that walk before him, and are upright, he will certainly be a God all-sufficient. Now, as a reason both for this and of the foregoing promise, that God will recompense to them double for their shame, those words come in in the former part of the verse, "I the Lord love judgment." He loves that judgment should be done among men, both between magistrates and subjects, and between neighbour and neighbour, and therefore he hates all injustice. And when wrongs are done to his people, by their oppressors and persecutors, he is displeased with them, not only because they are done to his people, but because they are wrongs, and against the eternal rules of equity. But if men do not do justice, he loves to do judgment himself, in righting them that suffer wrong, and punishing them that do it. God pleads his people's injured cause, not only because he is jealous for them, but because he is jealous for justice. To illustrate this it is added, that he hates robbery for burnt offerings. He hates injustice even in his own people, that honour him with what they have in their burnt offerings; much more doth he hate it when it is against his own people. If he hates robbery when it is for burnt offerings to himself, much more when it is for burnt offerings to idols, and when not only his people are robbed of their estates, but he is robbed of his offerings. It is a truth much to the honour of God, that ritual services will never atone for the violation of moral precepts, nor will it justify any man's robbery to say, it was for burnt offerings, or Corban, it is a gift. "Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice;" to do justly and love mercy better than thousands of rams; nay, that robbery is most hateful to God of all other which is covered with this pretence, for it makes the righteous God to be the patron of unrighteousness. Some make this a reason of the rejection of the Jews upon the bringing in of the Gentiles, ver. 6; because they were so corrupt in their morals, and while they tithed mint and cummin made nothing of judgment and mercy, Mat. xxiii. 23, whereas God loves judgment, and insists upon that; and he hates both robbery for burnt offerings and burnt offerings for robbery too, as that of the Pharisees, who made long prayers, that they might the more plausibly devour widows' houses. Others read these words thus, 'I hate rapine by iniquity,' that is, the spoil which the enemies of God's people had unjustly made of them; this God hated, and therefore would reckon with them for it.

Seventhly. God will entail a blessing upon their posterity after them, ver. 9. Their seed, that is, the children of these persons themselves, that are now the blessed of the Lord, or their successors in profession, the church's seed, shall be "accounted to the Lord for a generation," Ps. xxii. 30. 1. They shall signalize themselves, and make their neighbours to take notice of them. They "shall be known among the Gentiles;" shall distinguish themselves by the gravity, seriousness, humility, and cheerfulness of their conversation, especially by that brotherly love by which all men shall know them to be Christ's disciples; and, they thus distinguishing themselves, God shall dignify them by making them the blessings of their age, and instruments of his glory; and by giving them remarkable tokens of his favour, which shall make them eminent, and gain them respect from all about them. Let the children of godly parents love in such a manner as that they may be known to be so, that all who observe them may see in them the fruits of a good education, and an answer to the prayers that were put up for them; and then they may expect that God will make them known, by the fulfilling of that promise to them, that the generation of the upright shall be blessed. 2. God shall have the glory of this, for every one shall attribute it to the blessing of God. All that see them shall see so much of the grace of God in them, and his favour towards them, that they shall acknowledge them to be the seed which the Lord hath blessed, and doth bless, for it includes both. See what it is to be blessed of God. Whatever good appears in any, it must be taken notice of as the fruit of God's blessing; and he must be glorified in it.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD,
My soul shall be joyful in my God;
For he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation,
He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness,
As a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments,
And as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.
11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud,
And as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth;
So the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and praise
To spring forth before all the nations.

Some make this the song of joy and praise to be sung by the prophet in the name of Jerusalem, congratulating the happy change of her circumstances in the accomplishment of the foregoing promises. Others make it to be spoken by Christ, in the name of the New Testament church, triumphing in gospel grace. We may take in both, the former a type of the latter. We are here taught to rejoice with holy joy, to God's honour,

First. In the beginning of this good work, the clothing of the church with righteousness and salvation, ver. 10. Upon this account, "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord." Those that rejoice in God have cause to rejoice greatly; and we need not fear running into an extreme in the greatness of our joy, when we make God the gladness of our joy. The first gospel song begins like this, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour," Lu. i. 46, 47. There is just matter for this joy, and all the reason in the world it should terminate in God; for salvation and righteousness are wrought out and brought in, and the church is clothed with it. The salvation God wrought for the Jews, and that righteousness of his in which he appeared for them, and that reformation which appeared among them, made them look as glorious in the eyes of all wise men as if they had been clothed in robes of state, or nuptial garments. Christ hath clothed his church with an eternal salvation, and that is truly great, by clothing it with the righteousness both of justification and sanctification. The clean linen is the righteousness of saints, Rev. xix. 8. Observe how these two are put together. Those, and those only, shall be clothed with the garments of salvation hereafter that are covered with the robe of righteousness now. And those garments are rich and splendid clothing, like the priestly garments, (for so the word signifies,) with which the bridegroom decks himself; the brightness of the sun itself is compared to them, Ps. xix. 5. He is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber completely dressed. Such is the beauty of God's grace in those that are clothed with the robe of righteousness, that by the righteousness of Christ are recommended to God's favour, and by the sanctification of the Spirit have God's image renewed upon them. They are decked as a bride to be espoused to God, and taken into covenant with him; they are decked as a priest to be employed for God, and taken into communion with him.

Secondly. In the progress and continuance of this good work, ver. 11. It is not like a day of triumph, which is glorious for the present, but is soon over; no, the righteousness and salvation with which the church is clothed are durable clothing; so they are said to be, ch. xxiii. 18. The church, when she is pleasing herself with the righteousness and salvation that Jesus Christ has clothed her with, rejoiceth to think that these inestimable blessings shall both spring for future ages and spread to distant regions. 1. They shall spring forth for ages to come, as the fruits of the earth, which are produced every year from generation to generation; as the earth, even that which lies common, brings forth her bud, the tender grass at the return of the year, and as the garden enclosed causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth in their season, so duly, so constantly, so powerfully, and with such advantage to mankind, "will the Lord God cause righteousness and praise to spring forth," by virtue of the covenant of grace, as that by virtue of the covenant of providence. See what the promised blessings are, righteousness and praise; for they that are clothed with righteousness shew forth the praises of him that clothed them. These shall spring forth under the influence of the dew of Divine grace. Though it may sometimes be winter with the church, when those blessings seem to wither, and do not appear, yet the root of them is fixed. A spring-time will come when, through the reviving beams of the approaching Sun of righteousness, they shall flourish again. 2. They shall spread far, and spring forth before all the nations; the great salvation shall be published and proclaimed to all the world, and the ends of the earth shall see it.

CHAPTER LXII.

The business of prophets was both to preach and pray. In this chapter, I. The prophet determines to apply himself closely and constantly to this business, ver. 1. II. God appoints him, and others of his prophets, to continue to do so, for the encouragement of his people during the delays of their deliverance, ver. 6, 7. III. The promises are here repeated and ratified of the great things God would do for his church; for the Jews after their return out of captivity, and for the Christian church when it shall be set up in the world. 1. The church shall be made honourable in the eyes of the world, ver. 2; 2. It shall appear to be very dear to God, precious and honourable in his sight, ver. 3—5; 3. It shall enjoy great plenty, ver. 8, 9; 4. It shall be released out of captivity, and grow up again into a considerable nation, particularly owned and favoured by heaven, ver. 10—12.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace,
And for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest,
Until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness,
And the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.
2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness,
And all kings thy glory:
And thou shalt be called by a new name,
Which the mouth of the LORD shall name. [LORD,
3 Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the
And a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.
4 Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken;
Neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate.
But thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah,
And thy land Beulah: [married.
For the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be 5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin,
So shall thy sons marry thee:
And as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride,
So shall thy God rejoice over thee.

The prophet here tells us,

First. What he will do for the church. A prophet, as he is a seer so he is a spokesman. This prophet here resolves to perform that office faithfully, ver. 1. He will not hold his peace, he will not rest; he will mind his business, will take pains, and never desire to take his ease; and herein he was a type of Christ, who was indefatigable in executing the office of a prophet, and made it his meat and drink till he had finished his work. Observe here, 1. What the prophet's resolution is: He will not hold his peace, he will continue instant in preaching; will not only faithfully deliver, but frequently repeat, the messages he hath received from the Lord. If people receive not the precepts and promises at first, he will inculcate them, and give them line upon line; and he will continue instant in prayer; he will never hold his peace at the throne of grace till he has prevailed with God for the mercies promised. He will give himself to prayer, and to the ministry of the word, as Christ's ministers must, Acts vi. 4, must labour frequently in both, and never be weary of this well-doing. The business of ministers is to speak from God to his people, and to God for his people; and in neither of these must they be silent. 2. What is the principle of this resolution: For Zion's sake, and for Jerusalem's; not for the sake of any private interest of his own, but for the church's sake, because he has an affection and concern for Zion, and it lies near his heart. Whatever becomes of his own house and family, he desires to see the good of Jerusalem, and resolves to seek it all the days of his life, Ps. cxxii. 8, 9; cxxviii. 5. It is God's Zion, and his Jerusalem, and it is therefore dear to him, because it is so to God, and because God's glory is interested in its prosperity. 3. How long he resolves to continue this importunity: Till the promise of the church's righteousness and salvation, which was in the foregoing chapter, be accomplished. Isaiah will not himself live to see the release of the captives out of Babylon, much less the bringing in of the Gospel, in which grace reigns through righteousness unto life and salvation; yet he will not hold his peace till these be accomplished, even the utmost of them, because his prophecies will continue speaking of these things; and there shall, in every age, be a remnant that shall continue to pray for them, as successors to him, till the promises be performed, and so the prayers answered that were grounded upon them. Then the church's righteousness and salvation will go forth as brightness, and as a lamp that burneth, so plainly that it will carry its own evidence along with it. It will bring honour and comfort to the church, which will hereupon both look pleasant and appear illustrious; and it will bring instruction and direction to the world, a light not only to the eyes, but to the feet, and to the paths of those who before sat in darkness, and in the shadow of death.

Secondly. What God will do for the church. The prophet can but pray and preach, but God will confirm the word, and answer the prayers.

1. The church shall be greatly admired. When that righteousness which is her salvation, her praise, and her glory, shall be brought forth, the Gentiles shall see it. The tidings of it shall be carried to the Gentiles, and a tender of it made them. They may so see this righteousness as to share in it, if it be not their own fault. Even kings shall see, and be in love with the glory of thy righteousness, ver. 2; shall overlook the glory of their own courts and kingdoms, and look at, and look after, the spiritual glory of the church, as that which excelleth.

2. She shall be truly admirable. Great names make men considerable in the world, and great respects are paid them thereupon. Now it is agreed, that honor est in honorante,—'the honour is to be valued or not, according as the person is that doth the honour.' God is the fountain of honour, and from him the church's honour comes. "Thou shalt be called by a new name," a pleasant name, such as thou wast never called by before; no, not in the day of thy greatest prosperity, and the reverse of that which thou wast called by in the day of thine affliction; thou shalt have a new character, be advanced to a new dignity, and those about thee shall have new thoughts of thee. This seems to be alluded to in that promise, Rev. ii. 17, of the "white stone, and in the stone a new name," and that, Rev. iii. 12, of "the name of the city of my God, and my new name." It is a name "which the mouth of the Lord shall name," who we are sure miscalls nothing, and who will oblige others to call her by the name he hath given her; for his judgment is according to truth, and all shall concur with it sooner or later. Two names God shall give her:

1st. He shall call her his crown; ver. 3, "Thou shalt be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord;" not on his head, as adding any real honour or power to him, as crowns do to those that are crowned with them, but in his hand. He is pleased to account them, and shew them forth, as a glory and beauty to him. When he took them to be his people, it was that they might be unto him "for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory," Jer. xiii. 11. "Thou shalt be a crown of glory, and a royal diadem," through the hand, the good hand, of thy God upon thee; he shall make thee so, for he shall be to thee a crown of glory, ch. xxviii. 5. Thou shalt be so in his hand, that is, under his protection. He that shall put glory upon thee shall create a defence upon all that glory, so that the flowers of thy crown shall never be withered, nor its jewels lost.

2nd. He shall call her his spouse, ver. 4, 5. This is a yet greater honour, especially considering what a forlorn condition she had been in. First. Her case had been very melancholy. She was called forsaken, and her land desolate during the captivity, like a woman reproachfully divorced, or left a disconsolate widow. Such was the state of religion in the world before the preaching of the Gospel; it was in a manner forsaken, and desolate; a thing that no man looked after, or had any real concern for. Secondly. It should now be very pleasant; for God would return in mercy to her. Instead of those two names of reproach, she shall be called by two honourable names. 1*st.* She shall be called Hephzibah, which signifies, 'my delight is in her;' it was the name of Hezekiah's queen, that was Manasseh's mother, 2 Kin. xxi. 1; a proper name for a wife, who ought to be her husband's delight, Pr. v. 19. And here it is the church's Maker that is her husband; "the Lord delighteth in thee." God, by his grace, hath wrought that in his church which makes her his delight, she being refined and reformed, and brought home to him; and then by his providence he doth that for her which makes it appear that she is his delight, and that he delights to do her good. 2*nd.* She shall be called Beulah, which signifies, 'married;' whereas she had been desolate, a condition opposed to that of the married wife, ch. liv. 1. "Thy land shall be married," that is, it shall become fruitful again, and be replenished. Though she has long been barren, she shall again be peopled; shall again be made to keep house, and to be "a joyful mother of children," Ps. cxiii. 9. She shall be married; for, (1.) Her sons shall heartily espouse the land of their nativity, and the interests of it, which they had for a long time neglected, as despairing ever to have any comfortable enjoyment of it. Thy sons shall marry thee, that is, they shall live with thee, and take delight in thee. When they were in Babylon, they seemed to have espoused that land, for they were appointed to settle, and to seek the peace of it, Jer. xxix. 5—7; but now they shall again marry their own land, "as a young man marrieth a virgin" that he takes great delight in, is extremely fond of, and is likely to have many children by. It bodes well to a land when its own natives and inhabitants are pleased with it, prefer it before other lands; when its princes marry their country, and resolve to take their lot with it. (2.) Which is much better: her God shall betroth her to himself in righteousness, Hos. ii. 19, 20. He will take pleasure in his church; "As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride," is pleased with his relation to her, and her affection to him, "so shall thy God rejoice over thee," shall rest in his love to thee, Zeph. iii. 17; shall take pleasure in thee, Ps. cxlvii. 10; and shall delight to do thee good with his whole heart, and his whole soul, Jer. xxxii. 41. This is very applicable to the love Christ has for his church, and the complacency he takes in it, which appears so bright in Solomon's Song, and which will be complete in heaven.

6 I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem,
Which shall never hold their peace day nor night:
Ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,
7 And give him no rest, [the earth
Till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength,
Surely I will no more give thy corn
To be meat for thine enemies;
And the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine,
For the which thou hast laboured:
9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it,
And praise the LORD;
And they that have brought it together shall drink it
In the courts of my holiness.

Two things are here promised to Jerusalem:

First. Plenty of the means of grace; abundance of good preaching and good praying, ver. 6, 7. And this shews the method God takes when he designs mercy for a people; he first brings them to their duty, and pours out a spirit of prayer upon them, and then brings salvation to them. Provision is here made,

1. That ministers may do their duty as watchmen. It is here spoken of as a token for good, as a step towards farther mercy, and an earnest of it, that, in order to what he designed for them, he would set watchmen on their walls, that should never hold their peace. Note, 1st. Ministers are watchmen on the church's walls; for it is as a city besieged, whose concern it is to have sentinels on the walls, to take notice, and give notice, of the motions of the enemy. It is necessary that, as watchmen, they be wakeful and faithful, and willing to endure hardness. 2nd. They are concerned to stand upon their guard day and night. They must never be off their watch as long as those for whose souls they watch are not out of danger. 3rd. They must never hold their peace; they must take all opportunities to give warning to sinners, in season, out of season; and must never betray the cause of Christ by a treacherous or cowardly silence. They must never hold their peace at the throne of grace; must pray and not faint; as Moses lifted up his hands, and kept them steady, till Israel had got the victory over Amalek, Ex. xvii. 10, 11.

2. That people may do their duty, as those that make mention of the Lord. Let not them keep silence neither, let not them think it enough that their watchmen pray for them, but let them pray for themselves; and all little enough to meet the approaching mercy with due solemnity. Note, 1st. It is the character of God's professing people that they make mention of the Lord, and continue to do so even in bad times, when the land is termed forsaken and desolate. They 'are the Lord's remembrancers,' so the margin reads it; they remember the Lord themselves, and put one another in mind of him. 2nd. God's professing people must be a praying people, must be public-spirited in prayer, and must wrestle with God in prayer, and continue to do so. "Keep not silence," never grow remiss in the duty, or weary of it: "Give him no rest;" alluding to an importunate beggar, to the widow that with her continual coming wearied the judge into a compliance. God said to Moses, "Let me alone," Ex. xxxii. 10; and Jacob to Christ, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me," Gen. xxxii. 26. 3rd. God is so far from being displeased with our pressing importunity, as men commonly are, that he invites and encourageth it. He bids us to cry after him, not as the disciples that were uneasy at it, Mat. xv. 23. He bids us make pressing instances at the throne of grace, and give him no rest, Lu. xi. 5, 6. He suffers himself not only to be reasoned with, but to be wrestled with. 4th. The public welfare and prosperity of God's Jerusalem is that which we should be most importunate for at the throne of grace. Pray for the good of the church, First. That it may be safe, that he would establish it; that the interests of the church may be firm, may be settled for the present, and secured to posterity. Secondly. That it may be great, may be a praise in the earth; that it may be praised, and God may be praised for it. When gospel truths are cleared and vindicated, when gospel ordinances are duly administered in their purity and power, when the church becomes eminent for holiness and love, then Jerusalem is a praise in the earth, then it is in reputation. 5th. We must persevere in our prayers for mercy to the church till the mercy comes; must do as the prophet's servant did, go yet seven times, till the promising cloud appears, 1 Kin. xviii. 47. 6th. It is a good sign that God is coming towards a people in ways of mercy when he pours out a spirit of prayer upon them, and stirs them up to be fervent and constant in their intercessions.

Secondly. Plenty of all other good things, ver. 8. This follows upon the former; when the people praise God, when all the people praise him, "then shall the earth yield her increase," Ps. lxvii. 5, 6, and outward prosperity crowning its piety shall help to make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. Observe here,

1. The great distress they had been in, and the losses they had sustained. Their corn had been meat for their enemies, which they hoped should have been meat for themselves and their families. Here was a double grievance, that they themselves wanted that which was necessary to the support of life, and were in danger of perishing for want of it; and that their enemies were strengthened by it, had their camp victualled with it, and so were the better able to do them a mischief. God is said to give their corn to their enemies, because he not only permitted it, but ordered it to be the just punishment both of their abuse of plenty and their symbolizing with strangers, ch. i. 7. The wine which they had laboured for, and which in their affliction they needed, for the relief of those among them that were of heavy heart, strangers drunk it to gratify their lusts with. This sore judgment was threatened for their sins, Lev. xxvi. 16; Deu. xxviii. 33. See how uncertain our creature comforts are, and how much it is our wisdom to labour for that meat which we can never be robbed of.

2. The great fulness and satisfaction they should now be restored to; ver. 9, "They that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the Lord." See here, 1st. God's mercy in giving plenty, and peace to enjoy it. That the earth yields her increase, that there are hands to be employed in gathering it in, and that they are not taken off by plague and sickness, or otherwise employed in war; that strangers and enemies do not come and gather it for themselves, or take it from us when we have gathered it; that we eat the labour of our hands, and the bread is not eaten out of our mouth; and especially that we have opportunity and a heart to honour God with it, and that his courts are open to us, and we are not restrained from attending on him in them. 2nd. Our duty in the enjoyment of this mercy. We must gather what God gives with care and industry; we must eat it freely and cheerfully, not bury the gifts of God's bounty, but make use of them. We must, when we have eaten and are full, bless the Lord, and give him thanks for his bounty to us; and we must serve him with our abundance; use it in works of piety and charity; eat it and drink it in the courts of his holiness, where the altar, the priest, and the poor, must all have their share. The greatest comfort that a good man hath in his meat and drink is, that it furnisheth him with a meat offering and a drink offering for the Lord his God, Joel ii. 14; that he hath in an estate is, that it gives him an opportunity of honouring God, and doing good. This wine is to be drunk in the courts of God's holiness, and therefore moderately and with sobriety, as before the Lord.

3. The solemn ratification of this promise. "The Lord hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength," that he will do this for his people. God confirms it by an oath, that his people that trust in him and his word may have strong consolation, Heb. vi. 17, 18. And, since he can swear by no greater, he swears by himself, sometimes by his being, "As I live," Eze. xxxiii. 11; sometimes by his holiness, Ps. lxxxix. 35; here by his power, his right hand, (which was lifted up in swearing, Deu. xxxii. 40,) and his arm of power; for it is a great satisfaction to those who build their hopes on God's promise to be sure that what he hath promised he is able also to perform, Rom. iv. 21. To assure us of this he has sworn by his strength, pawning the reputation of his omnipotence upon it. If he do not do it, let it be said it was because he could not, which the Egyptians shall never say, Num. xiv. 16, nor any other. It is the comfort of God's people that his power is engaged for them; his right hand, where the Mediator sits.

10 Go through, go through the gates;
Prepare ye the way of the people;
Cast up, cast up the highway;
Gather out the stones;
Lift up a standard for the people. [world,
11 Behold, the LORD hath proclaimed unto the end of the Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh;
Behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him.
12 And they shall call them, The holy people,
The redeemed of the LORD:
And thou shalt be called, Sought out,
A city not forsaken.

This, as many like passages before, refers to the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, and, under the type and figure of that, to the great redemption wrought out by Jesus Christ, and the proclaiming of gospel grace and liberty through him.

First. Way shall be made for this salvation. All difficulties shall be removed, and whatever might obstruct it shall be taken out of the way, ver. 10. The gates of Babylon shall be thrown open, that they may with freedom go through them. The way from Babylon to the land of Israel shall be prepared; causeways shall be made and cast up through wet and miry places, and the stones gathered out from places rough and rocky. In the convenient places appointed for their rendezvous, standards shall be set up for their direction and encouragement, that they may embody for their greater safety. Thus John Baptist was sent to prepare the way of the Lord, Mat. iii. 3. And before Christ by his graces and comforts comes to any for salvation, preparation is made for him by repentance; that is called the "preparation of the Gospel of peace," Eph. vi. 15. Here the way is levelled by it; there the feet are shod with it; which comes all to one, for both are in order to a journey.

Secondly. Notice shall be given of this salvation, ver. 11, 12. It shall be proclaimed to the captives that they are set at liberty, and may go if they please. It shall be proclaimed to their neighbours, to all about them, to the end of the world, that God hath pleaded Zion's just, and injured, and despised cause. Let it be said to Zion, for her comfort, "Behold, thy salvation cometh;" that is, thy Saviour, who brings salvation. He will bring such a work, such a reward, in this salvation as shall be admired by all; a reward of comfort and peace with him, but a work of humiliation and reformation before him, to prepare his people for that recompence of their sufferings. And then, with reference to each, it follows, they shall be called, "The holy people," and "the redeemed of the Lord." The work before him, which shall be wrought in them, and upon them, shall denominate them a holy people, cured of their inclination to idolatry, and consecrated to God only; and the reward with him, the deliverance wrought for them, shall denominate them the redeemed of the Lord, so redeemed, as none but God could redeem them; and redeemed to be his, their bonds loosed, that they might be his servants. Jerusalem shall then be called, "Sought out, a city not forsaken." She had been forsaken for many years; there were neither traders nor worshippers that inquired the way to Jerusalem, as formerly, when it was frequented by both; but now God will again make it considerable, it shall be sought out, visited, resorted to, and court made to it as much as ever. When it is called a holy city, then it is called, Sought out; for holiness puts an honour and beauty upon any place or person, which draws respect, and makes them to be admired and beloved, and inquired after. But this being proclaimed to the end of the world, must have a reference to the Gospel of Christ, which was to be preached to every creature; and it speaks, 1. The glory of Christ. It is published immediately to the church, but is thence echoed to every nation; "Behold, thy salvation cometh." Christ is not only the Saviour, but the salvation itself; for the happiness of believers is not only from him, but in him, ch. xii. 21. His salvation consists both in the work and in the reward which he brings with him; for those that are his shall neither be idle nor lose their labour. 2. The beauty of the church. Christians shall be called saints, 1 Cor. i. 2, the holy people, for they are chosen and called to salvation through sanctification. They shall be called "the redeemed of the Lord;" to him they owe their liberty, and therefore to him they owe their service, and they shall not be ashamed to own both. None are to be called "the redeemed of the Lord" but those that are the holy people; the people of God's purchase is a holy nation. And they shall be called, Sought out; God shall seek them out, and find them, wherever they are dispersed, eclipsed, or lost in a crowd; men shall seek them out, that they may join themselves to them, and not forsake them. It is good to associate with the holy people, that we may learn their ways; and with the redeemed of the Lord, that we may share in the blessings of the redemption.

CHAPTER LXIII.

In this chapter we have, I. God coming towards his people in ways of mercy and deliverance; and this is to be joined to the close of the foregoing chapter, where it was said to Zion, "Behold, thy salvation cometh;" for here it is shewed how it comes, ver. 1—6. II. God's people meeting him with their devotions, and addressing themselves to him with suitable affections; and this part of the chapter is carried on to the close of the next. In this we have, 1. A thankful acknowledgment of the great favours God had bestowed upon them, ver. 7; 2. The magnifying of these favours, from the consideration of God's relation to them, ver. 8, his compassionate concern for them, ver. 9, their unworthiness, ver. 10, and the occasion which it gave both him and them to call to mind former mercies, ver. 11—14. 3. A very humble and earnest prayer to God to appear for them in their present distress, pleading God's mercy, ver. 15, their relation to him, ver. 16, their desire towards him, ver. 17, and the insolence of their enemies, ver. 18, 19. So that upon the whole we learn to embrace God's promises with an active faith, and then to improve them, and make use of them both in prayers and praises.

WHO is this that cometh from Edom,
With dyed garments from Bozrah?
This that is glorious in his apparel,
Travelling in the greatness of his strength?
I that speak in righteousness,
Mighty to save.
2 Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel,
And thy garments like him that treadeth in the winefat?
3 I have trodden the winepress alone;
And of the people there was none with me:
For I will tread them in mine anger,
And trample them in my fury;
And their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments,
And I will stain all my raiment.
4 For the day of vengeance is in mine heart,
And the year of my redeemed is come.
5 And I looked, and there was none to help;
And I wondered that there was none to uphold:
Therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me;
And my fury, it upheld me.
6 And I will tread down the people in mine anger,
And make them drunk in my fury,
And I will bring down their strength to the earth.

It is a glorious victory that is here inquired into first, and then accounted for: 1. It is a victory obtained by the providence of God over the enemies of Israel. Over the Babylonians, say some, whom Cyrus conquered, and God by him; and they will have the prophet to make the first discovery of him in his triumphant return, when he is in the country of Edom. But this can by no means be admitted, because the country of Babylon is always spoken of as the land of the north; whereas Edom lay south from Jerusalem, so that the conqueror would not return through that country; the victory therefore is obtained over the Edomites themselves, who had triumphed in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, Ps. cxxxvii. 7, and cut off those who, making their way as far as they could from the enemy, escaped to the Edomites, Oba. 12, 13, and were therefore reckoned with when Babylon was; for no doubt that prophecy was accomplished, though we do not meet in history with the accomplishment of it, Jer. xlix. 13, "Bozrah shall become a desolation." Yet this victory over Edom is put as an instance, or specimen, of the like victories obtained over other nations that had been enemies to Israel. This over the Edomites is named for the sake of the old enmity of Esau against Jacob, Gen. xxvii. 41; and perhaps with an allusion to David's glorious triumph over the Edomites, by which it should seem, more than by any other of his victories, he got him a name, Ps. lx. title; 2 Sam. viii. 13, 14. But this is not all; 2. It is a victory obtained by the grace of God in Christ, over our spiritual enemies. We find the garments dipped in blood, adorning him whose name is called the Word of God, Rev. xix. 13, and who that is, we know very well; by the same token it is through him that we are more than conquerors over those principalities and powers which on the cross he spoiled and triumphed over. In this representation of the victory we have,

First. An admiring question put to the conqueror, ver. 1, 2. It is put by the church, or by the prophet in the name of the church. He sees a mighty hero returning in triumph from a bloody engagement, and makes bold to ask him two questions: 1. Who he is. He observes him to come from the country of Edom, to come in such apparel as was glorious to a soldier; not embroidered or laced, but besmeared with blood and dirt. He observes he doth not come as one either frighted or fatigued, but travels in the greatness of his strength, altogether unbroken.

'Triumphant and victorious he appears,
And honour in his looks and habit wears:
How strong he treads, how stately doth he go!
Pompous and solemn in his pace,
And full of majesty, as is his face;
Who is this mighty hero, who?'—Mr. Norris.

The question, "Who is this?" perhaps means the same with that which Joshua put to the same person when he appeared to him with his sword drawn, Jos. v. 13, "Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?" Or rather, the same with that which Israel put in a way of adoration, Ex. xv. 11, "Who is a God like unto thee?" 2. The other question is, "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel?" What hard service hast thou been engaged in, that thou carriest with thee these marks of toil and danger? Is it possible that one who has such majesty and terror in his countenance should be employed in the mean and servile work of treading the winepress? Sure it is not. That which is really the glory of the Redeemer, yet prima facie,—'at first,' seems a disparagement to him, as it would be to a mighty prince to do the work of the vinedressers and husbandmen; for he took upon him the form of a servant, and carried with him the marks of servitude.

Secondly. An admirable answer returned by him.

1. He tells who he is; "I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save." He is the Saviour. God was Israel's Saviour out of the hand of their oppressors; the Lord Jesus is ours. His name, Jesus, signifies a saviour, for he saves his people from their sins. In the salvation wrought he will have us to take notice, 1st. Of the truth of his promise, which is therein performed. He speaks in righteousness, and will therefore make good every word that he hath spoken, with which he will have us to compare what he doth; that, setting the word and the work the one over against the other, what he doth may ratify what he hath said; and what he hath said may justify what he doth. 2nd. Of the efficacy of his power, which is therein exerted. He is mighty to save, able to bring about the promised redemption, whatever difficulties and oppositions may lie in the way of it.

''Tis I, who to my promise faithful stand;
I, who the powers of death, hell, and the grave,
Have foil'd with this all-conquering hand;
I, who most ready am, and mighty too to save.'—Mr. Norris.

2. He tells how he came to appear in this hue; ver. 3, "I have trodden the winepress alone." Being compared to one that treads in the winefat, such is his condescension in the midst of his triumphs, that he doth not scorn the comparison, but admits it, and carries it on. He doth indeed tread the winepress, but it is "the great winepress of the wrath of God," Rev. xiv. 19, in which we sinners deserved to have been cast; but Christ was pleased to cast our enemies into it, and destroy him that had the power of death, that he might deliver us. And of this the bloody work which God sometimes made among the enemies of the Jews, and which is here foretold, was a type and figure. Observe the account the conqueror gives of his victory.

1st. He gains the victory purely by his own strength; "I have trodden the winepress alone," ver. 3. When God delivered his people, and destroyed their enemies, if he made use of instruments, he did not need them; but among his people, for whom the salvation was to be wrought, there was no assistance offered itself, they were weak and helpless, and had no ability to do any thing for their own relief; they were desponding and listless, and had no heart to do any thing; they were not disposed to give the least stroke or struggle for liberty; neither the captives themselves, nor any of their friends for them; ver. 5, "I looked, and there was none to help," as one would have expected, nothing of a bold, active spirit appeared among them; nay, there were not only none to lead, but, which was more strange, there was none to uphold, none that would come in as seconds, that had the courage to join with Cyrus against their oppressors: therefore mine own arm brought about the salvation; not by created might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, that is, his own arm. Note, God can help when all other helpers fail; nay, this is his time to help, and therefore for that very reason he will put forth his own power so much the more gloriously. But this is most fully applicable to Christ's victories over our spiritual enemies, which he obtained by single combat. He trod the winepress of his Father's wrath alone, and triumphed over principalities and powers in himself, Col. ii. 15. Of the people there was none with him; for when he entered the lists with the powers of darkness all his disciples forsook him and fled. There was none to help, none that could, none that durst; and he might well wonder that among the children of men, whose concern it was, there was not only none to uphold, but so many to oppose and hinder it, if they could.

2nd. He undertakes the war purely out of his own zeal. It is in his anger, it is in his fury, that he treads down his enemies, ver. 3, and that fury upholds him, and carries him on in his enterprise, ver. 5. God wrought salvation for the oppressed Jews, purely because he was very angry with the oppressing Babylonians, angry at their idolatries and sorceries, their pride and cruelty, and the injuries they did to his people; in which, as they increased and grew more insolent and outrageous, his anger increased to fury. Our Lord Jesus wrought out our redemption in a holy zeal for the honour of his Father and the happiness of mankind, and a holy indignation at the daring attempts Satan had made upon both; this zeal and indignation upheld him throughout his whole undertaking. Two branches there were of this zeal that animated him: First. He had a zeal against his and his people's enemies; "The day of vengeance is in my heart," ver. 4. The day fixed in the eternal counsels for taking vengeance on them, this was written in his heart, so that he could not forget it, could not let it slip; his heart was full of it, and it lay as a charge, as a weight upon him, which made him push on this holy war with so much vigour. Note, There is a day fixed for Divine vengeance, which may be long deferred, but will come at last; and we may be content to wait for it, for the Redeemer himself doth, though his heart is upon it. Secondly. He had a zeal for his people, and all that he designed should share in the intended salvation; "The year of my redeemed is come;" that is, the year appointed for their redemption. The year was fixed for the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and God kept time to a day, Ex. xii. 41. So there was for their release out of Babylon, Dan. ix. 2. So there was for Christ's coming to destroy the works of the devil. So there is for all the deliverances of the church; and the Deliverer has an eye to it. Observe, 1*st.* With what a pleasure he speaks of his people; They are my redeemed. They are his own, dear to him. Though their redemption is not yet wrought out, yet he calls them his redeemed, because it shall as surely be done as if it were done already. 2*nd.* With what a pleasure he speaks of his people's redemption; how glad he is that the time is come, though he is like to meet with a sharp encounter. Now the year of my redeemed is come, "Lo, I come;" delay shall be no longer. Now will I arise, saith the Lord; now thou shalt see what I will do to Pharaoh. Note, The promised salvation must be patiently waited for till the time appointed comes; yet we must attend the promises with our prayers. Doth Christ say, Surely I come quickly; let our hearts reply, Even so, come; let the year of the redeemed come.

3rd. He will obtain a complete victory over them all. First. Much is done already; for he now appears red in his apparel; such abundance of blood is shed, that the conqueror's garments are all stained with it. This was long before, by dying Jacob, foretold concerning Shiloh, that is, Christ, that he should wash "his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes," which perhaps this here alludes to, Gen. xlix. 11.

'With ornamental drops bedeck'd I stood,
And writ my victory with my enemy's blood.'—Mr. Norris.

In the destruction of the antichristian powers, we meet with abundance of bloodshed, Rev. xiv. 20; xix. 13, which yet, according to the dialect of prophecy, may be understood spiritually, and doubtless so may this here. Secondly. More shall yet be done; ver. 6, "I will tread down the people," that yet stand it out against me "in mine anger;" for the victorious Redeemer, when the year of the redeemed is come, will go on conquering and to conquer, Rev. vi. 2. When he begins he will also make an end. Observe how he will complete his victories over the enemies of his church. 1*st.* He will infatuate them. He will make them drunk, so that there shall be neither sense nor steadiness in their counsels; they shall drink of the cup of his fury, and that shall intoxicate them. Or, he will make them drunk with their own blood, Rev. xvii. 6. Let those that make themselves drunk with the cup of riot, (and then are in their fury,) repent and reform, lest God make them drunk with the cup of trembling, the cup of his fury. 2*nd.* He will enfeeble them. He will "bring down their strength," and so bring them down to the earth; for what strength can hold against Omnipotence?

7 I will mention the lovingkindnesses of the LORD,
And the praises of the LORD,

According to all that the LORD hath bestowed on us,
And the great goodness toward the house of Israel,
Which he hath bestowed on them according to his mercies,
And according to the multitude of his lovingkindnesses.
8 For he said, Surely they are my people,
Children that will not lie:
So he was their Saviour.
9 In all their affliction he was afflicted,
And the angel of his presence saved them:
In his love and in his pity he redeemed them;
And he bare them, and carried them all the days of old.
10 But they rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit;
Therefore he was turned to be their enemy,
And he fought against them.
11 Then he remembered the days of old, Moses, and his people, saying,
Where is he that brought them up out of the sea
With the shepherd of his flock?
Where is he that put his holy Spirit within him?
12 That led them by the right hand of Moses with his glorious arm,
Dividing the water before them,
To make himself an everlasting name?
13 That led them through the deep,
As an horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble?
14 As a beast goeth down into the valley,
The Spirit of the LORD caused him to rest:
So didst thou lead thy people,
To make thyself a glorious name.

The prophet is here, in the name of the church, taking a review, and making a thankful recognition, of God's dealings with his church all along, ever since he founded it, before he comes, in the latter end of this chapter, and in the next, as a watchman upon the walls, earnestly to pray to God for his compassion towards her in her present deplorable state; and it was usual for God's people in their prayers thus to look back.

First. Here is a general acknowledgment of God's goodness to them all along, ver. 7. It was said in general of God's prophets and people, ch. lxii. 6, that they "make mention of the Lord;" now here we are told what it is in God that they do especially delight to make mention of, and that is his goodness, which the prophet here so makes mention of, as if he thought he could never say enough of it. He mentions the kindness of God, (which never appeared so evident, so eminent, as in his love to mankind in sending his Son to save us, Tit. iii. 4,) his lovingkindness; kindness that shews itself in every thing that is endearing; nay, so plenteous are the springs, and so various the streams, of Divine mercy, that he speaks of it in the plural number, his lovingkindnesses; for if we would count the fruits of his lovingkindnesses, they are more in number than the sand. With his lovingkindnesses he mentions his praises, that is, the thankful acknowledgments which the saints make of his lovingkindness, and the angels too. It must be mentioned to God's honour, what a tribute of praise is paid by all his creatures, in consideration of his lovingkindness. See how copiously he speaks,

1. Of the goodness that is from God, the gifts of his lovingkindness; "All that the Lord has bestowed on us" in particular, relating to life and godliness, in our personal and family capacity. Let every man speak for himself, speak as he has found, and he must own that he has had a great deal bestowed upon him by the Divine bounty. But we must also mention the favours bestowed upon his church; his "great goodness towards the house of Israel, which he has bestowed on them." Note, We must bless God for others' mercies as for our own; and reckon that bestowed on ourselves which is bestowed on the house of Israel.

2. Of the goodness that is in God. God doth good, because he is good; what he bestows upon us must be run up to the original, it is "according to his mercies," not according to our merits; and "according to the multitude of his lovingkindnesses," which can never be spent. Thus we should magnify God's goodness, and speak honourably of it, not only when we plead it, as David, Ps. li. 1, but when we praise it.

Secondly. Here is particular notice taken of the steps of God's mercy to Israel, ever since it was first formed into a nation.

1. The expectations God had concerning them, that they would carry themselves well, ver. 8. When he brought them out of Egypt, and took them into covenant with himself, he said, "Surely they are my people," I take them as such, and am willing to hope they will approve themselves so; "children that will not lie," that is, that will not dissemble with God in their covenantings with him, nor treacherously depart from him, by breaking their covenant, and starting aside like a broken bow. They said more than once, All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do, and will be obedient; and thereupon he took them to be his peculiar people, saying, Surely they will not lie. God deals fairly and faithfully with them, and therefore expects they should deal so with him. They are children of the covenant, Acts iii. 25; children of those that clave unto the Lord, and therefore it may be hoped they will tread in the steps of their fathers' constancy. Note, God's people are children that will not lie, for those that will are not his children, but the devil's.

2. The favour he shewed them, with an eye to these expectations; "So he was their Saviour" out of the bondage of Egypt, and all the calamities of their wilderness state, and many a time since he had been their Saviour. See particularly, ver. 9, what he did for them as their Saviour. 1st. The principle that moved him to work salvation for them. It was "in his love and in his pity," out of mere compassion to them, and a tender affection for them, not because he either needed them, or could be benefited by them. This is strangely expressed here, "In all their affliction he was afflicted." Not that the Eternal Mind is capable of grieving, or God's infinite blessedness of suffering the least damage or diminution,—God cannot be afflicted; but thus he is pleased to shew forth the love and concern he has for his people in their affliction; thus far he sympathises with them, that he takes what injury is done to them as done to himself, and will reckon for it accordingly. Their cries move him, Ex. iii. 7, and he appears for them so vigorously, as if he were pained in their pain; "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" This is matter of great comfort to God's people in their affliction, that God is so far from afflicting willingly, Lam. iii. 33, that if they humble themselves under his hand, he is afflicted in their affliction, as the tender parents are in the severe operations which the case of a sick child calls for. There is another reading of these words in the original, 'In all their affliction there was no affliction.' Though they were in great affliction, yet the property of it was so altered by the grace of God sanctifying it to them for their good; the rigour of it was so mitigated, and it was so allayed and balanced with mercies; they were so wonderfully supported and comforted under it, and it proved so short, and ended so well, that it was in effect no affliction. The troubles of the saints are not that to them that they are to others; they are not afflictions, but medicines; they are enabled to call them light, and but for a moment, and, with an eye to heaven as all in all, to make nothing of them. 2nd. The person employed in their salvation; the angel of his face, or presence. Some understand it of a created angel. The highest angel in heaven, even the angel of his presence, that attends next the throne of his glory, is not thought too great, too good, to be sent on this errand. Thus the little ones' angels are said to be those that always behold the face of our Father, Mat. xviii. 10. But this is rather to be understood of Jesus Christ, the eternal Word, that angel of whom God spake to Moses, Ex. xxiii. 10, whose voice Israel was to obey. He is called Jehovah, Ex. xiii. 21; xiv. 19, 24. He is the angel of the covenant, God's messenger to the world, Mal. iii. 1. He is the angel of God's face, for he is the express image of his person; and the glory of God shines in the face of Christ. He that was to work out the eternal salvation, as an earnest of that, wrought out the temporal salvations that were typical of it. 3rd. The progress and perseverance of this favour. He not only redeemed them out of their bondage, but he bare them, and carried them all the days of old. They were weak, but he supported them by his power, sustained them by his bounty; when they were burthened and ready to sink, he bore them up; in the wars they made upon the nations, he stood by them, and bore them out; though they were peevish, he bore with them, and suffered their manners, Acts xiii. 18. He carried them, as the nursing father doth the child, though they would have tired any arms but his; carried them as the eagle her young upon her wings, Deu. xxxii. 11. And it was a long time that he was troubled with them, (if we may so speak,) it was all the days of old; his care of them was not at an end even when they were grown up and settled in Canaan. All this was in his love and pity, ex mero motu,—'of his mere good-will,' he loved them because he would love them, as he saith, Deu. vii. 7, 8.

3. Their disingenuous carriage towards him, and the trouble they thereby brought upon themselves; ver. 10, "But they rebelled." Things looked very hopeful and promising, one would have thought they should have continued dutiful children to God, and then no doubt but he would have continued a gracious Father to them; but here is a sad change on both sides, and on them be the breach. 1st. They revolted from their allegiance to God, and took up arms against him. They "rebelled and vexed his holy Spirit," with their unbelief and murmuring, besides the iniquity of the golden calf; and this had been their way and manner ever since. Though he had so good an opinion of them, that they would not lie, though he had done so much for them, borne them and carried them, yet they thus ill requited him, like "foolish people and unwise," Deu. xxxii. 6. This grieved him, Ps. xcv. 10. The ungrateful rebellions of God's children against him are a vexation to his holy Spirit. 2nd. Thereupon he justly withdrew his protection, and not only so, but made war upon them, as a prince justly doth upon the rebels. He who had been so much their friend was "turned to be their enemy, and fought against them," by one judgment after another, both in the wilderness and after their settlement in Canaan. See the malignity and mischievousness of sin: it makes God an enemy, even to those for whom he has done the part of a good friend; and makes him angry that was all love and pity. See the folly of sinners: they wilfully lose him for a friend that is the most desirable friend; and make him their enemy that is the most formidable enemy. This refers especially to those calamities that were of late brought upon them, by their captivity in Babylon, for their idolatries and other sins. That which was both the original and the great aggravation of their troubles was, that God was turned to be their enemy.

4. A particular reflection made on this occasion upon what God did for them when he first formed them into a people; "Then he remembered the days of old," ver. 11. This may be understood either,

1st. Of the people. Israel then, spoken of as a single person, "remembered the days of old," looked into their Bibles, read the story of God's bringing their fathers out of Egypt, and considered it more closely than ever they did before, and reasoned upon it, as Gideon did, Jud. vi. 13, "Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of?" Where is he that brought them up out of Egypt? Is he not as able to bring us up out of Babylon? Where is the Lord God of Elijah? Where is the Lord God of our fathers? This they consider as an inducement and an encouragement to them to repent and return to him: their fathers were a provoking people, and yet found him a pardoning God; and why may not they find him so, if they return to him? They also use it as a plea with God in prayer, for the turning again of their captivity, like that, ch. li. 9, 10. Note, When the present days are dark and cloudy it is good to remember the days of old, to recollect our own and others' experiences of the Divine power and goodness, and make use of them; to look back upon "the years of the right hand of the Most High," Ps. lxxvii. 5, 10, and remember that he is God, and changeth not. Or,

2nd. We may understand it of God. He put himself in mind of the days of old, of his covenant with Abraham, Lev. xxvi. 42. He said, "Where is he that brought Israel up out of the sea?" stirring up himself to come and save them with this consideration, Why should not I appear for them now as I did for their fathers, who were as undeserving, as ill deserving, as they are? See how far off Divine mercy will go, how far back it will look, to find out a reason for doing good to his people, when no present considerations appear but what make against them! Nay, it makes that a reason for relieving them which might have been used as a reason for abandoning them. He might have said, I have delivered them formerly, but they have again brought trouble upon themselves, Pr. xix. 19, therefore I will deliver them no more, Jud. x. 13. No; mercy rejoiceth against judgment, and turns the argument the other way; I have formerly delivered them, and therefore will now.

Which way soever we take it, whether the people plead it with God or God with himself, let us view the particulars; and they agree very much with that confession and prayer which the children of the captivity made upon a solemn fast-day, Neh. ix. 5, &c., which may serve as a comment on these verses here, which call to mind Moses and his people; that is, what God did by Moses for his people, especially in bringing them through the Red sea. For that is it which is here most insisted on; for it was a work which he much gloried in, and which his people therefore may, in a particular manner, encourage themselves with the remembrance of. First. "God led them by the right hand of Moses," ver. 13, and the wonder-working rod in his hand; Ps. lxxvii. 20, "Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses." It was not Moses that led them, no more than it was Moses that fed them, Jno. vi. 32, but God by Moses; for it was he that qualified Moses for, called him to, assisted and prospered him in, that great undertaking. Moses is here called "the shepherd of his flock." God was the owner of the flock, and the chief Shepherd of Israel, Ps. lxxx. 1; but Moses was a shepherd under him, and he was inured to labour and patience, and so fitted for this pastoral care, by his being trained up to keep the flock of his father Jethro. Herein he was a type of Christ, the good Shepherd, that "lays down his life for the sheep;" which was more than Moses did for Israel, though he did a great deal for them. Secondly. He "put his holy Spirit within him." The Spirit of God was among them, and not only his providence, but his grace did work for them; Neh. ix. 20, "Thou gavest thy good Spirit to instruct them." The spirit of wisdom and courage, as well as the spirit of prophecy, was put into Moses, to qualify him for that service among them to which he was called; and some of his spirit was put upon the seventy elders, Num. xi. 17. This was a great blessing to Israel, that they had not only inspired writings, but inspired men among them. Thirdly. He carried them safely through the Red sea, and thereby saved them out of the hands of Pharaoh. 1st. He "divided the water before them," ver. 12, so that it gave them not only passage but protection; not only opened them a lane, but erected them a wall on either side. 2nd. He "led them through the deep, as a horse in the wilderness," or in the plain, ver. 13. They and their wives and children, with all their bag and baggage, went as easily and readily through the bottom of the sea, though we may suppose it muddy, or stony, or both, as a horse goes along upon even ground; so that they did not stumble, though it was an untrodden path, which neither they nor any one else ever went before. If God make us a way, he will make it plain and level. The road he opens to his people he will lead them in. 3rd. To complete the mercy, he "brought them up out of the sea," ver. 11. Though the ascent, it is likely, was very steep, dirty, and slippery, and unconquerable, (at least by the women and children, and the men, considering how they were loaded, Ex. xii. 34, and how fatigued,) yet God, by his power, brought them up from the depths of the earth; and it was a kind of resurrection to them; it was as life from the dead. Fourthly. He brought them safe to a place of rest. "As a beast goeth down into the valley," fair and softly, and by leisure steps, so "the Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest." Many a time, in their march through the wilderness, they had resting-places provided for them by the direction of the Spirit of the Lord in Moses, ver. 11. And at length they were made to rest for good and all in Canaan, and the Spirit of the Lord gave them that rest, according to the promise. It is by the Spirit of the Lord that God's Israel are caused to return to God, and repose in him as their rest. Fifthly. All this he did for them by his own power, for his own praise. 1st. It was by his own power, as the God of nature, that has all the powers of nature at his command; he did it with his glorious arm, the arm of his gallantry or bravery, so the word signifies. It was not Moses' rod, but God's glorious arm that did it. 2nd. It was for his own praise; to "make himself an everlasting name," ver. 12; "a glorious name," ver. 14, that he might be glorified, everlastingly glorified upon this account. This is that which God is doing in the world with his glorious arm; he is making to himself a glorious name, and it shall last to endless ages, when the most celebrated names of the great ones of the earth shall be written in the dust.

15 Look down from heaven, [thy glory:
And behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of
Where is thy zeal and thy strength,
The sounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies toward me?
Are they restrained?
16 Doubtless thou art our father,
Though Abraham be ignorant of us,
And Israel acknowledge us not:
Thou, O LORD, art our father, our redeemer;
Thy name is from everlasting.
17 O LORD, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways,
And hardened our heart from thy fear?
Return for thy servants' sake,
The tribes of thine inheritance. [while:
18 The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little
Our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary.
19 We are thine: thou never barest rule over them;
They were not called by thy name.

The foregoing praises were intended as an introduction to this prayer, which is continued to the end of the next chapter; and it is an affectionate, importunate, pleading prayer; it is calculated for the time of the captivity. As they had promises, so they had prayers prepared for them against that time of need, that they might take with them words in turning to the Lord, and say unto him what he himself taught them to say, in which they might the better hope to prevail, the words being of God's own inditing. Some good interpreters think this prayer looks farther, and that it speaks the complaints of the Jews under their last and final rejection from God, and destruction by the Romans; for there is one passage in it, ch. lxiv. 4, which is applied to the grace of the Gospel by the apostle, 1 Cor. ii. 9, that grace, for the rejecting of which they were rejected. In these verses we may observe,

First. The petitions they put up to God.

1. That he would take cognizance of their case, and of the desires of their souls towards him; "Look down from heaven, and behold." They knew very well that God sees all, but they pray he would regard them, would condescend to favour them, would look upon them with an eye of compassion and concern, as he looked upon the affliction of his people in Egypt, when he was about to appear for their deliverance. In begging that he would only look down upon them, and behold them, they do in effect appeal to his justice against their enemies, and pray judgment against them, as Jehosnaphat, 2 Chr. xx. 11, 12, "Behold, how they reward us! Wilt thou not judge them?" And they refer themselves to his mercy and wisdom, in what way he will relieve them; Ps. xxv. 18, "Look upon mine affliction and my pain." Look down "from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory." God's holiness is his glory; heaven is his habitation, the throne of his glory, where he doth most manifest his glory, and from whence he is said to look down upon this earth, Ps. xxxiii. 14. His holiness is in a special manner celebrated there by the blessed angels, ch. vi. 3; Rev. iv. 8. There his holy ones attend him, and are continually about him, so that it is the habitation of his holiness, which is an encouragement to all his praying people, who desire to be holy as he is holy, that he dwells in a holy place.

2. That he would take a course for their relief; ver. 17, "Return," that is, Change thy way towards us, and proceed not in thy controversy with us. Return in mercy, and let us have not only a gracious look towards us, but thy gracious presence with us. God's people dread nothing more than his departures from them, and desire nothing more than his returns to them.

Secondly. The complaints they make to God. Two things they complain of:

1. That they were given up to themselves, and God's grace did not recover them, ver. 17. It is a strange expostulation, "Why hast thou made us to err from thy ways?" that is, many among us, the generality of us; and this complaint we have all of us some cause to make, that thou hast hardened our heart from thy fear. Some make it to be the language of those among them that were impious and profane. When the prophets reproved them for the error of their ways, their hardness of heart, and contempt of God's word and commandments, they, with a daring impudence, charge their sin upon God, and make him the author of it; and why doth he then find fault? Note, Those are wicked indeed that lay the blame of their wickedness upon God. But I rather take it to be the language of those among them that lamented the unbelief and impenitency of their people, not accusing God of being the author of it, but complaining of it to him. They own that they had erred from God's ways, that their hearts had been hardened from his fear, that they had not received the impressions which the fear of God ought to make upon them, and this was the cause of all their errors from his ways, or, from his fear, that is, from the true worship of God; and that is a hard heart indeed that is alienated from the service of a God so incontestably great and good. Now this they complain of as their great misery and burthen, that God had for their sins left them to this, had permitted them to err from his ways, and had justly withheld his grace, so that their hearts were hardened from his fear. When they ask, Why hast thou done this? it is not as charging him with wrong, but lamenting it as a sore judgment. God had made them to err, and hardened their hearts, not only by withdrawing his Spirit from them, because they had grieved, and vexed, and quenched him, ver. 10, but by a judicial sentence upon them, ch. vi. 9, 10, "Go, make the heart of this people fat," and by his providences concerning them, which had proved sad occasions of their departure from him. David complains of his banishment, that in it he was, in effect, bidden to go serve other gods, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19. Their troubles had alienated many of them from God, and prejudiced them against his service; and because the rod of the wicked had lain long on their lot, they were ready to put forth their hand unto iniquity, Ps. cxxv. 3. And this was the thing they complained most of, that their afflictions were their temptations, and to many of them invincible ones. Note, Convinced consciences complain most of spiritual judgments, and dread that most in an affliction which draws them from God and duty.

2. That they were given up to their enemies, and God's providence did not rescue and relieve them; ver. 18, "Our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary." As it was a grief to them, that in their captivity the generality of them had lost their affection to God's worship, and had their hearts hardened from it by their afflictions, so it was a farther grief that they were deprived of their opportunities of worshipping God in solemn assemblies. They complain not so much of the adversaries treading down their houses and cities, as of their treading down God's sanctuary, because thereby God was immediately affronted, and they were robbed of the comforts they valued most, and took most pleasure in.

Thirdly. The pleas they urge with God for mercy and deliverance.

1. They plead the tender compassion God used to shew to his people, and his ability and readiness to appear for them, ver. 15. The most prevailing arguments in prayer are those that are taken from God himself; so these are; "Where is thy zeal and thy strength?" God has a zeal for his own glory, and for the comfort of his people; his name is Jealous, and he is a jealous God; and he has a strength proportionable, to secure his own glory, and the interests of his people, in despite of all opposition. Now where are these? Have they not formerly appeared? Why do they not appear now? It cannot be that Divine zeal, which is infinitely wise and just, should be cooled, that Divine strength, which is infinite, should be weakened. Nay, his people had experienced not only his zeal and his strength, but the sounding of his bowels, or rather, the yearning of them, such a degree of compassion to them, as in men causeth a commotion and toss within them; as Hos. xi. 8, "Mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together;" and Jer. xxxi. 20, "My bowels are troubled," or sound, "for him." Thus God useth to be affected towards his people, and to express a multitude of mercies towards them. But where are they now? "Are they restrained?" Hath God, who so often remembered to be gracious, now forgotten it? "Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?" Ps. lxxvii. 9. It can never be. Note, We may ground good expectations of farther mercy upon our experiences of former mercy.

2. They plead God's relation to them as their Father, ver. 16. Thy tender mercies are not restrained, for they are the tender mercies of a Father, who, though he may be for a time displeased with his child, yet natural affection will soon prevail with him to be reconciled. "Doubtless thou art our Father," and therefore thy bowels will yearn towards us. Such good thoughts of God as these we should always keep up in our hearts. However it be, yet God is good, for he is our Father. They own themselves fatherless if he be not their Father, and so cast themselves upon him with whom "the fatherless find mercy," Hos. xiv. 3. It was the honour of their nation that they had Abraham to their father, Mat. iii. 9, who was the friend of God, and Israel, who was a prince with God; but what the better were they for that, unless they had God himself for their Father? for Abraham and Israel cannot help them: they have not the power that God hath, they are dead long since, and are ignorant of us, and acknowledge us not, they know not what our case is, nor what our wants are, and therefore know not which way to do us a kindness. If Abraham and Israel were alive with us, they would intercede for us, and advise us; but they are gone to the other world, and we know not that they have any communication at all with this world, and therefore are not capable of doing us any kindness, any farther than that we have the honour of being called their children. When the father is dead, "his sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not," Job xiv. 21. But thou, O Lord, art our Father still. The fathers of our flesh may call themselves ever loving, but they are not ever living; it is God only that is the immortal Father, that always knows us, and is never at a distance from us; and therefore, 'our Redeemer from everlasting is thy name,' the name by which we will know and own thee; it is the name by which from of old thou hast been known. Thy people have always looked upon thee as the God to whom they might appeal, to right them, and plead their cause. Nay, (according to the sense some give of this place,) though Abraham and Israel not only cannot, but would not help us, thou wilt; they have not the pity thou hast. We are so degenerate and corrupt, that Abraham and Israel would not own us for their children, yet we fly to thee as our Father. Abraham cast out his son Ishmael; Jacob disinherited his son Reuben, and cursed Simeon and Levi; but our heavenly Father, in pardoning sin, is God and not man, Hos. xi. 9.

3. They plead God's interest in them, that he was their Lord, their owner and proprietor; We are thy servants; what service we can do, thou art entitled to, and therefore we ought not to serve strange kings and strange gods. "Return, for thy servants' sake." As a father finds himself obliged by natural affection to relieve and protect his child, so a master thinks himself obliged in honour to rescue and protect his servant. We are thine by the strongest engagements, as well as the highest endearments. Thou hast borne rule over us, therefore, Lord, assert thine own interest, maintain thine own rights; for we are called by thy name, and therefore whither shall we go but to thee to be righted and protected? We are thine, save us, Ps. cxix. 44; thine own, own us. We are "the tribes of thine inheritance," not only thy servants, but thy tenants. We are thine, not only to do work for thee, but to pay rent to thee. The tribes of Israel are God's inheritance, from whence issues that little praise and worship that he receives from this lower world; and wilt thou suffer thine own servants and tenants to be thus abused?

4. They plead that they had had but a short enjoyment of the land of promise, and the privileges of the sanctuary; ver. 18, "The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while." From Abraham to David was but fourteen generations, and from David to the captivity but fourteen more, Mat. i. 17; and that was but a little while, in comparison with what might have been expected from the promise of the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, Gen. xvii. 8, and from the power that was put forth to bring them into that land, and settle them in it. Though we are "the people of thy holiness," distinguished from other people, and consecrated to thee, yet we are soon dislodged. But this they might thank themselves for; they were in profession the people of God's holiness, but it was their wickedness that turned them out of the possession of that land.

5. They plead, that those who had, and kept possession of their land, were such as were strangers to God, such as he had no service or honour from: "Thou never barest rule over them," nor did they ever yield thee any obedience. "They were not called by thy name," but profess relation to other gods, and were the worshippers of them. Will God suffer those that stand in no relation to him, to trample upon those that do? Some give another reading of this: We are become as those whom thou didst never bear rule over, nor were ever called by thy name. We are rejected and abandoned, despised and trampled upon, as if we never had been in thy service, nor had thy name called upon us. Thus the shield of Saul was vilely cast away, as though he had not been anointed with oil. But the covenant, that seems to be forgotten, shall be remembered again.

CHAPTER LXIV.

This chapter goes on with that pathetical, pleading prayer, which the church offered up to God in the latter part of the foregoing chapter. They had argued from their covenant relation to God, and his interest and concern in them; now here, I. They pray that God would appear in some remarkable surprising manner for them, against his and their enemies, ver. 1, 2. II. They plead what God had formerly done, and was always ready to do for his people, ver. 3—5. III. They confess themselves to be sinful, and unworthy of God's favour, and that they had deserved the judgments they were now under, ver. 6, 7. IV. They refer themselves to the mercy of God as a Father, and submit themselves to his sovereignty, ver. 8. V. They represent the very deplorable condition they were in, and earnestly pray for the pardon of sin, and the turning away of God's anger, ver. 9—12. And this was not only intended for the use of the captive Jews, but may serve for direction to the church in other times of distress, what to ask of God, and how to plead with him. Are God's people at any time in affliction, in great affliction? Let them pray, let them thus pray.

OH that thou wouldest rend the heavens, that thou wouldest come down,
That the mountains might flow down at thy presence,
2 As when the melting fire burneth,
The fire causeth the waters to boil,

GREAT GEYSERS OF ICELAND.

To make thy name known to thine adversaries,
That the nations may tremble at thy presence!
3 When thou didst terrible things which we looked not for,
Thou camest down, the mountains flowed down at thy presence.
4 For since the beginning of the world men have not heard,
Nor perceived by the ear,
Neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee,
What he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him.
5 Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness,
Those that remember thee in thy ways:
Behold, thou art wroth; for we have sinned:
In those is continuance, and we shall be saved.

Here, First. The petition is, that God would appear wonderfully for them now, ver. 1, 2. Their case was represented in the close of the foregoing chapter as very sad, and very hard; and in this case it was time to cry, Help, Lord; O that God would manifest his zeal and his strength. They had prayed, ch. lxiii. 15, that God would "look down from heaven;" here they pray that he would "come down" to deliver them, as he had said, Ex. iii. 8.

1. They desire that God would in his providence manifest himself both to them and for them. When God works some extraordinary deliverance for his people, he is said to shine forth, to shew himself strong; so here they pray that he would "rend the heavens," "and come down;" as when he delivered David he is said to bow the heavens and come down, Ps. xviii. 9; to display his power, and justice, and goodness, in an extraordinary manner, so as that all may take notice of them, and acknowledge them. This God's people desire and pray for, that they themselves having the satisfaction of seeing him, though his way be in the sea, others may be made to see him when his way is in the clouds. This is applicable to the second coming of Christ, when the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

2. They desire that he would vanquish all opposition, and that it might be made to give way before him; that "the mountains might flow down at thy presence;" that the fire of thy wrath may burn so hot against thine enemies as even to dissolve the rockiest mountains, and melt them down before it, as metal in the furnace, which is made liquid, and cast into what shape the operator pleaseth; so the melting fire burns, ver. 1. Let things be put into a ferment, in order to a glorious revolution in favour of the church, as "the fire causeth the waters to boil." There is an allusion here, some think, to the volcanoes, or burning mountains, which sometimes send forth such sulphurous streams as make the adjacent rivers and seas to boil; which, perhaps, are left as sensible intimations of the power of God's wrath, and warning pieces of the final conflagration.

3. They desire that this may tend very much to the glory and honour of God; may make his name known, not only to his friends, they knew it before, and trusted in his power; but to his adversaries likewise, that they may know it, and tremble at his presence, and may say with the men of Bethshemesh, "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? Who knows the power of his anger?" Note, Sooner or later God will make his name known to his adversaries, and force those to tremble at his presence that would not come and worship in his presence. God's name, if it be not a stronghold for us, into which we may run and be safe, will be a stronghold against us, out of the reach of which we cannot run and be safe. The day is come when nations shall be made to tremble at the presence of God, though they were never so numerous and strong.

Secondly. The plea is, that God had appeared wonderfully for his people formerly; and, Thou hast, therefore thou wilt, is good arguing at the throne of grace, Ps. x. 17.

1. They plead what he had done for his people Israel in particular, when he brought them out of Egypt, ver. 3. He then did terrible things in the plagues of Egypt, which they looked not for; they despaired of deliverance, so far were they from any thought of being delivered with such a high hand and outstretched arm. Then he came down upon mount Sinai, in such terror as made that and the adjacent mountains to flow down at his presence, to skip like rams, Ps. cxiv. 4; to tremble so that they were scattered, and the perpetual hills were made to bow, Hab. iii. 6. In the many great salvations God wrought for that people, he did terrible things which they looked not for; made great men, that seemed as stately and strong as mountains, to fall before him, and great opposition to give way: see Jud. v. 4, 5; Ps. lxviii. 7, 8. Some refer this to the defeat of Sennacherib's powerful army, which was as surprising an instance of the Divine power as the melting down of rocks and mountains would be.

2. They plead what God had been used to do, and had declared his gracious purpose to do for his people in general. The provision that he has made for the safety and happiness of his people, even of all those that seek him, and serve him, and trust in him, is very rich, and very ready; so that they need not fear being either disappointed of it, for it is sure, or disappointed in it, for it is sufficient.

1st. It is very rich, ver. 4. Men have not heard nor seen what God hath prepared for those that wait for him. Observe the character of God's people: they are such as wait for him in the way of duty; wait for the salvation he hath promised and designed them; and where the happiness of his people is bound up, it is what God has prepared for them; what he hath designed for them in his counsel, and is in his providence and grace preparing for them, and preparing them for; what he hath done, or will do, so it may be read. Some of the Jewish doctors have understood this of the blessings reserved for the days of the Messiah, and to them the apostle applies these words; and others extend them to the glories of the world to come. It is all that goodness which God hath laid up for them that fear him, and wrought for them that trust in him, Ps. xxxi. 19. Of this it is here said, that "since the beginning of the world," in the most prying and inquisitive ages of it, men have not either by hearing or seeing, the two learning senses, come to the full knowledge of it. None have seen or heard, or can understand, but God himself, what the provision is that is made for the present and future felicity of holy souls. For, First. Much of it was concealed in former ages. They knew it not, because the unsearchable riches of Christ were hid in God; were hid from the wise and prudent; but in latter ages they were revealed by the Gospel; so the apostle applies this, 1 Cor. ii. 9; for it follows, ver. 10, "But God has revealed them unto us by his Spirit;" compare Rom. xvi. 25, 26, with Eph. iii. 9. That which men had not heard since the beginning of the world they should hear before the end of it; and at the end of it should see, when the veil shall be rent to introduce the glory that is yet to be revealed. God himself knew what he had in store for believers, but none knew besides him. Secondly. It cannot be fully comprehended by human understanding; no, not when it is revealed. It is spiritual, and refined from those ideas which our minds are most apt to receive in this world of sense; it is very great, and will far outdo the utmost of our expectations. Even the present peace of all believers, much more their future bliss, is such as passeth all conception and expression, Phil. iv. 7. None can comprehend it but God himself, whose understanding is infinite. Some give another reading of these words, referring the transcendency, not so much to the work itself, as to the author of it; 'Neither hath the eye seen a God besides thee, which doth so (or hath done, or can do so) for him that waiteth for him.' We must infer from God's works of wondrous grace, as well as from his works of wondrous power, from the kind things as well as from the great things he doth, that there is no God like unto him, nor any among the sons of the mighty to be compared with him.

2nd. It is very ready; ver. 5, "Thou meetest him that rejoiceth, and worketh righteousness;" meetest him with that good which thou hast prepared for him, ver. 4, and dost not forget those that remember thee in thy ways. See here what communion there is between a gracious God and a gracious soul. First. What God expects from us, in order to our having communion with him. 1*st.* We must make conscience of doing our duty in every thing. We must work righteousness; must do that which is good, and which the Lord our God requires of us, and must do it well. 2*nd.* We must be cheerful in doing our duty. We must rejoice and work righteousness, must delight ourselves in God, and in his law; must be pleasant in his service, and sing at our work. God loves a cheerful giver, a cheerful worshipper; we must "serve the Lord with gladness." 3*rd.* We must conform ourselves to all the methods of his providence concerning us, and be suitably affected with them; must remember him in his ways, in all the ways wherein he walks, whether he walks towards us, or walks contrary to us. We must mind him, and make mention of him with thanksgiving, when his ways are ways of mercy, (in a day of prosperity be joyful,) with patience and submission when he contends with us,—In the way of thy judgments we have waited for thee; and in a day of adversity we must consider. Secondly. We are here told what we may expect from God, if we thus attend him in the way of duty; Thou meetest him that doth so. This speaks the friendship, and fellowship, and familiarity to which God admits them; he meets them to converse with them, to manifest himself to them, and to receive their addresses, Ex. xx. 24; xxix. 43. It notes likewise his freeness and forwardness in doing them good; he will prevent them with the blessings of his goodness, will rejoice to do good to them that rejoice in working righteousness, and wait to be gracious to those that wait for him. He meets his penitent people with a pardon, as the father of the prodigal met his returning son, Lu. xv. 20. He meets his praying people with an answer of peace, while they are yet speaking, ch. lxv. 24.

3. They plead the unchangeableness of God's favour, and the stability of his promise, notwithstanding the sins of his people, and his displeasure against them for their sins; Behold, thou hast many a time been wroth with us, because we have sinned, and we have been under the tokens of thy wrath; but in those, those ways of thine, thy ways of mercy in which we have remembered thee, "in those is continuance;" or, in those thou art ever, (his mercy endureth for ever,) and therefore we shall at last be saved, though thou art wroth, and we have sinned. This agrees with the tenor of God's covenant, that if we forsake the law he will chasten our transgression with a rod, but his lovingkindness he will not utterly take away; his covenant he will not break, Ps. lxxxix. 30, &c.; and by this his people have been many a time saved from ruin when they were just upon the brink of it: see Ps. lxxviii. 38. And by this continuance of the covenant we hope to be saved; for its being an everlasting covenant is all our salvation. Though God has been angry with us for our sins, and justly, yet his anger has endured but for a moment, and has been soon over; but in his favour is life, because in it is continuance; in the ways of his favour he proceeds and perseveres, and on that we depend for salvation: see ch. liv. 7, 8. It is well for us that our hopes of salvation are built not upon any merit or sufficiency of our own, for in that there is no certainty, (even Adam in innocency did not abide,) but upon God's mercies and promises; for in those we are sure is continuance.

6 But we are all as an unclean thing,
And all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags;
And we all do fade as a leaf;
And our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.
7 And there is none that calleth upon thy name,
That stirreth up himself to take hold of thee:
For thou hast hid thy face from us,
And hast consumed us, because of our iniquities.
8 But now, O LORD, thou art our father;
We are the clay, and thou our potter;
And we all are the work of thy hand.
9 Be not wroth very sore, O LORD,
Neither remember iniquity for ever:
Behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people.
10 Thy holy cities are a wilderness,
Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation.
11 Our holy and our beautiful house,
Where our fathers praised thee,
Is burned up with fire:
And all our pleasant things are laid waste.
12 Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things, O LORD?
Wilt thou hold thy peace, and afflict us very sore?

As we have the lamentations of Jeremiah, so here we have the lamentations of Isaiah; the subject of both is the same, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and the sin of Israel that brought that destruction, only with this difference—Isaiah sees it at a distance, and laments it by the spirit of prophecy; Jeremiah saw it accomplished. In these verses,

First. The people of God in their affliction confess and bewail their sins, thereby justifying God in their afflictions, owning themselves unworthy of his mercy, and thereby both improving their troubles and preparing for deliverance. Now they were under Divine rebukes for sin, they had nothing to trust to but the mere mercy of God, and the continuance of that; for among themselves there is none to help, none to uphold, none to stand in the gap, and make intercession; for they are all polluted with sin, and therefore unworthy to intercede; all careless and remiss in duty, and therefore unable and unfit to do it.

1. There was a general corruption of manners among them; ver. 6, "We are all as an unclean thing;" or, as an unclean person, as one overspread with a leprosy, that was to be shut out of the camp. The body of the people were like one under a ceremonial pollution, that was not admitted into the courts of the tabernacle, or like one labouring under some loathsome disease, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, nothing but wounds and bruises, ch. i. 6. We are all by sin become not only obnoxious to God's justice, but odious to his holiness; for sin is that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and cannot endure to look upon. Even "all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags;" that is, 1st. The best of our persons are so. We are all so corrupt and polluted, that even those among us who pass for righteous men, in comparison with what our fathers were, that rejoiced and wrought righteousness, ver. 5, are but as filthy rags, fit to be cast to the dunghill. The best of them is as a briar. 2nd. The best of our performances are so. There is not only a general corruption of manners, but in devotion too; those which pass for the sacrifices of righteousness, when they come to be inquired into, are the torn, and the lame, and the sick; and therefore are provoking to God, as nauseous as filthy rags. Our performances, though they be never so plausible, if we depend upon them as our righteousness, and think to merit by them at God's hand, they are as filthy rags; rags, and will not cover us; filthy rags, and will but defile us. True penitents cast away their idols as filthy rags, ch. xxx. 22, odious in their sight; here they acknowledge even their righteousness to be so in God's sight, if he should deal with them in strict justice. Our best duties are so defective, and so far short of the rule, that they are as rags, and so full of sin and corruption cleaving to them, that they are as filthy rags. When we would do good, evil is present with us; and the iniquity of our holy things would be our ruin if we were under the law.

2. There was a general coldness of devotion among them, ver. 7. The measure was filled by the abounding iniquity of the people, and nothing was done to empty it. 1st. Prayer was in a manner neglected. "There is none that calleth upon thy name," none that seeks to thee for grace to reform us, and take away sin; or for mercy to relieve us, and take away the judgments which our sins have brought upon us. Therefore people are so bad, because they do not pray: compare Ps. xiv. 3, 4, they are "altogether become filthy," for "they call not upon the Lord." It bodes ill to a people when prayer is restrained among them. 2nd. It was very negligently performed. If there was here and there one that called on God's name, it was with a great deal of indifferency. There is none that stirreth up himself to take hold of God. Note, First. To pray is to take hold of God, by faith to take hold of the promises, and the declarations God has made of his good-will to us, and to plead them with him; to take hold of him as of one who is about to depart from us, earnestly begging of him not to leave us; or of one that is departed, soliciting his return; to take hold of him as he that wrestles takes hold of him he wrestles with; for the seed of Jacob wrestle with him and so prevail. But when we take hold on God, it is as the boatman with his hook takes hold on the shore, as if he would pull the shore to him, but really it is to pull himself to the shore; so we pray, not to bring God to our mind, but to bring ourselves to his. Secondly. Those that would take hold of God in prayer, so as to prevail with him, must stir up themselves to do it. All that is within us must be employed in the duty, and all little enough; our thoughts fixed, and our affections flaming. And in order hereunto, all that is within us must be engaged, and summoned into the service; we must stir up the gift that is in us, by an actual consideration of the importance of the work that is before us, and a close application of mind towards it. But how can we expect God should come to us in ways of mercy, when there are none that do this; when those that profess to be intercessors are mere triflers?

Secondly. They acknowledge their afflictions to be the fruit and product of their own sins and God's wrath.

1. They brought their troubles upon themselves by their own folly. "We are all as an unclean thing," and therefore we do all fade away as a leaf, ver. 6; we not only wither and lose our beauty, but we fall and drop off, so the word signifies, as leaves in autumn. Our profession of religion withers, and we grow dry and sapless; our prosperity withers, and comes to nothing. We fall to the ground, as despicable and contemptible; and then "our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away," and hurried us into captivity, as the winds in autumn blow off, and then blow away, the faded, withered leaves, Ps. i. 3, 4. Sinners are blasted, and then carried away by the malignant and violent wind of their own iniquity; it withers them, and then ruins them.

2. God brought their troubles upon them by his wrath; ver. 7, "Thou hast hid thy face from us," that is, been displeased with us, and refused to afford us any succour. When they made themselves as an unclean thing, no wonder that God turned his face away from them as loathing them. Yet this was not all; Thou "hast consumed us, because of our iniquities." This is the same complaint with that, Ps. xc. 7, 8, "We are consumed by thine anger." Thou hast melted us, so the word is. God had them in the furnace, not to consume them as dross, but to melt them as gold, that they might be refined and new cast.

Thirdly. They claim relation to God as their God, and humbly plead it with him, and, in consideration of it, cheerfully refer themselves to him; ver. 8, "But now, O Lord, thou art our Father." Though we have carried it very undutifully and ungratefully towards thee, yet still we have owned thee as our Father: and, though thou hast corrected us, yet thou hast not cast us off. Foolish and careless as we are, poor and despised, and trampled upon as we are by our enemies, yet still thou art our Father. To thee, therefore, we return in our repentance, as the prodigal arose and came to his father; to thee we apply ourselves by prayer. From whom should we expect relief and succour but from our Father? It is the wrath of a Father that we are under, who will be reconciled, and not keep his anger for ever. God is their Father, 1. By creation. He gave them their being, formed them into a people, shaped them as he pleased; "We are the clay, and thou our potter;" therefore we will not quarrel with thee, however thou art pleased to deal with us, Jer. xviii. 6. Nay, therefore, we will hope that thou wilt deal well with us, that thou who madest us wilt new make us, new form us, though we have unmade and formed ourselves. "We are all as an unclean thing," but "we are all the work of thy hands;" therefore do away our uncleanness, that we may be fit for thy use, the use we were made for. We are the work of thy hands, therefore forsake us not, Ps. cxxxviii. 8. 2. By covenant. This is pleaded ver. 9, "Behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people," all the people thou hast in the world, that make open profession of thy name. We are all called thy people; so our neighbours look upon us, and therefore what we suffer reflects upon thee, and the relief that our case requires is expected from thee. We are thy people; and "should not a people seek unto their God?" ch. viii. 19. We are thine, save us, Ps. cxix. 94. Note, When we are under providential rebukes from God, it is good to keep fast hold of our covenant relation to him.

Fourthly. They are importunate with God for the turning away of his anger, and the pardoning of their sins; ver. 9, "Be not wrath very sore, O Lord," though we have deserved thou shouldest, "neither remember iniquity for ever" against us. They do not expressly pray for the removal of the judgment they were under; as to that they refer themselves to God; but, 1. They pray that God would be reconciled to them, and then they can be easy, whether the affliction be continued or removed; Be not wroth to extremity, but let thine anger be mitigated by the clemency and compassion of a father. They do not say, Lord, rebuke us not, for that may be necessary, but, Not in thine anger, not in thy hot displeasure. It is but in a little wrath that God hides his face. 2. They pray that they may not be dealt with according to the desert of their sin; "Neither remember iniquity for ever." Such is the evil of sin, that it deserves to be remembered for ever; and this is that which they deprecate, that consequence of sin which is for ever. Those make it to appear they are truly humbled under the hand of God that are more afraid of the terror of God's wrath, and the fatal consequences of their own sin, than of any judgment whatsoever, looking upon these as the sting of death.

Fifthly. They lodge in the court of heaven a very melancholy representation or memorial of the lamentable condition they were in, and the ruins they were groaning under.

1. Their own houses were in ruins, ver. 10. The cities of Judah were destroyed by the Chaldeans, and the inhabitants of them were carried away, so that there was none to repair them or take any notice of them, which would in a few years make them look like perfect deserts, "Thy holy cities are a wilderness." The cities of Judah are called holy cities, for the people were unto God a kingdom of priests. The cities had synagogues in them, in which God was served, and therefore they lamented the ruins of them, and insisted upon this in pleading with God for them; not so much that they were stately cities, rich or ancient ones, but they are holy cities, cities in which God's name is known, professed, and called upon. These cities are a wilderness, the beauty of them is sullied, they are neither inhabited nor visited, as formerly; "They have burnt up all the synagogues of God in the land," Ps. lxxiv. 8. Nor was it only the lesser cities that were thus left as a wilderness unfrequented, but even "Zion is a wilderness," the city of David itself lies in ruins. Jerusalem, that was beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth, is now deformed, and is become the scorn and scandal of the whole earth; that noble city is a desolation, a heap of rubbish. See what devastations sin brings upon a people, and an external profession of sanctity will be no fence against them. Holy cities, if they become wicked cities, will be soonest of all turned into a wilderness, Am. iii. 2.

2. God's house was in ruins, ver. 11. This they lament most of all, that the temple was burnt with fire; but as soon as it was built they were told what their sin would bring it to, 2 Chr. vii. 21, "This house, which is high, shall be an astonishment." Observe how pathetically they bewail the ruins of the temple. 1st. It was their holy and beautiful house. It was a most sumptuous building, but the holiness of it was, in their eye, the greatest beauty of it; and consequently the profanation of it was the saddest part of its desolation, and that which grieved them most, that the sacred services that used to be performed there were discontinued. 2nd. It was the place where their fathers praised God with their sacrifices and songs. What pity is it that that should lie in ashes which had been for so many ages the glory of their nation! It aggravated their present disuse of the songs of Zion that their fathers had so often praised God with them. They interest God in the cause when they plead it was the house where he had been praised, and put him in mind, too, of his covenant with their fathers, by taking notice of their fathers' praising him. 3rd. With it all their pleasant things were laid waste. All their desires, their delights, all those things which were employed by them in the service of God, which they had a great delight in. Not only the furniture of the temple, the altars, and the table, but especially the sabbaths and new moons, and all their religious feasts, which they used to keep with gladness, their ministers and solemn assemblies, these were all a desolation. Note, God's people reckon their sacred things their most delectable things; rob them of holy ordinances and the means of grace, and you lay waste all their pleasant things. What have they more? Observe here how God and his people have their interests twisted and interchanged. When they speak of the cities for their own habitation they call them, "thy holy cities," for to thee we have dedicated them. When they speak of the temple wherein God dwelt they call it, "Our beautiful house," and its furniture, "Our pleasant things," for they had heartily espoused it, and all the interests of it. If thus we interest God in all our concerns by devoting them to his service, and interest ourselves in all his concerns by laying them near our hearts, we may with satisfaction leave both with him, for he will perfect both.

Sixthly. They conclude with an affectionate expostulation, humbly arguing with God concerning their present desolations; ver. 12, "Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things?" Or, Canst thou contain thyself at these things? Canst thou see thy temple ruined, and not resent it, not revenge it? Has the jealous God forgotten to be jealous? Ps. lxxiv. 22, "Arise, O God, plead thine own cause." Lord, thou art insulted, thou art blasphemed, and "wilt thou hold thy peace," and take no notice of it? Shall the highest affronts that can be done to heaven pass unrebuked? When we are abused we hold our peace, because vengeance doth not belong to us, and because we have a God to refer our cause to. When God is injured in his honour it may justly be expected he should speak in the vindication of it. His people prescribe not to him what he shall say, but their prayer is, as here, Ps. lxxxiii. 1, "Keep not thou silence, O God;" and Ps. cix. 1, "Hold not thy peace, O God of my praise." Speak for the conviction of thine enemies, speak for the comfort and relief of thy people; for wilt thou afflict us very sore, or afflict us for ever? as it may be read. It is a sore affliction to good people to see God's sanctuary laid waste, and nothing done towards the raising of it out of its ruins. But God hath said he will not contend for ever, and therefore his people may depend upon it that their afflictions shall be neither to extremity nor to eternity, but light, and for a moment.

CHAPTER LXV.

We are now drawing towards the conclusion of this evangelical prophecy; the two last chapters of which direct us to look as far forwards as the new heavens and the new earth, the new world which the gospel dispensation should bring in; and the separation that should by it be made between the precious and the vile: For judgment, saith Christ, am I come into this world. And why should it seem absurd, that the prophet here should speak of that, to which all the prophets bare witness, 1 Pet. i. 10, 11. The rejection of the Jews, and the calling in of the Gentiles, is often mentioned in the New Testament, as that which was foreseen and foretold by the prophets, Acts x. 43; xiii. 40; Rom. xvi. 26. In this chapter we have, I. The preventing of the Gentiles with the gospel call, ver. 1. II. The rejection of the Jews for their obstinacy and unbelief, ver. 2—7. III. The saving of a remnant of them, by bringing them into the gospel church, ver. 8—10. IV. The judgments of God that should pursue the rejected Jews, ver. 11—16. V. The blessings reserved for the Christian church, which should be its joy and glory, ver. 17—25. But these things are here prophesied of under the type and figure of the difference God would make between some and others of the Jews after their return out of captivity, between those that feared God, and those that did not; with reproofs of the sins then found among them, and promises of the blessings then in reserve for them.

I AM sought of them that asked not for me;

The apostle Paul, an expositor we may depend upon, hath given us the true sense of these verses, and told us what was the event they pointed at and were fulfilled in, namely, the calling in of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, by the preaching of the Gospel, Rom. x. 20, 21; and he observes that herein Esaias is very bold, not only in foretelling a thing so incredible and improbable ever to be brought about, but in foretelling it to the Jews, who would take it as a mighty affront to their nation, and therein Moses' words would be made good, Deu. xxxii. 21; "I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people."

First. It is here foretold that the Gentiles that had been afar off should be made nigh, ver. 1. Paul reads it thus, "I was found of them that sought me not, I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me." Observe what a wonderful and blessed change was made with them, and how they were surprised into it. 1. Those that had long been without God in the world shall now be set on seeking him, that had not said, Where is God my Maker? shall now begin to inquire after him. Neither they nor their fathers had called upon his name, but either lived without prayer or prayed to stocks and stones, the work of men's hands. But now they shall be baptized, and call on the name of the Lord, Acts ii. 21. With what pleasure doth the great God here speak of his being sought unto. And how doth he glory in it, especially by those that in time past had not asked for him! For there is joy in heaven over great sinners that repent. 2. God shall prevent their prayers with his blessings; "I am found of them that sought me not." This happy acquaintance and correspondence between God and the Gentile world began on his side; they came to know God because they were known of him, Gal. iv. 9, to seek God and find him, because they were first sought and found of him. Though in after communion God is found of those that seek him, Pr. viii. 17, yet in the first conversion he is found of those that seek him not, for therefore we love him, because he first loved us. The design of the bounty of common providence to them was, that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him, Acts xvii. 27. But they sought him not; still he was to them an unknown God, and yet God was found of them. 3. God gave them the advantages of a Divine revelation which had never made a profession of religion; "I said, Behold me, behold me;" gave them a sight of me, and invited them to take the comfort and benefit of it, who were "not called by my name," as the Jews for many ages had been. When the apostles went about from place to place preaching the Gospel, this was the substance of what they preached, Behold God, behold him! turn towards him, fix the eyes of your minds upon him, acquaint yourselves with him, admire him, adore him; look off your idols that you have made, and look upon the living God that made you. Christ in them said, Behold me, behold me with an eye of faith; look unto me, and be ye saved. And this was said to those that had long been Lo-ammi and Lo-ruhamah, Hos. i. 8, 9, not a people; and that had not obtained mercy, Rom. ix. 25, 26.

Secondly. It is here foretold that the Jews, that had long been a people near to God, should be cast off and set at a distance, ver. 2. The apostle applies this to the Jews in his time, as a seed of evil-doers, Rom. x. 21, "But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people." Where observe, 1. How the Jews were courted to the Divine grace. God himself, by his prophets, by his Son, by his apostles, stretched forth his hand to them, as Wisdom did, Pr. i. 24. God spread out his hands to them, as one reasoning and expostulating with them; not only beckoned to them with the finger, but spread out his hands, as being ready to embrace and entertain them, reaching forth the tokens of his favour to them, and importuning them to accept of them. When Christ was crucified, his hands were spread out and stretched forth, as if he were preparing to receive returning sinners into his bosom. And this all the day, all the gospel day; he waited to be gracious, and was not weary of waiting: even those that came in at the eleventh hour of the day were not rejected. 2. How they contemned the invitation. It was given to a rebellious and gainsaying people; they were bidden to the wedding supper, and would not come, but rejected the counsel of God against themselves. Now here we have,

1. The bad character of this people. The world shall see it is not for nothing that they are rejected of God; no, it is for their whoredoms that they are put away. Their character in general is such as one would not expect them to deserve that had been so much the favourites of heaven. 1st. They were very wilful. Right or wrong, they would do as they had a mind. They generally walk on in a way that is not good, not the right way, nor a safe way, for they walk after their own thoughts, their own devices and desires. If our guide be our own thoughts, our way is not likely to be good; for every imagination of the thought of our heart is only evil. God had told them his thoughts, what his mind and will was; but they would walk after their own thoughts, would do what they thought best. 2nd. They were very provoking. This was God's complaint of them all along; they grieved him, they vexed his Holy Spirit, as if they would contrive how to make him their enemy; They provoke me "to anger continually to my face." They cared not what affront they gave to God, though it were in his sight and presence, in a downright contempt of his authority and defiance of his justice; and this continually. It had been their way and manner ever since they were a people; witness the day of temptation in the wilderness. The prophet speaks more particularly of their iniquities and the iniquities of their fathers, as the ground of God's casting them off, ver. 7. Now he gives instances of both. First. The most provoking iniquity of their fathers was idolatry. This the prophet tells them was provoking to God, to his face; and it is an iniquity which, as appears by the second commandment, God often visits upon the children. This was the sin that brought them into captivity; and though the captivity pretty well cured them of it, yet, when the final ruin of that nation came, that was again brought into the account against them, for in the day when God visits he will visit that, Ex. xxxii. 34. Perhaps there were many, long after the captivity, who, though they did not worship other gods, yet were guilty of the disorders here mentioned, for they married strange wives. 1*st.* They forsook God's temple, and sacrificed in gardens or groves, that they might have the satisfaction of doing it in their own way, for they liked not God's institutions. 2*nd.* They forsook God's altar, and burnt incense upon bricks, altars of their own contriving. They burnt incense according to their own inventions, which were of no more value in comparison with God's institution than an altar of bricks in comparison with the golden altar, which God appointed them to burn incense on; or upon tiles, (so some read it,) such as they covered their flat-roofed houses with, and on them sometimes they burnt incense to their idols, as appears, 2 Kin. xxiii. 12, where we read of altars "on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz;" and, Jer. xix. 13, of their burning incense to the host of heaven upon the roofs of their houses. 3*rd.* They use necromancy, or consulting with the dead, and in order to that they "remain among the graves," and "lodge in the monuments," to seek for the living to the dead, ch. v. 19, as the witch of Endor. Or, they used to consult the evil spirits that haunted the sepulchres. 4*th.* They violated the laws of God about their meat, and broke through the distinction between clean and unclean, before it was taken away by the Gospel; they "eat swine's flesh." Some, indeed, chose rather to die than to do it, as Eleazar and the seven brethren, in the story of the Maccabees; but it is likely many did, especially when it came to be a test for their lives. In our Saviour's time we read of a vast herd of swine among them, which gives us cause to suspect that there were many then who made so little conscience of the law as to eat swine's flesh, for which they were justly punished in the destruction of the swine. And the broth, or pieces of other forbidden meats, called here abominable things, was in their vessels, and made use of for food. The forbidden meat is called an abomination, and they that meddle with it are said to make themselves abominable, Lev. xi. 42, 43. Those that durst not eat the meat yet made bold with the broth, because they would come as near as might be to that which was forbidden, to shew how they coveted the forbidden fruit. Perhaps this is here put figuratively for all forbidden pleasures and profits which are obtained by sin, that abominable thing which the Lord hates; they loved to be dallying with it, to be tasting of its broth. But those who thus take a pride in venturing upon the borders of sin and the brink of it are in danger of falling into the depths of it. But, Secondly. The most provoking iniquity of the Jews in our Saviour's time was, their pride and hypocrisy, that sin of the scribes and Pharisees, against which Christ denounced so many woes, ver. 5. They say, "Stand by thyself," keep off; get thee to thine, (so the original is;) keep to thy own companions; but "come not near to me," lest thou pollute me. Touch me not, I will not allow thee any familiarity with me, "for I am holier than thou," and therefore thou art not good enough to converse with me; "I am not as other men are, nor even as this publican." This they were ready to say to every one they met with; so that in saying, "I am holier than thou," they thought themselves holier than any; not only very good, as good as they should be, as good as they needed to be, but better than any of their neighbours. "These are a smoke in my nose," saith God; such a smoke as comes not from a quick fire, which soon becomes glowing and pleasant, but from a fire of wet wood, that burns all the day, and is nothing but smoke. Note, Nothing in men is more odious and offensive to God than a proud conceit of themselves and contempt of others, for commonly those are most unholy of all that think themselves holier than any.

2. The controversy God had with them for this. The proof against them is plain, "Behold, it is written before me," ver. 6. It is written to be remembered against them in time to come, for they may not perhaps be presently reckoned with. The sins of sinners, and particularly the vain-glorious boasts and scorns of hypocrites, are laid up in store with God, Deu. xxxii. 34. And what is written shall be read and proceeded upon; "I will not keep silence" always, though I may keep silence long. They shall not think him altogether such a one as themselves, as sometimes they have done, but he "will recompense, even recompense into their bosom." Those basely abuse religion, that honourable and sacred thing, who make their profession of it the matter of their pride; and the jealous God will reckon with them for it; the profession they boast of shall but serve to aggravate their condemnation. 1st. The iniquity of their fathers shall come against them. Not but that their own sin deserved whatever judgments God brought upon them, and much heavier, and they owned it, Ezr. ix. 13; but God would not have wrought so great a desolation upon them, if he had not therein had an eye to the sins of their fathers. Therefore in the last destruction of Jerusalem God is said to bring upon them the blood of the Old Testament martyrs, even that of Abel, Mat. xxiii. 35. God will reckon with them not only for their fathers' idols, but for their high places, their burning incense upon the mountains and the hills, though perhaps it was to the true God only. This was blaspheming or reproaching God: it was a reflection upon the choice he had made of the place where he would record his name, and the promise he had made, that there he would meet them and bless them. 2nd. Their own, with that, shall bring ruin upon them. "Your iniquities and the iniquities of your fathers together," the one aggravating the other, is the former work, which, though it may seem to be overlooked and forgotten, shall be measured into their bosom. God will render into the bosom not only of his open enemies, Ps. lxxix. 12, but of his false and treacherous friends, the reproach wherewith they have reproached him.

8 Thus saith the LORD,
As the new wine is found in the cluster,
And one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it:
So will I do for my servants' sakes, that I may not destroy them all.
9 And I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob,
And out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains:
And mine elect shall inherit it,
And my servants shall dwell there.
10 And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, [in,
And the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down
For my people that have sought me.

This is expounded by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 1—5, where, when upon occasion of the rejection of the Jews, it is asked, "Hath God then cast away his people?" he answers, No; for "at this time there is a remnant according to the election of grace." This prophecy has reference to that distinguished remnant. When that hypocritical nation is to be destroyed, God will separate and secure to himself some from among them; some of the Jews shall be brought to embrace the Christian faith, shall be added to the church, and so be saved. And our Saviour hath told us, that for the sake of these elect the days of the destruction of the Jews should be shortened, and a stop put to the desolation, which otherwise would have proceeded to that degree that no flesh should be saved, Mat. xxiv. 22. Now,

First. This is illustrated here by a comparison, ver. 8. When a vine is so blasted and withered that there seems to be no sap or life in it, and therefore the dresser of the vineyard is in a mind to pluck it up, or cut it down; yet if never so little of the juice of the grape, fit to make new wine, be found, though but in one cluster, a stander-by interposeth, and saith, "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it;" there is life in the root, and hopes that yet it may become good for something. Note, Good men are blessings to the places where they live; and sometimes God spares whole cities and nations for the sake of a few such in them. How ambitious should we be of this honour, not only to be distinguished from others, but serviceable to others!

Secondly. Here is a description of those that shall make up this saved, saving remnant. 1. They are such as serve God. It is for "my servants' sake," ver. 8; and they are my servants that shall dwell there, ver. 9. God's faithful servants, however they are looked upon, are the best friends their country hath; and those who serve him therein serve their generation. 2. They are such as seek God; that make it the end of their lives to glorify God, and the business of their lives to call upon him. It is "for my people that have sought me." They that seek God shall find him, and shall find him their bountiful rewarder.

Thirdly. Here is an account of the mercy God hath in store for them. The remnant that shall return out of captivity shall have a happy settlement again in their own land, and that by an hereditary right, as "a seed out of Jacob," in whom the family is kept up, and the entail preserved, and from whom, as from the seed sown, shall spring a numerous increase; and these typify the remnant of Jacob that shall be incorporated into the gospel church by faith. 1. They shall have a good portion for themselves. They shall inherit my mountains, the holy mountains on which Jerusalem and the temple were built; or, the mountains of Canaan, the land of promise, typifying the covenant of grace, which all God's servants, his elect, both inhabit and inherit; they make it their refuge, their rest, and residence; so they dwell in it, are at home in it; and they have taken it to be their heritage for ever, and it shall be to them an inheritance incorruptible. God's chosen, the spiritual seed of praying Jacob, shall be the inheritors of his mountains of bliss and joy, and shall be carried safe to them through the vale of tears. 2. They shall have a green pasture for their flocks; ver. 10, Sharon and the valley of Achor shall again be as well replenished as ever they were with cattle. Sharon lay westward near Joppa, Achor lay eastward near Jordan; which intimates that they shall recover the possession of the whole land, that they shall have wherewith to stock it all, and that they shall peaceably enjoy it, and there shall be none to disturb them or make them afraid. Gospel ordinances are the fields and valleys where the sheep of Christ shall go in and out, and find pasture, Jno. x. 9; and where they are made to lie down, Ps. xxiii. 2, as Israel's herds in the valley of Achor, Hos. ii. 15.

11 But ye are they that forsake the LORD,
That forget my holy mountain,
That prepare a table for that troop,
And that furnish the drink offering unto that number.

12 Therefore will I number you to the sword,
And ye shall all bow down to the slaughter:
Because when I called, ye did not answer;
When I spake, ye did not hear;
But did evil before mine eyes,
And did choose that wherein I delighted not.
13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD,
Behold, my servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry:
Behold, my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty:
Behold, my servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed:
14 Behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart,
But ye shall cry for sorrow of heart,
And shall howl for vexation of spirit.
15 And ye shall leave your name for a curse unto my chosen:
For the Lord GOD shall slay thee,
And call his servants by another name:
16 That he who blesseth himself in the earth
Shall bless himself in the God of truth;
And he that sweareth in the earth
Shall swear by the God of truth;
Because the former troubles are forgotten,
And because they are hid from mine eyes.

Here the different states of the wicked and godly, of the Jews that believed, and of those that still persisted in unbelief, are set the one over against the other, as life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse.

First. Here is the fearful doom of those that persisted in their idolatry after their deliverance out of Babylon, and in infidelity after the preaching of the Gospel of Christ. The doom is the same upon both; ver. 12, "I will number you to the sword," as sheep for the slaughter, and there shall be no escaping, no standing out, you shall bow down to it. God's judgments come, 1st. Regularly, and are executed according to the commission. Those fall by the sword that are numbered or counted out to it, and none but they. Though the sword seems to devour promiscuously one as well as another, yet it is made to know its number, and shall not exceed. 2nd. Irresistibly. The strongest and most stout-hearted sinners shall be forced to bow before them; for none ever hardened their hearts against God and prospered. Now observe what the sins are that number them to the sword.

1. Idolatry was the ancient sin; ver. 11, "Ye are they that," instead of seeking me, and serving me as my people, "forsake the Lord," disown him, and cast him off to embrace other gods; "that forget my holy mountain," the privileges of that, and the obligations you lie under to that, to burn incense upon the mountains of your idols, ver. 7; and have deserted the only living and true God. They prepared a table for that troop of deities which the heathen worship, and pour out drink offerings to that numberless number of them; for they that thought one God too little never thought scores and hundreds enough, but were still adding to the number of them, till they had as many gods as cities, and their altars were as thick as "heaps in the furrows of the fields," Hos. xii. 11. Some take Gad and Meni, which we translate a troop and a number, to be the proper names of two of their idols, answering to Jupiter and Mercury. Whatever they were, their worshippers spared no cost to do them honour; they prepare a table for them, and filled out mixed wine for drink offerings to them; would pinch their families rather than stint their devotions, which should shame the worshippers of the true God out of their niggardliness.

2. Infidelity was the sin of the latter Jews; ver. 12, "When I called, ye did not answer," which refers to the same that ver. 2 did, "I have stretched out my hands to a rebellious people;" and that is applied to those who rejected the Gospel. Our Lord Jesus himself called; he "stood and cried," Jno. vii. 37, but they did not hear, they would not answer; they were not convinced by his reasonings, nor moved by his expostulations. Both the fair warnings he gave them of death and ruin, and the fair offers he made them of life and happiness, were slighted, and made no impression upon them. Yet this was not all; Ye "did evil before mine eyes," not by surprise, or through inadvertency, but with deliberation; ye "did choose that wherein I delighted not;" he means, which he did utterly detest and abhor. It is not strange that those who will not be persuaded to choose that which is good do persist in their choice and pursuit of that which is evil. See the malignity of sin, it is evil in God's eyes, highly offensive to him, and yet it is committed before his eyes, in his sight and presence, and in contempt of him. It is likewise a contradiction to the will of God; it is doing that of choice which we know will displease him.

Secondly. The aggravation of this doom, from the consideration of the happy state of those that were brought to repentance and faith. The blessedness of those that serve God, and the woful condition of those that rebel against him, are here set the one over against the other, that they may serve as a foil to each other, ver. 13—16. 1st. God's servants may well think themselves happy, and for ever indebted to that free grace that made them so, when they see how miserable some of their neighbours are for want of that grace, who are hardened, and likely to perish for ever in unbelief, and what a narrow escape they had of being among them: see ch. lxvi. 24. 2nd. It will add to the grief of those that perish to see the happiness of God's servants, whom they had hated and vilified, and looked upon with the utmost disdain; and especially to think that they might have shared in their bliss, if it had not been their own fault. It made the torment of the rich man in hell the more grievous that he saw "Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom," Lu. xvi. 23: see Lu. xiii. 28. Sometimes the providence of God makes such a difference as this between good and bad in this world; and the prosperity of the righteous becomes a grievous eyesore and vexation of heart to the wicked, Ps. cxii. 10; however, it will be so in the great day. "We fools counted his life madness, and his end without honour; but now, how is he numbered with the saints, and his lot is among the chosen!"

Now the difference of their states lies in two things:

1. In point of comfort and satisfaction. 1st. God's servants shall eat and drink. They shall have the bread of life to feed, to feast upon continually; shall be abundantly replenished with the goodness of his house, and shall want nothing that is good for them. Heaven's happiness will be to them an everlasting feast, they shall be filled with that which now they hunger and thirst after; but those who set their hearts upon the world, and place their happiness in that, shall be hungry and thirsty, always empty, always craving; for it is not bread,—it surfeits, but it satisfieth not. In communion with God, and dependence upon him, there is full satisfaction, but in sinful pursuits there is nothing but disappointment. 2nd. God's servants shall rejoice, and sing for joy of heart. They have constant cause for joy, and there is nothing that may be an occasion of grief to them, but they have an allay sufficient for it; and, as far as faith is in act and exercise, they have a heart to rejoice, and their joy is their strength. They shall rejoice in their hope, because it shall not make them ashamed. Heaven will be a world of everlasting joy to all that are now sowing in tears. But, on the other hand, they that forsake the Lord shut themselves out from all true joy, for they shall be ashamed of their vain confidence in themselves, and their own righteousness, and the hopes they had built thereon. When the expectations of bliss wherewith they had flattered themselves are frustrated, O what confusion will fill their faces! Then shall they "cry for sorrow of heart," and "howl for vexation of spirit," perhaps, in this world, when their laughter shall be turned into mourning, and their joy into heaviness; however, in that world where the torment will be endless, easeless, and remediless; nothing but weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth to eternity. Let these two be compared, "Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented;" and which of the two will we choose to take our lot with?

2. In point of honour and reputation, ver. 15, 16. "The memory of the just is" and shall be "blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot." 1st. The name of the idolaters and unbelievers shall be left for a curse, shall be loaded with ignominy, and made for ever infamous. It shall be used in giving ill characters,—Thou art as cruel as a Jew; and in imprecations,—God make thee as miserable as a Jew. It shall be for a curse to God's chosen; that is, for a warning to them. They shall be afraid of falling under the curse upon the Jewish nation, of perishing by the same example of unbelief. The curse of those whom God rejects should make his chosen stand in awe. "The Lord God shall slay thee;" that is, shall quite extirpate the Jews, and cut them off from being a people; they shall no longer live as a nation, nor ever be incorporated again. 2nd. The name of God's chosen shall become a blessing; he shall "call his servants by another name." The children of the covenant shall no longer be called Jews, but Christians; and to them, under that name, all the promises and privileges of the new covenant shall be secured. This other name shall be an honourable name; it shall not be confined to one nation, but with it men shall bless themselves in the earth, that is, all the world over; God shall have servants out of all nations, that shall all be dignified with this new name. First. They shall give honour to God both in their prayers and in their solemn oaths, in their addresses for his favour as their felicity, and their appeals to his justice as their judge. This is a part of the homage we owe to God: we must bless ourselves in him; that is, we must reckon that we have enough to make us happy, that we need no more, and can desire no more, if we have him for our God. It is of great consequence what that is which we bless ourselves in, which we most please ourselves with, and value ourselves by our interest in. Worldly people bless themselves in the abundance they have of this world's goods, Ps. xlix. 18; Lu. xii. 19; but God's servants bless themselves in him, as a God all-sufficient for them. He is their crown of glory, and diadem of beauty, and their strength and portion; by him also they shall swear, and not by any creature or any false god. To his judgment they shall refer themselves from whom every man's judgment doth proceed. Secondly. They shall give honour to him as "the God of truth;" 'the God of the Amen,' so the word is. Some understand it of Christ, who is himself "the Amen, the faithful and true witness," Rev. iii. 14, and in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen, 2 Cor. i. 20. In him we must bless ourselves, and by him we must swear unto the Lord, and covenant with him. He that is blessed in the earth, (so some read it,) shall be blessed in the true God; for Christ is "the true God, and eternal life," 1 Jno. v. 20. And it was promised of old, that in him should all the families of the earth be blessed, Gen. xii. 3. Some read it, He shall bless himself in the God of the faithful people; in God, as the God of all believers; desiring no more but to share in the blessings wherewith they are blessed, to be dealt with as he useth to deal with them. Thirdly. They shall give him honour, as the author of this blessed change which they have the experience of. They shall think themselves happy in having him for their God, that has made them to forget their former troubles, the remembrance of them being swallowed up in their present comforts, because they are hid from God's eyes; that is, they are quite taken away; for if there were any remainder of their troubles, God would be sure to have his eye upon it, in compassion to them, and concern for them. They shall no longer feel them, for God will no longer see them. He is pleased to speak as if he would make himself easy by making them easy; and therefore they shall, with a great deal of satisfaction, bless themselves in him.

17 For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth:
And the former shall not be remembered,
Nor come into mind.
18 But be ye glad and rejoice for ever
In that which I create:
For, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing,
And her people a joy.
19 And I will rejoice in Jerusalem,
And joy in my people:
And the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her,
Nor the voice of crying.
20 There shall be no more thence an infant of days,
Nor an old man that hath not filled his days:
For the child shall die an hundred years old;
But the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed.
21 And they shall build houses, and inhabit them;
And they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.
22 They shall not build, and another inhabit;

They shall not plant, and another eat:
For as the days of a tree are the days of my people,
And mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands.
23 They shall not labour in vain,
Nor bring forth for trouble;
For they are the seed of the blessed of the LORD,
And their offspring with them.
24 And it shall come to pass,
That before they call, I will answer;
And while they are yet speaking, I will hear.
25 The wolf and the lamb shall feed together,
And the lion shall eat straw like the bullock:
And dust shall be the serpent's meat.
They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain,
Saith the LORD.

MOUNT MORIAH.

These promises, if they were in part fulfilled, when the Jews (after their return out of captivity) were settled in peace in their own land, and brought as it were into a new world, yet they were to have their full accomplishment in the gospel church, militant first, and at length triumphant. The "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." In the graces and comforts which believers have in and from Christ, we are to look for this new heaven and new earth. It is in the Gospel that old things are passed away, and all things are become new; and by it, that those that are in Christ are new creatures, 2 Cor. v. 17. It was a mighty and happy change that was described, ver. 16, that the former troubles were forgotten; but here it riseth much higher, even the former world shall be forgotten, and shall no more come into mind. They that were converted to the Christian faith were so transported with the comforts of it, that all the comforts they were before acquainted with became as nothing to them. Not only their foregoing griefs, but their foregoing joys, were lost and swallowed up in this. The glorified saints will therefore have forgotten this world, because they will be entirely taken up with the other. "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth." See how inexhaustible the Divine power is. The same God that created one heaven and earth can create another. See how entire the happiness of the saints is. It shall be all of a piece; with the new heavens God will create them (if they have occasion for it to make them happy) a new earth too; The world is yours, if you be Christ's, 1 Cor. iii. 22. When God is reconciled to us, which gives us a new heaven, the creatures too are reconciled to us, which gives us a new earth. The future glory of the saints will be so entirely different from what they ever knew before, that it may well be called, "new heavens, and a new earth," 2 Pet. iii. 13. "Behold, I make all things new," Rev. xxi. 5.

First. There shall be new joys. For, 1. All the church's friends, and all that belong to her, shall rejoice, ver. 18. You shall "be glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create." The new things which God creates in and by his gospel are and shall be matter of everlasting joy to all believers. "My servants shall rejoice," ver. 13; at last they shall, though now they mourn. "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." 2. The church shall be the matter of their joy; so pleasant, so prosperous shall her condition be; "I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." The church shall not only rejoice, but be rejoiced in; those that have sorrowed with the church shall rejoice with her. 3. The prosperity of the church shall be a rejoicing to God himself, who has pleasure in the prosperity of his servants, ver. 19. I will rejoice in Jerusalem's joy, and will joy in my people; for in all their afflictions he was afflicted. God will not only rejoice in the church's well-doing, but will himself rejoice to do her good, and rest in his love to her, Zeph. iii. 17. What God rejoiceth in it becomes us to rejoice in. 4. There shall be no allay of this joy nor any alteration of this happy condition of the church; "The voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her." If this relate to any state of the church in this life, it means no more but that the former occasions of grief shall not return, but God's people shall long enjoy an uninterrupted tranquillity. But in heaven it shall have full accomplishment, in respect both of the perfection and perpetuity of the promised joy; there all tears shall be wiped away.

Secondly. There shall be new life, ver. 20. Untimely deaths by the sword, or sickness shall be no more known as they have been; and by this means there shall be no more crying, ver. 19; when there shall be no more death, there shall be no more sorrow, Rev. xxi. 21. As death has reigned by sin, so life shall reign by righteousness, Rom. v. 14, 21. 1. Believers through Christ shall be satisfied with life, though it be never so short on earth. If an infant end its days quickly, yet it shall not be reckoned to die untimely; for the shorter its life is, the longer will its rest be. Though death reign over them that have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, yet they, dying in the arms of Christ, the second Adam, and belonging to his kingdom, they are not to be called infants of days: but even the child shall be reckoned to "die a hundred years old," for he shall rise again at full age, shall rise to eternal life. Some understand it of children, that in their childhood are so eminent for wisdom and grace, and by death nipped in the blossom, that they may be said to die a hundred years old; and as for old men, it is promised, that they shall fill their days with the fruits of righteousness, which they still bring forth in old age, to shew that the Lord is upright; and then it is a good old age. An old man that is wise, and good, and useful, may truly be said to have filled his days. Old men that have their hearts upon the world, have never filled their days; never have enough of this world, but would still continue longer in it. But that man dies old, and 'full of days,'—satur dierum, that, with Simon, having seen God's salvation, desires now to depart in peace. 2. Unbelievers shall be unsatisfied, and unhappy in life, though it be never so long. "The sinner," though he live to be "a hundred years old, shall be accursed." His living so long shall be no token to him of the Divine favour and blessing; nor shall it be any shelter to him from the Divine wrath and curse. The sentence he lies under will certainly be executed, and his long life is but a long reprieve. Nay, it is itself a curse to him; for the longer he lives the more wrath he treasures up against the day of wrath, and will have the more sins to answer for. So that the matter is not great whether our lives on earth be long or short, but whether we live the lives of saints, or the lives of sinners.

Thirdly. There shall be a new enjoyment of the comforts of life. That, whereas before it was very uncertain and precarious, their enemies inhabited the houses which they built, and eat the fruit of the trees which they planted, now it shall be otherwise; they shall build houses and inhabit them, shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them, ver. 21, 22. This intimates that the labour of their hands shall be blessed, and be made to prosper. They shall gain what they aimed at, and what they have gained shall be preserved and secured to them. They shall enjoy it comfortably, and nothing shall embitter it to them; and they shall live to enjoy it long. Strangers shall not break upon them, to expel them, and plant themselves in their room, as sometimes they have done. "Mine elect shall" wear out, or "long enjoy, the work of their hands;" it is honestly got, and it will wear well. It is the work of their hands, which they themselves have laboured for; and it is most comfortable to enjoy that, and not to eat the bread of idleness, or bread of deceit. If we have a heart to enjoy it, that is the gift of God's grace, Eccl. iii. 13; and if we live to enjoy it long, it is the gift of God's providence; for that is here promised, "As the days of a tree are the days of my people;" as the days of an oak, (ch. vi. 13,) whose substance is in it, though it cast its leaves. Though it be stripped every winter, it recovers itself again, and lasts many ages. 'As the days of the tree of life;' so the Seventy. Christ is to them the tree of life, and in him believers enjoy all those spiritual comforts which are typified by the abundance of temporal blessings here promised; and it shall not be in the power of their enemies to deprive them of these blessings, or disturb them in the enjoyment of them.

Fourthly. There shall be a new generation rising up in their stead, to inherit and enjoy these blessings; ver. 23, "They shall not labour in vain," for they shall not only enjoy the work of their hands themselves; but they shall leave it with satisfaction to those that shall come after them, and not with such a melancholy prospect as Solomon did, Eccl. ii. 18, 19. "They shall not beget and bring forth children for trouble; for they are themselves the seed of the blessed of the Lord," and there is a blessing entailed upon them by descent from their ancestors, which "their offspring with them" shall partake of, and shall be, as well as they, "the seed of the blessed of the Lord." They shall not bring forth for trouble; for, 1. God will make their children that rise up, comforts to them; they shall have the joy of seeing them walk in the truth. 2. He will make the times that come after comfortable to their children. As they shall be good, so it shall be well with them; they shall not be brought forth to days of trouble, nor shall it ever be said, Blessed is the womb that bore not. In the gospel church Christ's name shall be borne up by a succession; "a seed shall serve him," Ps. xxii. 30, "the seed of the blessed of the Lord."

Fifthly. There shall be a good correspondence between them and their God; ver. 34, Even "before they call, I will answer." God will prevent their prayers with the blessings of his goodness. David did but say, "I will confess," and God forgave, Ps. xxxii. 5. The father of the prodigal met him in his return. "While they are yet speaking," before they have finished their prayer, I will give them the thing they pray for, or the assurances and earnests of it. These are high expressions of God's readiness to hear prayer; and this appears much more in the grace of the Gospel than it did under the law; and we owe the comfort of it to the mediation of Christ as our Advocate with the Father, and are obliged in gratitude to give a ready ear to God's calls.

Sixthly. There shall be a good correspondence between them and their neighbours; ver. 25, "The wolf and the lamb shall feed together," as they did in Noah's ark. God's people, though they are as sheep in the midst of wolves, yet shall be safe and unhurt; for God will not so much break the power, and tie the hands of their enemies, as formerly, but will turn their hearts, will alter their disposition by his grace. When Paul, that had been a persecutor of the disciples, (that being of the tribe of Benjamin, ravened as a wolf, Gen. xlix. 27,) joined himself to them, and became one of them, then the wolf and the lamb fed together. So also, when the enmity between Jews and Gentiles was slain, all hostilities ceased, and they fed together as one sheepfold, under Christ the great Shepherd, Jno. x. 16. The enemies of the church ceased to do the mischief they had done, and its members ceased to be so quarrelsome with, and injurious to, one another as they had been; so that there was none, either from without or from within, to hurt or destroy,—none to disturb it, much less to ruin it, in all the holy mountain; as was promised, ch. xi. 9. For, 1. Men shall be changed. "The lion" shall no more be a beast of prey, (as perhaps he never would have been if sin had not entered,) but "shall eat straw like the bullock;" shall know his owner, and his master's crib, as the ox doth. When those that lived by spoil and rapine, and coveted to enrich themselves, right or wrong, are brought by the grace of God to accommodate themselves to their condition, to live by honest labour, and to be content with such things as they have—when they that stole steal no more, but work with their hands the thing that is good,—then this is fulfilled, that "the lion shall eat straw like the bullock." 2. Satan shall be chained, the dragon bound; "for dust shall be the serpent's meat" again. That great enemy, when he has been let loose, has glutted and regaled himself with the precious blood of saints, who, by his instigation, have been persecuted; and with the precious souls of sinners, who, by his instigation, have been persecutors, and have ruined themselves for ever; but now he shall be confined to dust, according to the sentence; "On thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat," Gen. iii. 14. All the enemies of God's church, that are subtle and venomous as serpents, shall be conquered and subdued, and be made to lick the dust. Christ shall reign as Zion's King, till all the enemies of his kingdom be made his footstool, and theirs too; and in the holy mountain above, there, and there only, shall this promise have its full accomplishment, that there shall be none to hurt or destroy.

CHAPTER LXVI.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, and many expressions the same; and therefore looks the same way, to the different state of the good and bad among the Jews, at their return out of captivity; but that typifying the rejection of the Jews in the days of the Messiah, the conversion of the Gentiles, and the setting up of the gospel kingdom in the world. The 1st verse of the chapter is applied by Stephen to the dismantling of the temple, by the planting of the Christian church, Acts vii. 49, 50, which may serve as a key to the whole chapter. We have here, I. The contempt God puts upon ceremonial services, in comparison with moral duties; and an intimation therein of his purpose shortly to put an end to the temple and sacrifice, and reject those that adhered to them, ver. 1—4. II. The salvation God will in due time work for his people, out of the hands of their oppressors, ver. 5; speaking terror to the persecutors, ver. 6, and comfort to the persecuted, a speedy and complete deliverance, ver. 7—9; a joyful settlement, ver. 10, 11; the accession of the Gentiles to them, and abundance of satisfaction therein, ver. 12—14. III. The terrible vengeance which God will bring upon the enemies of his church and people, ver. 15—18. IV. The happy establishment of the church upon large and sure foundations; its constant attendance on God, and triumph over its enemies, ver. 19—24. And we may well expect that this evangelical prophet, here, in the close of this prophecy, should (as he doth) look as far forward as to the latter days, to the last day, to the days of eternity.

THUS saith the LORD,
The heaven is my throne,
And the earth is my footstool:
Where is the house that ye build unto me?
And where is the place of my rest?
2 For all those things hath mine hand made,
And all those things have been, saith the LORD:
But to this man will I look,
Even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit,
And trembleth at my word.
3 He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man;
He that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck;
He that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood;
He that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol.
Yea, they have chosen their own ways,
And their soul delighteth in their abominations.
4 I also will choose their delusions,
And will bring their fears upon them;
Because when I called, none did answer;
When I spake, they did not hear:
But they did evil before mine eyes,
And chose that in which I delighted not.

Here, First. The temple is slighted in comparison with a gracious soul, ver. 1, 2. The Jews in the prophet's time, and afterwards in Christ's time, gloried much in the temple, and promised themselves great things from it. To humble them therefore, and to shake their vain confidence, both the prophets and Christ foretold the ruin of the temple, that God would leave it, and then it would soon be desolate. After it was destroyed by the Chaldeans it soon recovered itself, and the ceremonial services were revived with it; but by the Romans it was made a perpetual desolation, and the ceremonial law was abolished with it. That the world might be prepared for this, they were often told, as here, of what little account the temple was with God.

1. That he did not need it. The heaven was the throne of his glory and government, there he sits infinitely exalted in the highest dignity and dominion, above all blessing and praise. The earth is his footstool, on which he stands, overruling all the affairs of it according to his will. If God has so bright a throne, so large a footstool, where then is the house they can build unto God, that can be the residence of his glory; or, where is the place of his rest? What satisfaction can the Eternal Mind take in a house made with men's hands? What occasion has he, as we have, for a house to repose himself in, who fainteth not neither is weary, who neither slumbers nor sleeps? Or, if he had occasion he would not tell us, Ps. l. 12; for all these things hath his hands made; heaven, and all its courts; earth, and all its borders, and all the hosts of both. "All those things have been," have had their beginning by the power of God, who was happy from eternity, before they were, and therefore could not be benefited by them. 'All these things are,' so some read it; they still continue, upheld by the same power that made them; so that our goodness extendeth not to him. If he would have had a house for himself to dwell in, he would have made one himself when he made the world; and if he had made one it would have continued to this day, as other creatures do, according to his ordinance; so that he had no need of a temple made with hands.

2. That he would not heed it, so as he would an humble, penitent, gracious heart. He hath a heaven and earth of his own making, and a temple of man's making; but he overlooks them all, that he may look with favour to him that is poor in spirit, humble and serious, self-abasing and self-denying; whose heart is truly contrite for sin, penitent for it, and in pain to get it pardoned, and that trembleth at God's word; not as Felix did, with a transient qualm that was over when the sermon was done, but with an habitual awe of God's majesty and purity, and an habitual dread of his justice and wrath. Such a heart is a living temple for God, he dwells there, and it is the place of his rest; it is like heaven and earth, his throne and his footstool.

Secondly. Sacrifices are slighted when they come from ungracious hands. The sacrifice of the wicked is not only unacceptable, but it is an abomination to the Lord, Pr. xv. 8; this is largely shewed here, ver. 3, 4. Observe,

1. How detestable their sacrifices were to God. The carnal Jews, after their return out of captivity, though they relapsed not to idolatry, yet grew very careless and loose in the service of God. They brought the torn, and the lame, and the sick for sacrifice, Mal. i. 8, 13; and this made their services abominable to God; they had no regard to their sacrifices, and therefore how could they think God should have any regard to them? The unbelieving Jews, after the Gospel was preached, and in it notice given of the offering up of the great sacrifice which put an end to all the ceremonial services, yet continued to offer sacrifices as if the law of Moses had been still in force, and could have made the comers thereunto perfect; and this was an abomination. "He that kills an ox" for his own table is welcome to do it; but he that now kills it, that thus kills it, for God's altar, "is as if he slew a man." It is as great an offence to God as murder itself; he that doth it doth in effect set aside Christ's sacrifice, treads under foot the blood of the covenant, and makes himself accessary to the guilt of the body and blood of the Lord; setting up what Christ died to abolish. "He that sacrificeth a lamb," if it be a corrupt thing, and not the male in his flock, the best he has, if he think to put God off with any thing, he affronts him, instead of pleasing him; it is "as if he cut off a dog's neck;" a creature in the eye of the law so vile that, whereas an ass might be redeemed, the price of a dog was never to be brought into the treasury, Deu. xxiii. 18. "He that offers an oblation," a meat offering, or drink offering, is as if he thought to make atonement with swine's blood; a creature that must not be eaten or touched; the broth of it was abominable, ch. lxv. 4, much more the blood of it. "He that burns incense" to God, and so puts contempt upon the incense of Christ's intercession, he is "as if he blessed an idol;" it was as great an affront to God as if they had paid their devotions to a false god. Hypocrisy and profaneness are as provoking as idolatry.

2. What their wickedness was which made their sacrifices thus detestable. It is because "they have chosen their own ways," the ways of their own wicked hearts; and not only their hands do but "their soul delighteth in their abominations." They were vicious and immoral in their conversations, chose the way of sin rather than the way of God's commandments, and took pleasure in that which was provoking to God; this made their sacrifices so offensive to God, ch. i. 11—15. Those that pretend to honour God by a profession of religion, and yet live wicked lives, put an affront upon him, as if he were the patron of sin. And that which was an aggravation of their wickedness was, that they persisted in it, notwithstanding the frequent calls given them to repent and reform. They turned a deaf ear to all the warnings of Divine justice, and all the offers of Divine grace; "When I called, none did answer," as before, ch. lxv. 12. And the same follows here that did there, "They did evil before mine eyes;" being deaf to what he said they cared not what he saw, but chose that in which they knew he delighted not. How could they expect to please him in their devotions who took no care to please him in their conversations, but, on the contrary, designed to provoke him?

3. The doom passed upon them for this. They chose their own ways, therefore, saith God, I also will choose their delusions; they have made their choice, (as Mr. Gataker paraphraseth it,) and now I will make mine; they have taken what course they pleased with me, and I will take what course I please with them. I will choose their illusions, or mockeries, so some. As they have mocked God, and dishonoured him by their wickedness, so God will give them up to their enemies to be trampled upon and insulted by them. Or, they shall be deceived by those vain confidences with which they have deceived themselves. God will make their sin their punishment; they shall be beaten with their own rod, and hurried into ruin by their own delusions. God will bring their fears upon them; that is, will bring that upon them which shall be a mighty terror to them; or, that which they themselves have been afraid of, and thought to escape by sinful shifts. Unbelieving hearts, and unpurified, unpacified consciences, need no more to make them miserable than to have their own fears brought upon them.

5 Hear the word of the LORD,
Ye that tremble at his word;
Your brethren that hated you,
That cast you out for my name's sake, said,
Let the LORD be glorified:
But he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be [ashamed.
6 A voice of noise from the city,
A voice from the temple,
A voice of the LORD that rendereth recompence to his [enemies.
7 Before she travailed, she brought forth;
Before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child.
8 Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things?
Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day?
Or shall a nation be born at once?
For as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.
9 Shall I bring to the birth, and not cause to bring forth? saith the LORD:
Shall I cause to bring forth, and shut the womb? saith [thy God.
10 Rejoice ye with Jerusalem,
And be glad with her, all ye that love her:
Rejoice for joy with her,
All ye that mourn for her:
11 That ye may suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations;
That ye may milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory.
12 For thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I will extend peace to her like a river,
And the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream:
Then shall ye suck,
Ye shall be borne upon her sides,
And be dandled upon her knees.
13 As one whom his mother comforteth,

So will I comfort you;
And ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem.
14 And when ye see this, your heart shall rejoice,
And your bones shall flourish like an herb:
And the hand of the LORD shall be known toward his [servants,
And his indignation toward his enemies.

The prophet, having denounced God's judgments against a hypocritical nation, that made a jest of God's word, and would not answer him when he called to them, here turns his speech to those that trembled at his word, to comfort and encourage them; they shall not be involved in the judgments that are coming upon their unbelieving nation. Ministers must distinguish thus, that when they speak terror to the wicked they may not make the hearts of the righteous sad; Bone Christiane, hoc nihil ad te,—'Good Christian, this is nothing to thee.' The prophet, having assured those that tremble at God's word of a gracious look from him, ver. 1, here brings them a gracious message from him. The word of God has comforts in store for those that by true humiliation for sin are prepared to receive them. There were those, ver. 4, that when God spoke would not hear; but if some will not others will. If the heart tremble at the word the ear will be open to it. Now what is here said to them?

First. Let them know that God will plead their just but injured cause against their persecutors; ver. 5, "Your brethren that hated you said, Let the Lord be glorified; but he shall appear to your joy." This, perhaps, might have reference to the case of some of the Jews, at their return out of captivity; but nothing like it appears in the history, and therefore it is rather to be referred to the first preachers and professors of the Gospel among the Jews to whose case it is very applicable. Observe, 1. How the faithful servants of God were persecuted; their brethren hated them. The apostles were Jews by birth, and yet even in the cities of the Gentiles the Jews they met with there were their most bitter and implacable enemies, and stirred up the Gentiles against them. The spouse complains, Cant. i. 6, that her mother's children were angry with her. Pilate upbraided our Lord Jesus with this; "Thine own nation have delivered thee unto me," Jno. xviii. 35. Their brethren, that should have loved them, and encouraged them for their work's sake, hated them, and cast them out of their synagogues; excommunicated them, as if they had been the greatest blemishes, who really were the greatest blessings, of their church and nation. This was a fruit of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman. They that hated Christ hated his disciples, because they supported his kingdom and interest, Jno. xv. 18; and they cast them out for his name's sake, because they were called by his name, and called upon his name, and laid out themselves to advance his name. Note, It is no new thing for church censures to be misapplied, and for her artillery, that was intended for her defence, to be turned against her best friends, by the treachery of her governors. And they that did this said, "Let the Lord be glorified;" that is, they pretended conscience and a zeal for the honour of God, and the church in it, and did it with all the formalities of devotion. Our Saviour explains this, and seems to have reference to it, Jno. xvi. 2, "They shall put you out of the synagogues," and "whosoever killeth you will think that he doth God service." In nomine Domini incipit omne malum,—'In the name of the Lord commences evil of every kind.' Or, we may understand it as spoken in defiance of God. You say, God will be glorified in your deliverance, let him be glorified then; "Let him make speed and hasten his work," ch. v. 19; let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him. Some take it to be the language of the profane Jews in captivity, bantering their brethren that hoped for deliverance, and ridiculing the expectations they often comforted themselves with, that God would shortly be glorified in it. They thus did what they could to shame the counsel of the poor, Ps. xiv. 6. 2. How they were encouraged under these persecutions. Hold out, faith and patience, yet a little while; your enemies hate you and oppress you; your brethren hate you and cast you out; but your Father in heaven loves you, and will appear for you, when no one else will or dare; his providence shall order things so as shall be for comfort to you; he shall appear for your joy, and confusion to those that abuse you and trample on you; they shall be ashamed of their enmity to you. This was fulfilled when, upon the signals given of Jerusalem's approaching ruin, the Jews' hearts failed them for fear; but the disciples of Christ, whom they had hated and persecuted, lifted up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption drew nigh, Lu. xxi. 28. Though God seem to hide himself he will in due time shew himself.

Secondly. Let them know that God's appearances for them will be such as will make a great noise in the world, ver. 6. There shall be "a voice of noise from the city, from the temple." Some make it the joyful and triumphant voice of the church's friends; others the frightful, lamenting voice of her enemies, surprised in the city, and fleeing in vain to the temple for shelter. These voices do but echo to the voice of the Lord, who is now rendering a "recompence to his enemies;" and those that will not hear him speaking this terror shall hear them returning the alarms of it in doleful shrieks. We may well think what a confused noise there was in the city and temple when Jerusalem, after a long siege, was at last taken by the Romans. Some think this prophecy was fulfilled in the prodigies that went before that destruction of Jerusalem, related by Josephus in his History of the Wars of the Jews, lib. vii. cap. 31, that the temple doors flew open suddenly of their own accord, and the priests heard a noise of motion, or shifting, in the most holy place, and presently a voice saying, 'Let us depart hence.' And some time after one Jesus Bar-Annas, at the feast of tabernacles, went up and down the city, continually crying, 'A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds; a voice against Jerusalem, and the temple; a voice against all this people.'

Thirdly. Let them know that God will set up a church for himself in the world, which shall be abundantly replenished in little time; ver. 7, "Before she travailed, she brought forth." This is to be applied in the type to the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, which was brought about very easily and silently, without any pain or struggle, such as was when they were brought out of Egypt; that was done by might and power, Deu. iv. 34, but this by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, Zec. iv. 6. The man-child of the deliverance is rejoiced in, and yet the mother was never in labour for it; "before her pain came, she was delivered." This is altogether surprising, uncommon, and without precedent, unless in the story which the Egyptian midwives told of the Hebrew women, Ex. i. 19, that they were lively, and were delivered ere the midwives came unto them. But, "shall the earth be made to bring forth" her fruits "in one day?" no, it is the work of some weeks in the spring to renew the face of the earth, and cover it with its products. Some read it to the same purpose with the next clause, Shall a land be brought forth in one day? or, "Shall a nation be born at once?" Is it to be imagined that a woman at one birth should bring children enough to people a country, and that they should in an instant grow up to maturity? No; something like this was done in the creation; but God hath since rested from all such works, and leaves second causes to produce their effects gradually; nihil facit per saltum,—'he does nothing abruptly.' Yet in this case, "as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth." Cyrus' proclamation was no sooner issued out, but the captives were formed into a body presently, and were ready to make the best of their way to their own land. And the reason is given, ver. 9, because it is the Lord's doing; he undertakes it whose work is perfect. If he bring to the birth in preparing his people for deliverance, he will cause to bring forth in the accomplishment of the deliverance. When every thing is ripe and ready for their release, and the number of their months is accomplished, so that the children are brought to the birth, shall not I then give strength to bring forth, but leave mother and babe to perish together in the most miserable case? How will this agree with the Divine pity? Shall I begin a work and not go through with it? How will that agree with the Divine power and perfection? 'Am I he that causes to bring forth,' (so the following clause may be read,) 'and shall I restrain her?' Doth God cause mankind, and all the species of living creatures, to propagate and replenish the earth, and will he restrain Zion? Will he not make her fruitful in a blessed offspring to replenish the church? Or, am I he that begat, and should I restrain from bringing forth? Did God beget the deliverance in his purpose and promise, and will he not bring it forth in the accomplishment and performance of it? But this was a figure of the setting up of the Christian church in the world, and the replenishing of that family with children which was to be named from Jesus Christ. When the Spirit was poured out, and the Gospel went forth from Zion, multitudes were converted in a little time, and with little pains, compared with the vast product. The apostles, even before they travailed, brought forth; and the children born to Christ were so numerous, and so suddenly and easily produced, that they were rather like the dew from the morning's womb than like the son from the mother's womb, Ps. cx. 3. The success of the Gospel was astonishing; that light, like the morning, strangely diffused itself, till it took hold even of the ends of the earth. Cities and nations were born at once to Christ. The same day that the Spirit was poured out there were three thousand souls added to the church. And when this glorious work was once begun it was carried on wonderfully, beyond what could be imagined; "so mightily grew the word of God and prevailed." He that brought to the birth in conviction of sin caused to bring forth in a thorough conversion to God.

Fourthly. Let them know that their present sorrows shall shortly be turned into abundant joys, ver. 10, 11. Observe,

1. How the church's friends are described. They are such as love her, and mourn with her, and for her. Note, All that love God love Jerusalem; they love the church of God, and lay its interests very near their heart. They admire the beauty of the church, take pleasure in communion with it, and heartily espouse its cause. And they that have a sincere affection for the church have a cordial sympathy with it in all the cares and sorrows of its militant state. They mourn for her; all her grievances are their griefs; and if Jerusalem be in distress their harps are hung on the willow-trees.

2. How they are encouraged. Rejoice with her; and again and again I say, rejoice. This intimates that Jerusalem shall have cause to rejoice; the days of her mourning shall be at an end, and she shall be comforted according to the time that she hath been afflicted. And it is the will of God that all her friends should join with her in her joys, for they shall share with her in those blessings that will be the matter of her joy. If we suffer with Christ, and sorrow with his church, we shall reign with him, and rejoice with it. We are here called, 1st. To bear our part in the church's praises. Come, rejoice with her, rejoice for joy with her; rejoice greatly; rejoice, and know why you rejoice; rejoice on the days appointed for public thanksgiving. You that mourned for her in her sorrows cannot but from the same principle rejoice with her in her joys. 2nd. To take our part in the church's comforts. We must "suck and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations." The word of God, the covenant of grace, especially the promises of that covenant, the ordinances of God, and all the opportunities of attending on him, and conversing with him, are the breasts, which the church calls and counts the breasts of her consolations, where her comforts are laid up, and whence by faith and prayer they are drawn. With her, therefore, we must suck from these breasts, by an application of the promises of God to ourselves, and a diligent attendance on his ordinances; and with the consolations which are drawn from hence we must be satisfied, and not unsatisfied, though we have never so little of earthly comforts. It is the glory of the church that she hath the Lord for her God, that to her pertains the adoption and the service of God, and with the abundance of this glory we must be delighted. We must take more pleasure in our relation to God, and communion with him, than in all the delights of the sons and daughters of men. Whatever is the glory of the church must be our glory and joy, particularly her purity, unity, and increase.

Fifthly. Let them know that he who gives them this call to rejoice will give them cause to do so, and hearts to do so, ver. 12—14.

1. He will give them cause to do so; for, 1st. They shall enjoy a long, uninterrupted course of prosperity; "I will extend," or am extending, "peace to her," that is, all good to her, "like a river," that runs in a constant stream, still increasing till it be swallowed up in the ocean. The Gospel brings with it, wherever it is received in its power, such peace as this, which shall go on like a river, supplying souls with all good, and making them fruitful, as a river doth the lands it passeth through; such a river of peace as the springs of the world's comforts cannot send forth, and the dams of the world's troubles cannot stop or drive back, or its sands rack up; such a river of peace as will carry us to the ocean of boundless and endless bliss. 2nd. There shall be large and advantageous additions made to them; "The glory of the Gentiles" shall come to them "like a flowing stream." Gentile converts shall come pouring into the church, and swell the river of her peace and prosperity; for they shall bring their glory with them,—their wealth and honour, their power and interest, shall all be devoted to the service of God, and employed for the good of the church. Then shall ye suck from the breasts of her consolations; when you see such crowding for a share in those comforts, you shall be the more solicitous, and the more vigorous, to secure your share; not for fear of having the less for others coming in to partake of Christ,—there is no danger of that, he has enough for all, and enough for each,—but their zeal shall provoke you to a holy jealousy. It is well when it doth so, Rom. xi. 14; 2 Cor. ix. 2. 3rd. God shall be glorified in all, and that ought to be more the matter of our joy than any thing else; ver. 14, "The hand of the Lord shall be known towards his servants,"—the protecting, supporting hand of his almighty power; the supplying, enriching hand of his inexhaustible goodness, the benefit which his servants have by both these, shall be known to his glory, as well as theirs. And, to make this the more illustrious, he will at the same time make known his indignation towards his enemies. God's mercy and justice shall both be manifested and for ever magnified.

2. God will not only give them cause to rejoice, but speak comfort to them; will speak it to their hearts; and it is he only that can do that, and make it fasten there. See what he will do for the comfort of all the sons of Zion. 1st. Their country shall be their tender nurse. Ye shall be carried on her sides, under her arms, as little children are, and shall be dandled upon her knees, as darlings are, especially when they are weary, and out of humour, and must be got to sleep. Those that are joined to the church, must be treated thus affectionately. The great Shepherd gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom, and so must the under-shepherds, that they may not be discouraged. Proselytes should be favourites. 2nd. God will himself be their powerful comforter; "As one whom his mother comforteth," when he is sick or sore, or upon any account in sorrow, "so will I comfort you," not only with the rational arguments which a prudent father useth, but with the tender affections and compassions of a loving mother, that bemoans her afflicted child, when it has fallen and hurt itself, that she may quiet it, and make it easy; or endeavours to pacify it, after she has chidden, and fallen out with it: see Jer. xxxi. 20, "Since I spake against him, my bowels are troubled for him;" he is a dear son, he is a pleasant child; thus the mother comforts. Thus "ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem," in the favours bestowed on the church, which you shall partake of, and in the thanksgivings offered by the church, which you shall concur with. 3rd. They shall feel the blessed effects of this comfort in their own souls; ver. 14, "When ye see this," what a happy state the church is restored to, not only your tongues and your countenances, but "your hearts shall rejoice." This was fulfilled in the wonderful satisfaction which Christ's disciples had in the success of their ministry; Christ, with an eye to that, tells them, Jno. xvi. 22, "Your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." Then "your bones," that were dried and withered, the marrow of them quite exhausted, shall recover a youthful strength and vigour, and shall "flourish like an herb." Divine comforts reach the inward man; they are marrow, and moistening to the bones, Pr. iii. 8. The bones are the strength of the body; those shall be made to flourish with these comforts. "The joy of the Lord will be your strength," Neh. viii. 10.

15 For, behold, the LORD will come with fire,
And with his chariots like a whirlwind,
To render his anger with fury,
And his rebuke with flames of fire.
16 For by fire and by his sword
Will the LORD plead with all flesh:
And the slain of the LORD shall be many.
17 They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens
Behind one tree in the midst,
Eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse,
Shall be consumed together, saith the LORD.
18 For I know their works and their thoughts:
It shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues;
And they shall come, and see my glory.
19 And I will set a sign among them,
And I will send those that escape of them unto the nations,
To Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow,
To Tubal, and Javan, to the isles afar off,
That have not heard my fame,
Neither have seen my glory;
And they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles.
20 And they shall bring all your brethren
For an offering unto the LORD out of all nations
Upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters,
And upon mules, and upon swift beasts,
To my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the LORD,
As the children of Israel bring an offering
In a clean vessel into the house of the LORD.
21 And I will also take of them
For priests and for Levites, saith the LORD.
22 For as the new heavens
And the new earth, which I will make,
Shall remain before me, saith the LORD,
So shall your seed and your name remain.
23 And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another,
And from one sabbath to another,
Shall all flesh come to worship before me,
Saith the LORD.
24 And they shall go forth, and look upon
The carcases of the men that have transgressed against me:
For their worm shall not die,
Neither shall their fire be quenched;
And they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.

These verses, like the pillar of cloud and fire, have a dark side towards the enemies of God's kingdom and all that are rebels against his crown, and a bright side towards his faithful, loyal subjects. Probably it refers to the Jews in captivity in Babylon, of whom some are said to have been sent thither for their hurt; and those are they with whom God here threatens to proceed in his controversy, who hated to be reformed, and therefore should be ruined by the calamity, Jer. xxiv. 9. Others were sent thither for their good; and they should have the trouble sanctified to them, should in due time get well through it, and see many a good day after it. Divers of the expressions here used are accommodated to that glorious dispensation. But doubtless it looks farther, to the judgment for which Christ did come once, and will come again, into this world; and to the distinction which his word, in both, makes between the precious and the vile.

First. Christ will appear to the confusion and terror of all those that stand it out against him. Sometimes in temporal judgments. The Jews that persisted in infidelity were cut off by fire, and by his sword. The ruin was very extensive; the Lord then pleaded with all flesh, and, it being his sword with which they are cut off, they are called his slain, sacrificed to his justice. And they shall be many. In the great day, the wrath of God will be his fire and sword, with which he will cut off and consume all the impenitent; and his word, when it takes hold of sinners' consciences, burns like fire, and is sharper than any two-edged sword. Idolaters will especially be contended with in the day of wrath, ver. 17. Perhaps some of those who returned out of Babylon retained such instances of idolatry and superstition as are here mentioned; had their idols in their gardens, (not daring to set them up publicly in the high places,) and there purified themselves, as the worshippers of the true God used to do, when they went about their idolatrous rites, one after another; or, as we read it, "behind one tree in the midst;" behind Ahad, or Ehad, some idol that they worshipped by that name, and in honour of which they ate swine's flesh, which was expressly forbidden by the law of God; and other abominations, as the mouse, or some other like animal. But it may refer to all those judgments which the wrath of God, according to the word of God, will bring upon provoking sinners, that live in contempt of God, and are devoted to the world and the flesh; they shall be consumed together. From the happiness of heaven we find expressly excluded all idolaters, and whosoever worketh abomination, Rev. xxi. 27; xxii. 15. In the day of vengeance, secret wickedness will be brought to light, and brought to the account; for, ver. 18, "I know their works, and their thoughts." God knows both what men do, and from what principle and with what design they do it, and therefore is fit to judge the world because he can "judge the secrets of men," Rom. ii. 16.

Secondly. He will appear to the comfort and joy of all that are faithful to him, in the setting up of his kingdom in this world, the kingdom of grace, the earnest and firstfruits of the kingdom of glory. The time shall come that he will gather all nations and tongues to himself, that they might come and see his glory, as it shines in the face of Jesus Christ, ver. 18. This was fulfilled when all nations were to be discipled, and the gift of tongues bestowed in order thereunto. The church had hitherto been confined to one nation, and in one tongue only was God worshipped; but in the days of the Messiah the partition wall shall be taken down, and those that had been strangers to God shall be brought acquainted with him, and shall see his glory in the Gospel, as the Jews had seen it in the sanctuary. As to this, it is here promised,

1. That some of the Jewish nation should, by the grace of God, be distinguished from the rest, and marked for salvation. I will not only set up a gathering ensign among them, to which the Gentiles shall seek, as is promised ch. xi. 12; but there shall be those among them on whom I will set a differencing sign, for so the word signifies. Though they are a corrupt, degenerate nation, yet God will set apart a remnant of them, that shall be devoted to him, and employed for him, and a mark shall be set upon them; with such certainty will God own them, Eze. ix. 4. The servants of God shall be sealed in their foreheads, Rev. vii. 3. The Lord knows them that are his. Christ's sheep are marked.

2. That those who are themselves distinguished thus by the grace of God shall be commissioned to invite others to come and take the benefit of that grace. Those that escape the power of those prejudices by which the generality of that nation is kept in unbelief, they shall be sent into the nations to carry the Gospel among them, and preach it to every creature. Note, Those who themselves have escaped the wrath to come should do all they can to snatch others also as brands out of the burning. God chooseth to send those on his errands that can deliver their message feelingly and experimentally, and warn people of their danger by sin, as those who have themselves narrowly escaped the danger. 1st. They shall be sent unto the nations; divers of which are here named, Tarshish, and Pul, and Lud, &c. It is uncertain, nor are interpreters agreed, what countries are here intended. Tarshish signifies in general, the sea, yet some take it for Tarsus in Cilicia. Pul is mentioned sometimes as the name of one of the kings of Assyria; perhaps some part of that country might likewise bear that name. Lud is supposed to be Lydia, a warlike nation, famed for archers. The Lydians are said to handle and bend the bow, Jer. xlvi. 9. Tubal, some think, is Italy or Spain; and Javan most agree to be Greece, the Iones; and the isles of the Gentiles, that were peopled by the posterity of Japhet, Gen. x. 5, probably are here meant by the "isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory." In Judah only God was known, and there only his name was great for many ages. Other countries sat in darkness; heard not the joyful sound, saw not the joyful light. This deplorable state of theirs seems to be spoken of here with compassion; for it is pity that any of the children of men should be at such a distance from their Maker as not to hear his name, and see his glory. In consideration of this, 2nd. Those that are sent to the nations shall go upon God's errand to declare his glory among the Gentiles. The Jews that shall be dispersed among the nations shall declare the glory of God's providence concerning their nation all along, by which many shall be invited to join with them, as also by the appearances of God's glory among them in his ordinances. Some out of all languages of the nations shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, entreating him to take notice of them, to admit them into his company, and to stay a little while for them, till they are ready: for, "we will go with you," having "heard that God is with you," Zec. viii. 23. Thus the glory of God was in part declared among the Gentiles, but more clearly and fully by the apostles and preachers of the Gospel, who were sent into all the world, even to the isles afar off, to publish the glorious Gospel of the blessed God. "They went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them," Mar. xvi. 20.

3. That many converts shall hereby be made; ver. 20, "They shall bring all your brethren" (for proselytes ought to be owned and embraced as brethren) "for an offering unto the Lord." God's glory shall not be in vain declared to them, but by it they shall be both invited and directed to join themselves to the Lord. They that are sent to them shall succeed so well in their negociation, that thereupon there shall be great flocking to Jerusalem, as used to be at the time of a solemn feast, when all the males from all parts of the country were to attend there, and not to appear empty. Observe, 1st. The conveniencies that they shall be furnished with for their coming. Some shall come upon horses, because they came from far, and the journey was too long to travel on foot, as the Jews usually did to their feasts. Persons of quality shall come in chariots, and the aged, and sickly, and little children, shall be brought in litters, or covered waggons, and the young men on mules, and swift beasts. This intimates their zeal and forwardness to come. They shall spare no trouble or charge to get to Jerusalem; those that cannot ride on horseback shall come in litters; and in such haste shall they be, and so impatient of delay, that those that can shall ride upon mules and swift beasts. These expressions are figurative, and those various means of conveyance are heaped up to intimate (saith the learned Mr. Gataker) the plentiful affording of all gracious helps requisite for the bringing of God's elect home to Christ. All shall be welcome, and nothing shall be wanting for their assistance and encouragement. 2nd. The character under which they shall be brought. They shall come, not as formerly they used to come, to Jerusalem, to be offerers, but to be themselves an offering unto the Lord, which must be understood spiritually, of their being presented to God as living sacrifices, Rom. xii. 1. The apostle explains this, and perhaps refers to it, Rom. xv. 16, where he speaks of his ministering the Gospel to the Gentiles, that the offering up or sacrificing of the Gentiles might be acceptable. They shall offer themselves, and those that are the instruments of their conversion shall offer them, as the spoils they have taken for Christ, and which are devoted to his service and honour. They shall be brought "as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel," with great care that they be holy, purified from sin, and sanctified to God. It is said of the converted Gentiles, Acts xv. 9, that their hearts were purified by faith. Whatever was brought to God was brought in a clean vessel, a vessel appropriated to religious uses. God will be served and honoured in the way that he has appointed, in the ordinances of his own institution, which are the proper vehicles for these spiritual offerings. And when the soul is offered up to God, the body must be a clean vessel for it, possessed in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of uncleanness, 1 Thes. iv. 4, 5. And converts to Christ are not only purged from an evil conscience, but have their bodies also washed with pure water, Heb. x. 22. Now this may refer, First. To the Jews, devout men, and proselytes out of every nation under heaven, that flocked together to Jerusalem, expecting the kingdom of the Messiah to appear, Acts ii. 5, 6, 10. They came from all parts to the holy mountain of Jerusalem, as an offering to the Lord, and there many of them were brought to the faith of Christ, by the gift of tongues poured out on the apostles. Methinks there is some correspondence between that history and this prophecy. The eunuch some time after came to worship at Jerusalem in his chariot, and took home with him the knowledge of Christ, and his holy religion. Secondly. To the Gentiles, some of all nations, that should be converted to Christ, and so added to his church, which, though a spiritual accession, is as often in prophecy represented by a local motion. The apostle saith of all true Christians, that they are come to mount Zion, and the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22, which explains this here, and shews that the meaning of all this parade is, only that they shall be brought into the church by the grace of God, and in the use of the means of that grace, as carefully, and safely, and comfortably, as if they were carried in chariots and litters. Thus God shall persuade Japhet, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, Gen. ix. 27.

4. That a gospel ministry shall be set up in the church, it being thus enlarged by the addition of such a multitude of members to it; ver. 21, "I will take of them," of the proselytes, of the Gentile converts, "for priests, and for Levites," to minister in holy things, and to preside in their religious assemblies, which is very necessary for doctrine, worship, and discipline. Hitherto the priests and Levites were all taken from among the Jews, and were all of one tribe; but in gospel times God will take of the converted Gentiles to minister to him in holy things, to teach the people, and to bless them in the name of the Lord, and to be the stewards of the mysteries of God, as the priests and Levites were under the law; to be pastors and teachers, or bishops, to give themselves to the word and prayer; and deacons to serve tables, and, as the Levites, to take care of the outward business of the house of God, Phil. i. 1; Acts vi. 2—4. The apostles were all Jews, and so were the seventy disciples; the great apostle of the Gentiles was himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews; but when churches were planted among the Gentiles they had ministers settled that were of themselves, elders in every church, Acts xiv. 23, Tit. i. 5, which made the ministry to spread the more easily, and to be the more familiar; and if not the more venerable, yet the more acceptable. Gospel grace, it might be hoped, would cure people of those corruptions which kept a prophet from having honour in his own country. God saith, I will take not all of them, (though they are all in a spiritual sense made to our God kings and priests,) but of them, some of them. It is God's work originally to choose ministers, by qualifying them for, and inclining them to, the service, as well as to make ministers, by giving them their commission. I will take them, that is, I will admit them, though Gentiles, and will accept of them and their ministrations. This is a great honour and advantage to the Gentile church, as it was to the Jewish church, that God raised up of their sons for prophets, and their young men for Nazarites, Am. ii. 11.

5. That the church and ministry, being thus settled, shall continue and be kept up in a succession from one generation to another, ver. 22. The change that will be made by the setting up the kingdom of the Messiah is here described to be, 1st. A very great and universal change. It shall be a new world, the new heavens and the new earth, promised before, ch. lxv. 17. "Old things are passed away, behold all things are become new," 2 Cor. v. 17; the old covenant of peculiarity set aside, and a new covenant, a covenant of grace, established, Heb. viii. 13. We are now to serve "in newness of the spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter," Rom. vii 6. New commandments are given relating both to heaven and earth, and new promises relating to both, and both together make a new testament; so that they are new heavens and a new earth that God will create, and these a preparative for the new heavens and new earth designed at the end of time, 2 Pet. iii. 13. 2nd. A change of God's own making. He will create the new heavens and the new earth. The change was made by him that had authority to make new ordinances, as well as power to make new worlds. 3rd. It will be an abiding, lasting change; a change never to be changed; a new world, that will be always new, and never wax old, as that which is ready to vanish away doth. It shall remain before me unalterable; for the gospel dispensation is to continue to the end of time, and not to be succeeded by any other. The kingdom of Christ is a kingdom that cannot be moved; the laws and privileges of it are things which cannot be shaken, but shall for ever remain, Heb. xii. 27, 28. It shall therefore remain, because it is before God; it is under his eye, and care, and special protection. 4th. It will be maintained in a seed that shall serve Christ. Your seed, and in them your name, shall remain. A seed of ministers, a seed of Christians. As one generation of both passeth away, another generation shall come; and thus the name of Christ, with that of Christians, shall continue on earth while the earth remains, and his throne as the days of heaven. The gates of hell, though they fight against the church, shall not prevail, nor wear out the saints of the Most High.

6. That the public worship of God in religious assemblies shall be carefully and constantly attended upon by all that are thus brought as an offering to the Lord, ver. 23. This is described in expressions suited to the Old Testament dispensation; to shew that, though the ceremonial law should be abolished, and the temple service at an end, yet God should be still as regularly, and constantly, and acceptably worshipped as ever. Heretofore Jews only went up to appear before God, and they were bound to attend only three times a year, and the males only; but now "all flesh," Gentiles as well as Jews, women as well as men, shall come and worship before God, in his presence, though not in his temple at Jerusalem, but in religious assemblies dispersed all the world over, which shall be to them as the tabernacle of meeting was to the Jews. God will in them record his name; and though but two or three come together, he will be among them, will meet them, and bless them. And they shall have the benefit of these holy convocations frequently, every new moon, and every sabbath; not as formerly, at the three annual feasts only. There is no necessity of one certain place, as the temple was of old. Christ is our temple, in whom by faith all believers meet; and now the church is so far extended, it is impossible that all should meet at one place. But it is fit there should be a certain time appointed, that the service may be done certainly, and done frequently, and a token thereby given of the spiritual communion which all Christian assemblies have with each other, by faith, hope, and holy love. The new moons and the sabbaths are mentioned, because, under the law, though the yearly feasts were to be celebrated at Jerusalem, yet the new moons and the sabbaths were religiously observed all the country over, in the schools of the prophets first, and afterwards in the synagogues, 2 Kin. iv. 23, Am. viii. 5, Acts xv. 21, according to the model of which Christian assemblies seem to be formed. Where the Lord's day is weekly sanctified, and the Lord's supper monthly celebrated, and both duly attended on, there this promise is fulfilled; there the Christian new moons and sabbaths are observed. See here, that God is to be worshipped in solemn assemblies; that it is the duty of all, as they have opportunity, to wait upon God in those assemblies; all flesh must come. Though flesh, weak, and corrupt, and sinful, let them come, that the flesh may be mortified. In worshipping God, we present ourselves before him, and are in a special manner in his presence. For doing this there ought to be stated times, and are so; and we must see that it is our interest, as well as our duty, constantly and conscientiously to observe these times.

7. That their thankful sense of God's distinguishing favour to them should be very much increased by the consideration of the fearful doom and destruction of those that persist and perish in their infidelity and impiety, ver. 24. They that have been worhipping the Lord of hosts, and rejoicing before him in the goodness of his house, to affect themselves the more with their own happiness, shall take a view of the misery of the wicked. Observe, 1st. Who they are whose misery is here described. They are men that have transgressed against God; not only broken his laws, but broken covenant with him, and thought themselves able to contend with him. It may be meant especially of the unbelieving Jews, that rejected the Gospel of Christ. 2nd. What their misery is. It is here represented by the frightful spectacle of a field of battle, covered with the carcases of the slain, that lie rotting above ground, full of worms, crawling about them, and feeding on them; and if you go to burn them, they are so scattered, and it is such a noisome piece of work to get them together, that it would be endless, and the fire would never be quenched; so that they are an "abhorring unto all flesh,"—nobody cares to come near them. Now this is sometimes accomplished in temporal judgments, and, perhaps, never nearer the letter than in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans; in which destruction it is computed that above two millions, first and last, were cut off by the sword, besides what perished by famine and pestilence. It may refer likewise to the spiritual judgments that came upon the unbelieving Jews, which St. Paul looks upon, and shews us, Rom. xi. 8, &c. They become dead in sins, twice dead; the church of the Jews was a carcase of a church; all its members were putrid carcases, their worm died not, their own consciences made them continually uneasy; and the fire of their rage against the Gospel was not quenched, which was their punishment as well their sin; and they became, more than ever any nation under the sun, an abhorring to all flesh. But our Saviour applies it to the everlasting misery and torment of impenitent sinners in the future state, where their worm dies not, and their fire is not quenched, Mar. ix. 44; for the soul, whose conscience is its constant tormentor, is immortal; and the God, whose wrath is its constant terror, is eternal. 3rd. What notice shall be taken of it. They that worship God shall go forth and look upon them, to affect their own hearts with the love of their Redeemer, when they see what misery they are redeemed from. As it will aggravate the miseries of the damned, to see others in the kingdom of heaven, and themselves thrust out, Lu. xiii. 38, so it will illustrate the joys and glories of the blessed, to see what comes of them that died in their transgression; and it will elevate their praises to think that they were themselves as brands plucked out of that burning. To the honour of that free grace which thus distinguished them, let the redeemed of the Lord with all humility, and not without a holy trembling, sing their triumphant songs.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES* TO THE BOOK OF ISAIAH.

THE natural and obvious division of Isaiah is into two parts, the first of which closes with the 39th chapter, and the latter of which comprises the remainder of the book, (xl.—lxvi.) In this division the latter portion is regarded as substantially a continuous prophecy, or an unbroken oracle or vision, relating to far distant events, and having little reference to existing things at the time when Isaiah lived, except the implied censures which are passed on the idolatry of the Jews in the time of Manasseh. The main design and scope, however, is to pourtray events to come,—the certain deliverance of the Jews from the bondage in Babylon, and the higher deliverance of the world under the Messiah, of which the former was the suggestor and the emblem. This former part (ch. i.—xxxix.)

comprises a collection of independent prophecies and writings composed at various periods during the public ministry of the prophet, and designed to produce an immediate effect on the morals, the piety, the faith, and the welfare of the nation. The general drift is, that Jerusalem and the people of God were secure; that the kingdom of God on earth could not be destroyed; that however much his people might be subjected to punishment for their sins, and however long and grievous might be their calamities, and however mighty their foes; yet that the kingdom of God could not be overturned, and all his promises set at nought. Hence in all the predictions of judgment and calamity, in all the reproofs for crime, idolatry, and sin, there is usually found a saving clause,—an assurance that the people of God should finally triumph, and be secure. And hence so large a portion of this division of the book is occupied with a prophetic statement of the entire and utter overthrow of the formidable states, nations, and cities with which they had been so often engaged in war, and which were so decidedly hostile to the Jews. The prophet, therefore, goes over in detail these cities and nations, and depicts successively the destruction of the Assyrians, of Babylon, Tyre, Moab, Damascus, Edom, &c., until he comes to the triumphant conclusion in ch. xxxv., that all the enemies of the people of God should be destroyed, and his kingdom be established on an imperishable basis under the Messiah.—Barnes' Introduction.

CHAP. I.—8. Zion, or Sion, was the name of one of the hills on which the city of Jerusalem was built. On this hill formerly stood the city of the Jebusites, and when David took it from them he transferred to it his court, and it was called the city of David, or the holy hill. It was in the southern part of the city. Daughter of Zion. The extent of the desolation is expressed by comparing the church or nation to a watch-shed in a field or vineyard, far from other habitations, and forsaken after the ingathering. "And the daughter of Zion," that is, the people of Zion or Jerusalem, considered as the capital of Judah, and therefore representing the whole nation, "is left," not forsaken, but left over or behind as a survivor, "like a booth," a temporary covert of leaves and branches, "in a vineyard, like a lodge in a melon field, like a watched city;" that is, watched by friends and foes, besieged and garrisoned, and therefore insulated, cut off from all communication with the country.—A. 18. Scarlet. This colour was a fast, or fixed colour. Neither dew, nor rain, nor washing, nor long usage, would remove it. Hence it is used to represent the fixedness and permanency of sins in the heart. No human means will wash them out. No effort of man, no external rites, no tears, nor sacrifices, nor prayers, are of themselves sufficient to take them away. They are deep-fixed in the heart, as the scarlet colour was in the web of cloth, and an almighty power is needful to remove them.

> 'Jesus, my Lord, thy blood alone
> Hath power sufficient to atone;
> Thy blood can make me white as snow,
> No Jewish types could cleanse me so.'—Watts.

The prophet means to say that, though they were thus fixed, and immovable by any human means, yet that the mercy of God can take away all the stain. 30. Garden that hath no water. In Eastern countries this image would be more striking than with us. In those hot regions, a constant supply of water is necessary for the cultivation, and even for the very existence and preservation, of a garden. Should it want water for a few days, every thing in it would be burnt up with heat, and totally destroyed. In all gardens, therefore, in those regions, there must be a constant supply of water, either from some neighbouring river or from some fountain or reservoir within it.

CHAP. II.—2. Mountain. The temple was built on mount Moriah, which was hence called the mountain of the Lord's house. The temple to a Jew was the usual place of worship. And hence, to say that that should be elevated higher than all other hills or mountains, means, that the worship of the true God should become an object so conspicuous as to be seen by all nations; and so conspicuous that all nations should forsake other objects and places of worship, being attracted by the devotion and glory of the worship of the true God. 4. Swords into ploughshares. The ploughshare is a piece of iron, broad but not large, which tips the end of the shaft. So much does it resemble the short sword used by the ancient warriors, that it may, with very little trouble, be converted into that deadly weapon, and, when the work of destruction is over, reduced again to its former shape, and applied to the purposes of agriculture. In allusion to the first operation, the prophet Joel summons the nations to leave their employments in the cultivated fields, and buckle on their armour: "Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears." This beautiful image the prophet Isaiah has reversed, and applied to the establishment of that profound and lasting peace which is to bless the church of Christ in the latter days.—Paxton. 6. Therefore. The exhortation in ver. 5 implied that the Jews were not actually walking in God's light, but were alienated from him, a fact which is now explicitly asserted and the reason of it given, namely, illicit intercourse with foreign nations, as evinced by the adoption of their superstitious practices, reliance on their martial and pecuniary aid, and last, but worst of all, the worship of their idols. In this verse, the first of these effects is ascribed to intercourse with eastern countries, which are always represented by the ancients as the cradle of the occult arts and sciences. As if he had said, I thus exhort, O Lord, thy chosen people, 'because thou hast forsaken thy people, because they are replenished from the East and (full of) soothsayers like the Philistines, and with the children of strangers they abound.' The various renderings of the Hebrew word by 'therefore,' 'verily,' 'surely,' 'but,' &c., all arise from misconception or neglect of the connexion, which requires the common meaning 'for,' 'because.'—A. 13. Cedars of Lebanon. This is a beautiful specimen of the poetic manner of writing so common among the Hebrews, where spiritual and moral subjects are represented by the grand or beautiful imagery taken from objects of nature. Mount Lebanon bounded Palestine on the north. It was formerly much celebrated for its large and lofty cedars. These cedars were said to have been from thirty-five to forty feet in girth, and very high. They were magnificent trees, and were very valuable for ceiling, statues, or roofs, that required durable and beautiful timber. A few lofty trees of this description are still remaining on mount Lebanon. 20. And to the bats. The East may be termed the country of bats; they hang by hundreds and thousands in caves, ruins, and under the roofs of large buildings. To enter such places, especially after rain, is most offensive. No wonder, then, that its name is used by the Hindoos (as by the prophet) for an epithet of contempt. When a house ceases to please the inhabitants, on account of being haunted, they say, (and also do,) give it to the bats. 'Alas, alas! my wife and children are dead; my houses, my buildings, are all given to the bats.' 'The bats are now the possessors of the once splendid mansions of royalty.'—Roberts.

CHAP. III.—16-21. Ornaments, &c. Besides ornamental rings in the nose and the ears, they (Oriental females) wore others round the legs, which made a tinkling as they went. This custom has also descended to the present times, for Rauwolf met with a number of Arabian women on the Euphrates, whose ankles and wrists were adorned with rings, sometimes a good many together, which, moving up and down as they walked, made a great noise. Chardin attests the existence of the same custom in Persia, in Arabia, and in very hot countries, where they commonly go without stockings, but ascribes the tinkling sound to little bells fastened to those rings. In the East Indies, golden bells adorned the feet and ankles of the ladies from the earliest times; they placed them in the flowing tresses of their hair; they suspended them round their necks, and to the golden rings which they wore on their fingers, to announce their superior rank, and extort the homage which they had a right to expect from the lower orders; and from the banks of the Indus it is probable the custom was introduced into the other countries of Asia.—Paxton. 26. Shall sit upon the ground. It is a remarkable coincidence that, in the medals which were made by the Romans to commemorate the captivity of Judæa and Jerusalem, Judæa is represented under the figure of a female sitting in a posture of grief under a palm-tree, with this inscription, Judæa capta,—'Judæa is taken.' The passage here, however, refers not to the captivity by the Romans, but to the first destruction by Nebuchadnezzar. It is a tender and most affecting image of desolation; and a representation which was fulfilled to an extent of sorrow and calamity which was never suffered by those who heard Isaiah.

CHAP. IV.—2. The branch of the Lord. The word 'branch' is derived from the verb tzamahh, signifying to sprout, to spring up, spoken of plants. Hence the word branch means properly that which shoots up, or sprouts from the root of a tree, or from a decayed tree: compare Job xiv. 7—9; Jer. xxxiii. 15; Zec. iii. 8; vi. 12. In all these places there can be no doubt that there is reference to him who was to be raised up as the successor of David; who was to spring up from him as a sprout does from a decayed and fallen tree; and who is therefore called a root, a branch of the royal stock. (See Supplementary Note on ch. xi. 1.) 6. From the heat. The heat in those regions was often very intense, particularly in the vast plains of sand. For a place of refuge. A place to which to flee in the midst of a storm, as a tent would be. There are few images more beautiful than this. Soon the storms of Divine vengeance will beat on the sinner. God will summon him to judgment. He will pour out his fury. But then, he who has fled to the Messiah, the Lord Jesus, as the refuge of his soul, shall be safe. He shall have nothing to fear, and in his arms shall find defence and salvation.

CHAP. V.—22. Mighty. Strong. Perhaps those who prided themselves on their ability to drink much without becoming intoxicated; who had been so accustomed to it, that they defied its effects, and boasted of their power to resist its usual influence. A similar idea is expressed in ch. lvi. 12. 23. For reward. For bribes. It is remarkable that this is introduced in immediate connection with their being mighty to mingle strong drink. One effect of intemperance is to make a man ready to be bribed.

CHAP. VI.—8. Who will go for us? Jerome's explanation of the plural, as implying a plurality of persons in the speaker, is approved by Calvin, who was doubtful with respect to the τριαγιον in ver. 3. This explanation is the only one that accounts for the difference of number in the verb and pronoun, 'whom shall I send, and who will go for us?' Jerome compares it with the words of Christ, Jno. x. 30, "I and my Father are one;" one referring to the nature, are to the plurality of persons.—A. 10. Make the heart of this people fat. Make them insensible, not by an immediate act of power, nor by any direct influence whatever, but by doing your duty, which their wickedness and God's righteous judgments will allow to have no other effect. In this sense the prophet might be said to preach them callous. In other cases, where his personal agency no longer needed to be set forth or alluded to, the verse is quoted, not as a command, but a description of the people, or as a declaration of God's agency in making them insensible. Thus in Mat. xiii. 15, and in Acts xxviii. 26, the Septuagint version is retained, in which the people's own guilt is the prominent idea, 'for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed, lest,' &c. In Jno. xii. 40, on the other hand, the sentence takes a new form, in order to bring out distinctly the idea of judicial blindness, "he hath blinded their eyes and hardened their heart," lest, &c. Both these ideas are in fact included in the meaning of the passage, though its form is different, in order to suit the occasion upon which it was originally uttered.—A. 13. And shall be eaten. This is an unhappy translation. It has arisen from the difficulty of making sense of the passage, by not taking into consideration the circumstances just adverted to. The word translated 'eaten' means to feed, to graze, to consume by grazing, to consume by fire, to consume or destroy in any way, to remove. Here it means that this remnant shall be for destruction; that judgments and punishments shall follow them after their return from Egypt, Moab, &c. Even this remnant shall be the object of Divine displeasure, and shall feel the weight of his indignation: see Jer. xliii., xliv.

No prophecy, perhaps, has been more remarkably fulfilled than that in this verse. 'Though the cities be waste and the land be desolate, it is not from the poverty of the soil that the fields are abandoned by the plough, nor from any diminution of its ancient and natural fertility, that the land has rested for so many generations. Judæa was not forced only by artificial means, or from local and temporary causes, into a luxuriant cultivation, such as a barren country might have been, concerning which it would not have needed a prophet to tell that, if once devastated and abandoned, it would ultimately revert to its original sterility. Phœnicia at all times held a far different rank among the richest countries of the world; and it was not a bleak and sterile portion of the earth, nor a land which even many ages of desolation and neglect could impoverish, that God gave in possession and by covenant to the seed of Abraham. No longer cultivated as a garden, but left like a wilderness, Judæa is indeed greatly changed from what it was; all that human ingenuity and labour did devise, erect, or cultivate, men have laid waste and desolate; all the "plenteous goods" with which it was enriched, adorned, and blessed, have fallen like seared and withered leaves when their greenness is gone; and, stripped of its "ancient splendour," it is left "as an oak whose leaf fadeth;" but its inherent sources of fertility are not dried up; the natural richness of the soil is unblighted; "the substance is in it," strong as that of the teil-tree or the solid oak, which retain their substance when they cast their leaves. And as the leafless oak waits throughout winter for the genial warmth of returning spring, to be clothed with renewed foliage, so the once glorious land of Judæa is yet full of latent vigour, or of vegetative power, strong as ever, ready to shoot forth, even "better than at the beginning," whenever the sun of heaven shall shine on it again, and "the holy seed" be prepared for being finally "the substance thereof." "The substance that is in it"—which alone has here to be proved—is, in few words, thus described by an enemy: "The land in the plains is fat and loamy, and exhibits every sign of the greatest fecundity. Were nature assisted by art, the fruits of the most distant countries might be produced within the distance of twenty leagues." "Galilee," says Malte Brun, "would be a paradise, were it inhabited by an industrious people, under an enlightened government. Vine stocks are to be seen here a foot and a half in diameter."'—Keith.

CHAP. VII.—3. Conduit of the upper pool. The mention of these now obscure localities, although it detracts nothing from the general clearness of the passage, is an incidental proof of authenticity, which no later writer would or could have forged. The upper pool, which has been placed by different writers upon almost every side of Jerusalem, is identified by Robinson and Smith with a large tank at the head of the valley of Hinnom, about seven hundred yards west-north-west from the Jaffa gate. It is full in the rainy season, and its waters are then conducted by a small rude aqueduct to the vicinity of the gate just mentioned, and so to the pool of Hezekiah within the walls. This aqueduct is probably the conduit mentioned in the text, and the end of this conduit the point where it enters the city, as appears from the fact that, when Rabshakeh afterwards conferred with the ministers of Hezekiah at this same spot, he was heard by the people on the city wall, ch. xxxvi. 2, 12. 14. Therefore the Lord himself. The king having refused to ask a sign, the prophet gives him one, by renewing the promise of deliverance, (ver. 8, 9,) and connecting it with the birth of a child, whose significant name is made a symbol of the Divine interposition, and his progress a measure of the subsequent events. Instead of saying that God would be present to deliver them, he says the child shall be called Immanuel (God with us); instead of mentioning a term of years, he says, before the child is able to distinguish good from evil; instead of saying that until that time the land shall lie waste, he represents the child as eating curds and honey, spontaneous products, here put in opposition to the fruits of cultivation. At the same time, the form of expression is descriptive. Instead of saying simply that the child shall experience all this, he represents its birth and infancy as actually passing in his sight; he sees the child brought forth and named Immanuel; he sees the child eating curds and honey till a certain age. 'Therefore,' because you have refused to choose, 'the Lord himself will give you a sign. Behold! the virgin pregnant and bringing forth a son, and she calls his name Immanuel,' God with us, 'curds and honey shall he eat,' because the land lies waste, 'until he shall know (how) to reject the evil and to choose the good,' but no longer; 'for before the child shall know (how) to reject the evil and to choose the good, the land, of whose two kings thou art afraid,' that is, Syria and Israel, 'shall be forsaken,' that is, desolate, which of course implies the previous deliverance of Judah. All interpreters appear to be agreed that these three verses contain a threatening of destruction to the enemies of Judah, if not a direct promise of deliverance, and that this event is connected in some way with the birth of a child, as the sign or pledge of its certain occurrence. ——Either the prophet, while he foretells the birth of Christ, foretells that of another child, during whose infancy the promised deliverance shall be experienced; or else he makes the infancy of Christ himself, whether foreseen as still remote or not, the sign and measure of that same deliverance. While some diversity of judgment ought to be expected and allowed, in relation to this secondary question, there is no ground, grammatical, historical, or logical, for doubt as to the main point, that the church in all ages has been right in regarding this passage as a signal and explicit prediction of the miraculous conception and nativity of Jesus Christ. 17. The Lord will bring upon thee—days that have not come—even the king of Assyria. Let it be observed that the days here threatened were to be worse, not simply with respect to individual suffering or temporary difficulties of the state itself, but to the loss of its independence, its transition to a servile state, from which it was never permanently freed, the domination of Assyria being soon succeeded by that of Egypt, and this by that of Babylon, Persia, Syria, and Rome, the last ending only in the downfal of the state, and that general dispersion of the people which continues to this day.——It is implied, of course, in this interpretation, that Sennacherib's invasion was not the beginning of the days here threatened, which is rather to be sought in the alliance between Ahaz and Tiglath-pileser, "who came unto him, and distressed him, and strengthened him not,"(2 Chr. xxviii. 19, 20,) but exacted repeated contributions from him as a vassal; which degrading and oppressive intercourse continued till his death, as appears from the statement, 2 Kin. xviii. 7, that "Hezekiah rebelled against the king of Assyria, and served him not," clearly implying that he did at first, as he offered to do afterwards, on Sennacherib's approach, with confession of his fault, a renewal of his tribute, and a repetition of his father's sacrilege, 2 Kin. xviii. 13—16. That during the whole term of this foreign ascendancy, Judah was infested by Assyrian intruders, and by frequent visitations for the purpose of extorting their unwilling tribute, till at last the revolt of Hezekiah, no longer able to endure the burthen, led to a formal occupation of the country, is not only probable in itself, but seems to be implied in the subsequent context, ver. 18—20.—A. See wood engraving taken from one of the sculptures recently found on a mound at Nimroud, on the left bank of the Tigris, and now in the British Museum. Without affirming that it represents one or other of the events referred to in this note, the engraving may serve to illustrate them. The relievo whence the above is taken is a representation of 'the league or treaty of peace.' A king is supposed to have arrived at the frontier of his dominions. He has descended from his chariot to meet another king. The conqueror still retains the implements of war, and holds in his right hand two arrows perpendicularly, apparently a mystical sign of friendship. His adversary at the same time holds up his right hand, supposed by some to signify supplication; but may it not be expressive of swearing fealty as a tributary king? There is a common prisoner bowing in the dust, and thought to be kissing the feet of the clement conqueror. Immediately behind the great king are two eunuchs, each holding bows and quivers of arrows. 25. And on all hills. Not only the fields, not only the vineyards, shall be overrun with thorns and briers, but the very hills, now laboriously cultivated with the hand, shall be given up to like desolation. 'And all the hills;' that is, even all the hills 'which are digged with the hoe,' because inaccessible to the plough; 'thou shalt not go' even 'there, for fear of briers and thorns, and' being thus uncultivated, 'they shall be for a sending-place of cattle and a trampling-place of sheep;' that is, a place where cattle may be sent to pasture, and which may be trodden down by sheep. The reference is probably to the hills of Judæa, anciently cultivated to the very top, by means of terraces that still exist, for an account of which by eyewitnesses see Keith's Land of Israel, ch. xii., and Robinson's Palestine, vol. ii. p. 187. Thus understood, the verse merely strengthens the foregoing description, by declaring that even the most carefully cultivated portions of the land should not escape the threatened desolation. It is equally gratuitous, and therefore inadmissible, to take thorns and briers in a different sense from that which they have in the preceding verses, for example, in that of a thorn hedge, implying that the vineyard should no longer be enclosed, (Grotius, Cocceius, Vitringa,) an arbitrary change which cannot be justified by Matthew Henry's epigrammatic observation, that the thorns, instead of growing where they would be useful, should spring up in abundance where they were not wanted.—A.

CHAP. VIII.—7. The waters of the river; that is, the Euphrates, as an emblem of Assyrian power. As the king of Assyria, and all his glory; having particular reference to military strength and display. See wood engraving, in loc. 14. For a sanctuary, (a holy thing, an object to be sanctified.) The quotations, Lu. i. 35; 1 Pet. ii. 7; Rom. ix. 33, seem to shew that the prophet's words have an extensive import, and are not to be restricted either to his own times or the time of Christ. The doctrine of the text is, that even the most glorious exhibitions of God's holiness; that is, of his infinite perfection, may occasion the destruction of the unbeliever. The most signal illustration of this general truth was that afforded in the advent of the Saviour. It was frequently exemplified, however, in the interval, and one of these exemplifications was afforded by the conduct of the unbelieving Jews in the reign of Ahaz, to whom the only power that could save them was converted by their own unbelief into a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. The same idea is then expressed by another simple and familiar figure, that of a snare or trap. Both figures naturally suggest the idea of inadvertence and unforeseen ruin.—A.

CHAP. IX. The division of the chapters is in this part of the book peculiarly unfortunate; the first part of the ninth (ver. 1—6) containing the conclusion of the eighth, and the first part of the tenth (ver. 1—4) the conclusion of the ninth. 6. A child is born. Emphatically 'born for us' and 'given to us,' as the 'Son' of God and the 'Son' of man, as being 'wonderful' in his person, works, and sufferings,—a 'counsellor,' prophet, or authoritative teacher of the truth, a wise administrator of the church, and confidential adviser of the individual believer, —a real man, and yet the 'mighty God,—eternal' in his own existence, and the 'giver of eternal life' to others,—the great peace-maker between God and man, between Jew and Gentile, the umpire between nations, the abolisher of war, and the giver of internal peace to all who "being justified by faith have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," Rom. v. 1.—A. The ancient Jews incontestably referred it to the Messiah. Thus the Targum of Jonathan renders it, 'His name shall be called God of wonderful counsel, man abiding for ever, the Messiah, whose peace shall be multiplied upon us in his days.' The older interpreters unanimously suppose that this refers to the Messiah; and this view was entertained by the Jews in ancient times. Thus Rabbi Jose, of Galilee, says, 'The name of the Messiah is Shalom,' as it is said in Isa. ix. 6, "Father of eternity, Prince of peace." Ben Sira (fol. 40, of the Amsterdam edition, 1679,) numbers among the eight names of the Messiah those also taken from this passage, Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Prince of Peace. The latter Jews, however, have rejected this interpretation, because the Messiah is here described as God, contrary to their system of doctrines. 7. Throne of David. The endless increase of power and prosperity on the throne of David means of course that the Prince whose reign was to be thus powerful and prosperous, would be a descendant of David. This is indeed a repetition and explanation of a promise given to David, 2 Sam. vii. 11—16; 1 Kin. viii. 25, and repeatedly referred to by him, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—5; Ps. ii., xlv., lxxii., lxxxix., cxxxii. Hence the Messiah is not only called the Branch or Son of David, 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15, but David himself, Jer. xxx. 9; Eze. xxxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 24; Hos. iii. 5. The two reigns are identified, not merely on account of an external resemblance or a typical relation, but because the one was really a restoration or continuation of the other. Both kings were heads of the same body, the one a temporal head, the other spiritual; the one temporary, the other eternal. The Jewish nation, as a spiritual body, is really continued in the Christian church. The subject of the prophecy is the reign of the Messiah; the effect predicted, its stability and increase; the means to be employed, judgment and justice; the efficient cause, the zeal of Jehovah.—A. The zeal. The word here used denotes ardour, intense desire in accomplishing an object, and means here that the establishment of this kingdom was an object of intense and ardent desire on the part of Jehovah, and that he would accomplish it. It is also implied that nothing else than that zeal of Jehovah could do it. We may remark here, 1. That if Jehovah feels so intense a desire for this, then the subjects of the Messiah's reign should also feel this. 2. If Jehovah feels this zeal, and if he will certainly accomplish this, then Christians should be encouraged in their efforts to spread the Gospel. His purpose to do this is their only encouragement,—and a sufficient encouragement,—to excite their zeal in this great and glorious work.

CHAP. X.—28. He is come to Aiath. The places here enumerated seem to have belonged chiefly or wholly to the tribes of Benjamin and Judah. Some of them are still in existence, and the site of several has been recently determined by the personal observations and inquiries of Robinson and Smith. The catalogue begins at the frontier of the kingdom of Judah, and, as J. D. Michaelis suggests, at the first place conquered by the Israelites on taking possession of the land. The language is precisely that of an eyewitness describing at the moment what he actually sees. 'He is come to Aiath—he is passed to Migron —to Michmash he intrusts his baggage.' For the best illustration of the geographical details in verses 28, 32, see Robinson's Palestine, vol. ii., pp. 104, 151. —A. 33. Shall lop the bough. In ver. 18, 19, the prophet had described the army of the Assyrians as a magnificent forest. Here he says that the glory of that army should be destroyed, as the vitality and beauty of the waving bough of a tree is quickly destroyed when it is lopped with an axe. There can scarcely be conceived a description that would more beautifully represent the fading of the strength of the army of the Assyrian than this. With terror. With tremendous violence.

CHAP. XI.—1. Come forth a rod. A twig or shoot. Between the Assyrian and the person who is the subject of this chapter there is a most striking and beautiful contrast. The one was at first magnificent like a vast spreading forest, yet should soon fall and decay; the other was the little sprout of a decayed tree, which should yet rise, expand, and flourish. Of Jesse. The father of David. It means, that he who is here spoken of should be of the family of Jesse or David. Though Jesse had died, and though the ancient family of David should fall into decay, yet there should arise from that family a descendant. The beauty of this description is apparent if we bear in recollection that, when the Messiah was born, the ancient and much honoured family of David had fallen into decay; that the mother of Jesus, though appertaining to that family, was poor, obscure, and unknown; and that, to all appearance, the glory of the family had departed. Yet from that, as from a long decayed root in the ground, he should spring who would restore the family to more than its ancient glory, and shed additional lustre on the honoured name of Jesse. 6. The wolf also. Calvin and Hengstenberg suppose the passage to include a promise of a future change in the material creation, restoring it to its original condition, (Rom. viii. 19—22,) while they agree with other writers in regarding the pacific effects of true religion as the primary subject of the prophecy. 7. The lion. The lion's eating straw denotes a total change of habit, and indeed of nature, and is therefore a fit emblem for the revolution which the Gospel, in proportion to its influence, effects in the condition of society, with some allusion, possibly, as before suggested, to the ultimate deliverance of the κτίσις or irrational creation from that bondage of corruption, to which, for man's sake, it is now subjected.—A. 8. And the sucking child. An emblem here of harmlessness and innocence. The change in the world under the Messiah shall be as great as if a sucking infant should be able to play unharmed with a venomous serpent.

> 'The lambs with wolves shall graze the verdant mead,
> And boys in flowery bands the tigers lead,
> The steer and lion at one crib shall meet,
> And harmless serpents lick the pilgrim's feet.
> The smiling infant in his hand shall take
> The crested basilisk and speckled snake;
> Pleased, the green lustre of the scales survey,
> And with the forked tongue shall innocently play.'

> Pope's Messiah.

9. As the waters cover the sea. 'They,' indefinitely, men in general, 'shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, because the land is full of the knowledge of Jehovah,' literally, of knowing him, 'like the waters covering the sea.' The strict sense of the words is, 'covering with respect to the sea.' The point of comparison is not the mere extent of surface (Vatablus) nor the depth (Vitringa), but the fulness of the land to the extent of its capacity. This passage is descriptive of the reign of the Messiah, not at any one period, but as a whole. A historian, as Vitringa well observes, in giving a general description of the reign of David, would not use language applicable only to its beginning. The prophecy is therefore one of gradual fulfilment. So far as the cause operates, the effect follows, and when the cause shall operate without restraint the effect will be complete and universal. The use of the future in the first clause, and the preterite in the second, may imply, that the prevalence of the knowledge of Jehovah must precede that of universal peace. It is not till the land 'has been filled' with that knowledge, that men 'will cease' to injure and destroy.—A. 11. Remnant of his people. Deu. xxviii. 62, 64; Jer. xxiv. 9, 10; xv. 7; xlvi. 27, 28; Eze. v. 10; xii. 15; Am. ix. 9. From all these, and from numerous other passages in the Old Testament, it is evident that it was designed that the Jewish nation should never be wholly destroyed; that they should be scattered among the nations, but should still be a distinct people; that while other nations should be utterly wasted and ruined, and should wholly cease to exist, yet that a remnant of the Jewish people, with the national peculiarities and customs, should still survive. How entirely this has been fulfilled, the remarkable history of the Jewish people everywhere testifies. Their present condition on the earth as a people scattered in all nations, yet surviving, without a king and a temple, yet preserving their national prejudices and peculiarities, is a most striking fulfilment of the prophecy. See Bishop Newton on the Prophecies, and Keith's Evidence of the Fulfilment of Prophecy, pp. 64—82. Recover the remnant. A prophecy of the recovery of the Israelites. Pathros. One of the three ancient divisions of Egypt. Cush. Cush, among the Hebrews, usually denoted the southern parts of Arabia. Elam. The southern part of Persia. Shinar. A part of Babylonia. Hamath. A celebrated city of Syria. The Assyrians became masters of this city about 753 years B.C., 2 Ki. xvii. 24. Islands of the sea. These meant, among the Hebrews, distant regions of the sea, whether coasts or islands. 12. An ensign. The Messiah, ver. 10. 13. Ephraim shall not envy Judah, &c. There shall be no strife like tike that subsisting between Israel and Judah. 14. But they shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines; that is, invade their borders. The conversion of all the enemies of God should speedily follow that of the Jews, and thus they should be conquered to the Messiah. 15. Shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea, &c. It should be dried up, to present no obstruction. The idea is, that God would remove the obstruction to the rapid and complete deliverance and conversion of men. 16. There shall be an highway, &c. The same idea is conveyed; all obstructions shall be removed, just as formerly at the Red sea. It is obvious from such prophecies that God yet intends to make great use of the Jews in spreading Messiah's kingdom.—Cobbin's Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XIII.—1. The burden, a threatening prophecy, of Babylon. Babylon (derived from Babel, and probably built on the same spot as the tower of Babel,) was the capital of Babylonia, or Chaldea, and was probably built by Nimrod; but it was a long period before it obtained its subsequent size and splendour. It stood in the midst of a large plain, and on a very deep and fertile soil. It was on both sides of the river Euphrates, and of course was divided by that river into two parts. The two parts were connected by a bridge sixty feet in width near the centre of the city; and there is also said to have been a tunnel or subterranean passage, made from the palace on the east of the river to the palace on the west under the river. The old city was on the east, and the new city, built by Nebuchadnezzar, was on the west. According to the lowest estimates, it could not have been less than twelve miles square, or forty-eight miles in circumference; and was at least eight times as large in extent as London and its appendages. The walls of Babylon are said by Herodotus to have been eighty-seven feet thick, and three hundred and fifty high. There were a hundred gates of solid brass, between every two of which were three towers, raised ten feet above the wall. The whole city was surrounded by an immense ditch. See Edin. Ency.; Calmet; Bishop Newton, and Keith on the Prophecies. It is to be borne in mind, however, in order to a just view of this prophecy, that Babylon did not attain its highest splendour and magnificence until after the time of Isaiah. It was under Nebuchadnezzar, who ascended the throne of Babylon about one hundred years after Isaiah died, that it rose to its highest degree of splendour and power. Babylon was the natural seat of empire in the East, and was early distinguished for its commercial advantages. A simple glance at the map of Asia will convince any one that somewhere in the vicinity of Babylon is the natural seat of power in the East, and that few places on the globe are more eligibly situated for a vast trade, as it was conducted before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope. Thus by the fertility of the soil, by its size and strength, by its strong and lofty walls, by its commercial advantages, and by every thing that could contribute to the defence of an ancient city, Babylon seemed to be safe; and if there was any ancient city that appeared to bid defiance to the attacks of enemies, or to the ravages of time, it was Babylon. Yet Isaiah said that it should be destroyed; and in the course of our exposition we shall be greatly struck, not only with the certain fulfilment of the prediction, but with the wonderful accuracy and minuteness of the entire prophetic statement. 4. The noise. By a beautiful poetic image, the prophet represents himself as immediately, on the issuing of this command, listening to the tumult and noise caused by those who were assembling for war; by the gathering together of nations; by their assembling from a far country to destroy the whole land. 17. I will stir up the Medes against them. At the time when this prophecy was uttered, Media was a dependent province of the kingdom of Assyria. Six years they passed in a sort of anarchy, until, about seven hundred years before Christ, they found in Dejoces an upright statesman, who was proclaimed king by universal consent. His son and successor, Phraortes, subdued the Persians and all upper Asia, and united them to his kingdom. He also attacked Assyria, and laid siege to Nineveh, the capital, but was defeated. Nineveh was finally taken by his successor, Cyaxares, with the aid of his ally, the king of Babylon; and Assyria became a province of Media. This widely extended empire was delivered by him to his son Astyages, the father of Cyrus. Astyages reigned about thirty-five years, and then delivered the vast kingdom to Cyrus, about five hundred and fifty-six years before Christ, under whom the prediction of Isaiah respecting Babylon was fulfilled. 19. As when God overthrew Sodom. It does not mean that it shall be overthrown in the same manner as Sodom was, but that it should be as completely and entirely ruined. 20. It shall never be inhabited. This has been completely fulfilled; for centuries it has remained a scene of wide desolation, and a heap of ruins. Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there. The wandering tribes of Arabs should even shun it as a resting-place for a single night. Neither shall the shepherds, &c. This was a fertile spot, and, though in a desolate state, might yet have furnished pasturage; but the whole region, after Babylon was taken, was laid under water by the Euphrates, and became a stagnant pool. It is said that the Arabs cannot be persuaded to stay there a night. 21. But wild beasts. Dens of these are in various parts, and travellers have seen lions, hyenas, and jackals about the ruins; bats, owls, porcupines, &c., are also found there. Satyrs. Some uncommon creatures of the goat kind.—Domestic Bible. For striking proofs of the fulfilment of the various parts of this prediction, see Keith on the Prophecies. On this whole prophecy, we may observe, 1. That it was uttered at least a hundred and seventy years before it was fulfilled. 2. When uttered, there was the strongest improbability that it would be fulfilled. This improbability arose from the following circumstances: (a) The Jews were safe and secure in their own land, and they had no alliance with Babylon, nor any reason to dread the Babylonians. (b) The great strength and security of Babylon rendered it improbable. (c) It was improbable that it would be overthrown by the Medes. Media was, at the time when the prophecy was uttered, a dependent province of Assyria, (Note, ver. 17;) and it was wholly improbable that the Medes would revolt; that they would capture Nineveh; that they would subdue their masters; that they would be united to the Persians, and that thus a new kingdom would arise, that should overthrow the most mighty capital of the world. (d) It was improbable that Babylon would become uninhabitable. How could mere human sagacity have foreseen that there would not be a house in it in the sixteenth century; or that now (in 1839) it would be a wide and dreary waste? Can human foresight tell distinctly what will take place two thousand three hundred years beforehand? Can any man now tell what London, or Paris, or New York, or Philadelphia will be two thousand years hence? Yet a prediction that those cities shall be the residence of 'wild beasts of the desert,' of 'satyrs,' and 'dragons,' and that they should never be inhabited, would be as probable now as was the prediction respecting Babylon at the time when Isaiah uttered these remarkable prophecies. 3. The prophecy is not vague conjecture. It is not a general statement. It is not the result of political sagacity. It is a minute, and definite, and particular statement; and those statements have been as definitely, and minutely, and particularly, fulfilled. 4. This is one of the evidences of the Divine origin of the Bible. How will the infidel account for this prophecy and its fulfilment? It will not do to say that it is accident. It is too minute, and too particular. It is not human sagacity. No human sagacity could have foretold it. It is not fancied fulfilment. It is real, in the most minute particulars. And, if so, then Isaiah was commissioned by Jehovah, as he claimed to be,—for none but the omniscient Jehovah can foresee and describe future events as the destruction of Babylon was foreseen and described. And, if this prophecy was inspired by God, by the same train of reasoning it can be proved that the whole Bible is a revelation from heaven.

CHAP. XIV. This chapter is a continuation of the prophecy respecting Babylon which was commenced in the previous chapter. The prophecy is concluded at ver. 27 of this chapter. A considerable portion of this chapter is a poem of unequalled beauty and sublimity. 'I believe it may be affirmed,' says Lowth, 'that there is no poem of its kind extant in any language in which the subject is so well laid out, and so happily conducted, with such a richness of invention, with such a variety of images, persons, and distinct actions, with such rapidity and ease of transition in so small a compass, as in this ode of Isaiah. For beauty of disposition, strength of colouring, greatness of sentiment, brevity, perspicuity and force of expression, it stands among all the monuments of antiquity unrivalled.'

CHAP. XVI. This chapter is a continuance of the former, and the scope of it is to give advice to the Moabites, and to threaten them with punishment in case, as the prophet foresaw, they should neglect or refuse to follow it. 1. Sela. The word Sela means a rock; and by it here there can be no doubt that there is intended the city of that name which was the capital of Arabia Petrea. The city was situated within the bounds of Arabia, or Idumæa, but was probably at this time in the possession of the Moabites. It was, therefore, the remotest part of their territory, and the sense may be, 'Send tribute even from the remotest part of your land.' See Supplementary Note, 2 Kin. xiv. 14. And the remnant. What is left in the land. There shall be few cities, few men, and very little wealth that shall escape the desolation. On the present state of Moab, and the complete fulfilment of the prophecies respecting it, the following works may be consulted:—Newton on the Prophecies, Keith on the Prophecies, Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, Captains Irby and Mangles' Travels, and Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible. In regard to the fulfilment of these predictions respecting the destruction of Moab, it may be sufficient to remark, that all travellers concur in the general desolation of that country which was once so thickly studded with towns, and that abounded so richly in flocks, and produced so luxuriantly the grape. It is now a country strewed with ruins. All the cities of Moab have disappeared. Their place is characterised, in the map of Volney's Travels, by the ruins of towns. Burckhardt, who encountered many difficulties in so desolate and dangerous a land, thus records the brief history of a few of them: 'The ruins of Eleale, Hesebon, Meon, Medaba, Dibon, Arver, all situated on the north side of the Arnon, still subsist to illustrate the history of the Beni Israel.'—Life and Travels, prefixed to the Travels in Nubia, pp. 48, 49. 'And it might be added,' says Keith, 'that they still subsist to confirm the inspiration of the Jewish Scriptures, for the desolation of each of these cities was the theme of a distinct prediction.'—Prophecies, p. 129. Within the boundaries of Moab, Burckhardt enumerates about fifty ruined cities, many of them extensive. In general they are a broken down and undistinguishable mass of ruins. But, in some instances, there are remains of temples, sepulchral monuments, traces of hanging gardens, entire columns lying on the ground, and dilapidated walls made of stones of large dimensions.—See Travels in Syria, pp. 311—456, and illustrative heading of the Book. In view of the 15th and 16th chapters, constituting one prophecy, and the facts in regard to the present state of the country of Moab, we may observe that we have here an evidence of the genuineness and truth of the sacred records. That evidence is found in the particularity with which places are mentioned; and in the fact that impostors would not specify times or places any farther than was unavoidable. Mistakes, we all know, are liable to be made by those who attempt to describe the geography of places which they have not seen. Yet here is a description of a land and its numerous towns, made nearly three thousand years ago, and in its particulars it is sustained by all the travellers in modern times. In the language of Prof. Stuart (Bib. Repos., vol. vii., pp. 108, 109,) we may say, 'How happens it, now, that the authors of the Old Testament Scriptures should have possessed such a wonderful tact in geography, as it would seem they did, unless they lived at the time and in the countries of which they have spoken? This happens not elsewhere. It is but yesterday since one of the first scientific writers on geology in Great Britain published to the world the declaration that our Mississippi and Missouri rivers belong to the tropics. Respectable writers, even in Germany, the land of classical attainments, have sometimes placed Cœle-Syria on the east of the Anti-Libanus ridge, or even seemed to transfer Damascus over the mountains, and place it between the two Lebanon ridges in the valley.' No such mistakes occur in the sacred writers. They write as men who were familiar with the geography of places named, they mention places with the utmost familiarity; and, after a lapse of almost three thousand years, every successive traveller who visits Moab, Idumæa, or Palestine, does something to confirm the accuracy of Isaiah. Towns, bearing the same name, or the ruins of towns, are located in the same relative position in which he said they were; and the ruins of once splendid cities, broken columns, dilapidated walls, trodden down vineyards, half-demolished temples, and fragments broken and consumed by time, proclaim to the world that those cites are what he said they would be, and that he was under the inspiration of God.

CHAP. XVIII. The two great powers of Western Asia, in the days of Isaiah, were Assyria and Egypt or Ethiopia, the last two being wholly or partially united under Tirhakah, whose name and exploits are recorded in Egyptian monuments still extant, (see Supplementary Note, 2 Chr. xxxvi.,) and who is expressly said in Scripture (2 Kin. xix. 9) to have come out against Sennacherib. With one or other of these great contending powers Judah was commonly confederate, and of course at war with the other. Hezekiah is explicitly reproached by Rabshakeh (ch. xxxvi. 9) with relying upon Egypt, that is, the Ethiopico-Egyptian empire. These historical facts, together with the mention of Cush in ver. 1, and the appropriateness of the figures in ver. 4, 5, to the destruction of Sennacherib's army, give great probability to the hypothesis now commonly adopted, that the prophet here announces that event to Ethiopia, as about to be effected by a direct interposition of Jehovah, and without human aid. At the same time, some of the expressions here employed admit of so many interpretations, that it is best to give the whole as wide an application as the language will admit, on the ground before suggested, that it constitutes a part of a generic prophecy or picture of God's dealings with the foes of his people, including illustrations drawn from particular events, such as the downfal of Syria and Israel, and the slaughter of Sennacherib's army.—A. 1. Woe. Rather signifies, 'Ho!' it does not mean a threatening, but a call. Land shadowing with wings. This is supposed by some to denote the protection which the people's god extended over the land. (See wood engraving.) Some have made the prophecy relate to Egypt and Israel; but Dr. Henderson adopts the opinion maintained by several modern critics, that Ethiopia is intended. He says, 'To no country could the words at the time more aptly apply than to Ethiopia. Its armies were exceedingly numerous. If, as there is reason to believe, Zerah, mentioned 2 Chr. xiv. 9, was king of the African Ethiopians, that people was able to bring into the field, in the reign of Asa, not fewer than a million of men, "a huge host with very many chariots and horsemen," ch. xvi. 8; and Tirhakah was so celebrated as a mighty conqueror, that Megasthenes mentions his having advanced as far as the pillars of Hercules, and classes him along with Sesostris and Nebuchadnezzar.' Beyond the rivers of Ethiopia. 'Cush,' now known by the name of Abyssinia. It was at times subject to the Pharaohs; at other times, Upper Egypt was subject to its monarchs: the latter was the case when Isaiah wrote. 2. That sendeth ambassadors by the sea. From their bordering upon the Red sea, the Ethiopians must have carried on a maritime intercourse with the opposite coast of Arabia, and eastwards in the direction of India, if they did not trade with that country itself, in vessels of bulrushes, 'of papyrus,' that is, the Egyptian reed. Of this material the vessel was constructed to which Moses was committed, Ex. ii. 2. Go, ye swift messengers. The vast power and extensive influence of Tirhakah would require an incessant transmission of despatches to foreign parts, the facilities of which by water were great. There is here evidently a reference to the swiftness with which they proceeded on their embassies in the papyrus boats. To a nation. The prophet calls upon the messengers to go with all celerity to Ethiopia, to announce the wonderful interposition of Jehovah for the deliverance of the Jews. Information would first of all be conveyed to Tirhakah and his army in Egypt, and then to the Thebaid and Ethiopia; so that the whole nation would become acquainted with the way in which their formidable enemy, Sennacherib, had been overthrown. Scattered and peeled. Henderson reads, 'drawn out and plucked,' which he considers as expressing the state of the Ethiopian nation during the extensive wars of Tirhakah, when the mass of the people were 'drawn out,' or taken away from their occupations and homes.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XIX. This chapter admits of a well defined division into two parts, one of which contains threatenings, ver. 1—17, and the other promises, ver. 18—25. The first part may again be subdivided. In ver. 1—4, the Egyptians are threatened with a penal visitation from Jehovah, with the downfal of their idols, with intestine commotions, with the disappointment of their superstitious hopes. and with subjection to hard masters. In ver. 5—10, they are threatened with physical calamities, the drying up of their streams, the decay of vegetation, the loss of their fisheries, and the destruction of their manufactures. In ver. 11—17, the wisdom of their wise men is converted into folly, the courage of their brave men into cowardice, industry universally suspended, and the people filled with dread of the anger of Jehovah. The second part may be also subdivided. In ver. 18—21, the Egyptians are described as acknowledging the true God, in consequence of what they had suffered at his hand, and the deliverance which he had granted them. In ver. 22—25, the same cause is described as leading to an intimate union between Egypt, Assyria, and Israel, in the service of Jehovah, and the enjoyment of his favour. 25. Whom the Lord of hosts shall bless. 'Which Jehovah of hosts has blessed,' or 'with which Jehovah of hosts has blessed it,' saying, 'Blessed be my people Egypt, and the work of my hands Assyria, and my heritage' or peculiar people 'Israel.' The perfect union of the three great powers in the service of God, and the enjoyment of his favour, is now expressed by a solemn benediction on the three, in which language commonly applied to Israel exclusively is extended to Egypt and Assyria. The force of the expressions would be much enhanced by the habitual associations of a Jewish reader. It arises very much from the surprise excited by the unexpected termination of the clauses. Instead of 'Blessed be my people Israel,' the formula is 'blessed be my people Egypt.' That 'the work of my hands' does not mean merely 'my creature,' or a creature perfectly at my disposal, but my creature in a special and a spiritual sense, the same in which God is said to be the maker or founder of Israel, (Deu. xxxii. 6; ch. xliii. 6, 7,) is evident from this consideration, that the clause would otherwise say nothing peculiar or distinctive of Assyria, as those before and after it do of Egypt and Israel. As to the application of the prophecy there are three distinct opinions. One is that the prophet here anticipates a state of peace and international communion between Egypt, Israel, and Assyria in his own times, which may or may not have been actually realised. Another is that he predicts what actually did take place under the reign of Alexander and the two great powers that succeeded him, namely, the Græco-Syrian and Egyptian monarchies, by which the true religion was protected and diffused, and the way prepared for the preaching of the Gospel. A third is that Egypt and Assyria are here named as the two great heathen powers known to the Jews, whose country lay between them, and was often the scene if not the subject of their contests, so that for ages they were commonly in league with the one against the other. To describe these two great belligerent powers as at peace with Israel and one another, was not only to foretell a most surprising revolution in the state of the world, but to intimate at least a future change in the relation of the Jews and Gentiles. When he goes still further, and describes these representatives of heathenism as received into the covenant and sharing with the church of God its most distinctive titles, we have one of the clearest and most striking predictions of the calling of the Gentiles that the word of God contains. One advantage of this exposition is, that while it thus extends and elevates the scope of the prediction, it retains unaltered whatever there may be of more specific prophecy or of coincidence with history. If Alexander is referred to, and the spread of Judaism under him and his successors, and the general pacification of the world and progress of refinement, these are so many masterly strokes added to the great prophetic picture; but they cannot be extracted from it and made to constitute a picture by themselves.—A.

CHAP. XXI.—11. Dumah. It is evident from the prophecy itself, that Idumæa is particularly referred to, for the prophet immediately adds, that the voice came to him from mount 'Seir,' which was the principal mountain of Idumæa. Idumæa, or the country of Edom, is frequently referred to by the prophets: see Jer. xlix. 7—10, 12—18; Eze. xxxv. 1—4, 7, 9, 14, 15; Joel iii. 19; Am. i. 11; Oba. ver. 1—18; Mal. i. 3, 4. For a description of Idumæa, and of the prophecies respecting it, see Supplementary Notes on ch. xxxiv.

CHAP. XXII.—16. Sepulchre on high. The labour and expense bestowed on ancient sepulchres (of far later date however than Isaiah's time) is still attested by the tombs remaining at Jerusalem, Petrea, and Persepolis, where some are excavated near the tops of lofty rocks in order to be less accessible, to which practice there may be allusion in the verse before us, as well as in the words of 2 Chr. xxxii. 33, as explained by most interpreters, namely, that Hezekiah was buried in the highest of the tombs of the sons of David.—See Robinson's Palestine, i., 516—539; ii. 525, and wood engraving in loc.

CHAP. XXIII. Tyre. Tyre, the subject of the prophecies, particularly of Isaiah and Ezekiel, who both predicted its overthrow, (ch. xxiii., Eze. xxvi. —xxix.,) was a celebrated city of Phœnicia, and is usually mentioned in connexion with Sidon: Mat. xi. 21, 22; Lu. x. 13, 14; Mat. xv. 21; Mar. iii. 8; vii. 24, 31. Tyre was distinguished for its enterprise, its commercial importance, its luxury, and its magnificence. Few, perhaps none, of the cities of antiquity were more favourably situated for commerce. It was also a place of great strength. Old Tyre was defended by a wall which was regarded as impregnable. Nebuchadnezzar took the city after a siege of thirteen years, during the time of the Jewish captivity, about five hundred and seventy-three years before Christ. This was in accordance with the prophecy in this chapter, (ver. 13,) and according to the predictions also in Ezekiel. The desolation was entire. The city was destroyed, and the inhabitants driven into foreign lands, (ver. 7, 12.) The city lay desolate for seventy years, (ver. 15, 17,) and Old Tyre was in ruins in the time of the invasion of Alexander the Great. A new city had risen, however, on the island, called New Tyre, and this city was taken by Alexander after a siege of eight months, and after he had made a causeway from Old Tyre to the new city out of the ruins of the former. Near the shore the water is said to have been shallow, but near the new city it was three fathoms or nineteen feet in depth. The city of Tyre was taken by Alexander three hundred and thirty-two years before Christ, and two hundred and forty-one years after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, and consequently about one hundred and seventy years after it had been rebuilt. It was not, however, entirely destroyed by Alexander. It became an object of contention to the successors of Alexander. It was successively invested by Antigonus and Ptolemy, and fell into the hands of the latter. In the apostolic age, it seems to have regained somewhat of its ancient splendour. There were some Christians here, Acts xxi. 3, 4. In the time when it was visited by Volney and Maundrell, it was a miserable village, where the inhabitants subsisted chiefly by fishing, and the rock of Tyre was a place on which they spread their nets. Its exports consist only of a few sacks of corn and cotton, and the only merchant of which it could boast in the time when Volney was there, was a solitary Greek, who could hardly gain a livelihood. See Calmet; Edin. Ency.; Newton on the Prophecies; Keith on the Prophecies; and the Travels of Volney and Maundrell.

CHAP. XXIV.—20. Like a cottage. Or, rather, shall move or vacillate like a cottage. The word cottage means, properly, a temporary shed or lodge for the watchman of a garden or vineyard, while the fruit was ripening. 21. That day, &c. The sense may simply be, that God will judge the high or lofty host, namely, the kings of the land upon the land. But even if there be an antithesis, and even if the host of heaven in the usual sense of the expression be alluded to, the analogy of this whole context would seem to indicate that this is merely a strong figure for different ranks or degrees of dignity on earth. 22. And they. The persons meant are of course the principalities and powers of the verse preceding. 23. The moon shall be confounded. The simple meaning of the verse appears to be that Jehovah's reign over his people shall be more august than that of any created sovereign. This is true of the church in various periods of history, but more especially in those when the presence and power of God are peculiarly manifested.—A. It may be added, that when Jehovah, by the Messiah, shall reign over all the earth, all the glory of the wisest and greatest princes and monarchs shall be dimmed; the celebrity of their wisdom, and power, and plans shall be obscured in the superior splendour of the wisdom, power, and plans of God, in reigning through the laws of his Son over the human race. Come that blessed day; and speedily let the glory of the moon be confounded, and the sun be ashamed, and all inferior magnificence fade away before the splendour of the Sun of Righteousness!

CHAP. XXV.—8. Will wipe away tears from off all faces. This is quoted in Rev. xxi. 4, as applicable to the power of the Gospel. The sense is, that Jehovah would devise a plan that would be fitted to furnish entire consolation to the afflicted; to comfort the broken-hearted; and that would, in its final triumphs, remove calamity and sorrow from men for ever. The fulness of this plan will be seen only in heaven. In anticipation of heaven, however, the Gospel now does much to alleviate human woes, and to wipe away tears from the mourner's eyes. This passage is exquisitely beautiful. The poet Burns once said that he could never read it without being affected to tears. It may be added, that nothing but the Gospel will do this. No other religion can furnish such consolations; and no other religion is, therefore, adapted to man.

CHAP. XXVIII.—9. Whom shall he teach. The true sense of the passage has undoubtedly been suggested by Lowth. 'What!' say they, 'does God treat us as children? Does he deal with us as we deal with infants just weaned, perpetually repeating and inculcating the same elementary lesson, and teaching the mere rudiments of knowledge?' The expression, therefore, "Whom shall he teach knowledge?" or, 'whom does he teach,' is an expression of contempt supposed to be spoken by the intemperate priests and prophets—the leaders of the people. 'Whom does God take us to be? Does he regard us as mere children? Why are we treated as children with the mere rudiments of knowledge, and with endless repetition of the same elementary instruction?'

CHAP. XXIX.—8. A thirsty man dreameth. As the simile of the prophet is drawn from nature, an extract which describes the actual occurrence of such a circumstance will be agreeable. 'The scarcity of water,' says Park, 'was greater here at Bubaker than at Benown. Day and night the wells were crowded with cattle lowing and fighting with each other to come at the trough.

Excessive thirst made many of them furious: others being too weak to contend for the water, endeavoured to quench their thirst by devouring the black mud from the gutters near the wells, which they did with great avidity, though it was commonly fatal to them. This great scarcity of water was felt by all the people of the camp, and by none more than myself. I begged water from the negro slaves that attended the camp, but with very indifferent success; for, though I let no opportunity slip, and was very urgent in my solicitations both to the Moors and to the negroes, I was but ill supplied, and frequently passed the night in the situation of Tantalus. No sooner had I shut my eyes, than fancy would convey me to the streams and rivers of my native land; there, as I wandered along the verdant bank, I surveyed the clear stream with transport, and hastened to swallow the delightful draught; but alas! disappointment awakened me, and I found myself a lonely captive, perishing of thirst amid the wilds of Africa.'—Travels in Africa. 23. But when he seeth his children. 'For in his seeing' (that is, when he sees) 'his children, the work of my hands, in the midst of him, they shall sanctify my name, and sanctify (or, yes they shall sanctify) the Holy One of Jacob, and the God of Israel they shall fear.' We have reason, wholly independent of this verse, to believe that the immediately preceding context has respect to the excision of the Jews and the vocation of the Gentiles. Now the latter are described in the New Testament as Abraham's (and consequently Jacob's) spiritual progeny, as such distinguished from his natural descendants. May not these adventitious or adopted children of the patriarch, constituted such by the electing grace of God, be here intended by the phrase, 'the work of my hands?' If so, the whole may thus be paraphrased: when he (the patriarch, supposed to be again alive and gazing at his offspring) shall behold his children (not by nature, but) created such by me, in the midst of him (that is, in the midst, or in the place, of his natural descendants,) they, (that is, he and his descendants jointly) shall unite in glorifying God as the author of this great revolution.—A. 24. They also that erred. 'Then shall the erring in spirit know wisdom, and the murmurers (or rebels) shall receive instruction.' These words would be perfectly appropriate as a general description of the reclaiming and converting influence to be exerted upon men in general. But under this more vague and comprehensive sense, the context, and especially the verse immediately preceding, seems to shew that there is one more specific and significant included. If the foregoing verse predicts the reception of the Gentiles into the family of Israel, and if this reception, as we learn from the New Testament, was connected with the disinheriting of most of the natural descendants, who are nevertheless to be restored hereafter, then the promise of this final restoration is a stroke still wanting to complete the fine prophetic picture now before us. That finishing stroke is given in this closing verse, which adds to the promise that the Gentiles shall become the heirs of Israel, another that the heirs of Israel according to the flesh shall themselves be restored to their long lost heritage, not by excluding their successors in their turn, but by peaceful and brotherly participation with them.—A.

Chap. XXXIV. The thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters make one distinct and beautiful prophecy, consisting of two parts, the first containing a denunciation of judgment on the enemies of the Jews and of Jehovah—particularly Edom, (ch. xxxiv.,) and the second a most beautiful description of the flourishing state of the people of God that should follow these judgments, ch. xxxv. Idumæa was the name given by the Greeks to the land of Edom, the country which was settled by Esau. The country which they occupied extended originally from the Dead sea to the Elanitic gulf of the Red sea. Their territory, however, they extended considerably by conquest, and carried their arms to the east and north-east of Moab, and obtained possession of the country of which Bozrah was the chief city. To this city they had had access through the intervening desert, without crossing the country of the Moabites, or Ammonites. The capital of East Idumæa was Bozrah; the capital of South Edom was Petra, or Sela, called in 2 Kin. xiv. 7, Joktheel. See Supplementary Note, ch. xvi. 1. This country received its name from Esau, the son of Isaac, and the twin brother of Jacob, and the elder of the two. He was called Edom, which signifies red, from the colour of the red pottage which he obtained from Jacob by the sale of his birthright, Gen. xxv. 30. After his marriage he removed to mount Seir, and made that his permanent abode, and the country adjacent to it received the name of Edom.——In the reign of Amaziah, king of Judah, the Edomites were attacked, and ten thousand of them fell in battle in the valley of Salt, and many were made prisoners; their capital, Selah, was taken by storm, and the two thousand captives were, by Amaziah's orders, thrown down the ragged precipices near the city, and dashed in pieces, 2 Kin. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xxv. 12; Universal History, vol. i., p. 380, Ed. Lond. 1779, 8vo. When the Jews were subdued by the Babylonians, and carried captive, when their city and temple were destroyed and the land laid waste, they seem to have regarded it as a favourable opportunity to avenge all the injustices which they had suffered from the hands of the Jews. They joined the Babylonians in their attempts to subdue Jerusalem, and exulted in the fall and ruin of the city.

> "Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom
> In the day of Jerusalem; who said,
> Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof."—Ps. cxxxvii. 7.

See particularly Oba. 10—12, 18; Eze. xxv. 12—14; xxxv. 3—15. It was for this especially that they were denounced and threatened by the prophets with heavy judgment, and with the utter destruction of the nation, ch. xxxiv. 5, 10—17; Jer. xlix. 7—10, 12—18; Eze. xxv. 12—15; xxxv. 1—15; Joel iii. 19; Am. i. 11; Oba. 2, 3, 8, 17, 18; Mal. i. 3, 4. This refusing to aid their brethren the Jews, and joining with the enemies of the people of God, and exulting in their success, was the great crime in their history which was to call down the Divine vengeance, and terminate in their complete and utter ruin. Their exultation did not long continue; and their cruelty to the Jews did not long remain unpunished. Five years after the taking of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar humbled all the states around Judæa, and particularly Idumæa, Jer. xxv. 15—26; Mal. i. 3, 4. John Hircanus afterwards entirely conquered them, and compelled them to receive circumcision and the law. They continued subject to the later kings of Judæa until Jerusalem was taken by the Romans. A part of them left their own land and settled in the southern part of Judæa, within the boundaries of the tribes of Simeon and Judah. The name Idumæa was transferred to this part of the land of Judæa which they occupied, and this is the Idumæa which is mentioned by Pliny, Ptolemy, Strabo, and other ancient writers. The people who remained in the vicinity of mount Seir, and who occupied the ancient territory of Idumæa, became mingled with the children of Nebaioth, a son of Ishmael, and were called ever afterwards by the name of Nabatheans. Their own kingdom was thus blotted out, and their name was lost. In their own land they ceased to be a separate people, and mingled with the other descendants of Ishmael; in Judæa they became, under John Hircanus, converts to the Jewish faith, received the rite of circumcision, and were incorporated with the Jews. Very interesting remains of cities and towns of Idumæa, and particularly Petra, have been recently discovered by the travellers Burckhardt and Seetzen. See Universal History, vol. i. 370—383; and the Travels of Burckhardt, Legh, Laborde, and Stephens; Keith on the Evidences of Prophecy, pp. 135—168.; and Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 289, 336, and vol. ii. 723, 741. 6. And the streams thereof. This verse as Calvin well observes, announces nothing new, but repeats the same prediction under other figures, borrowed from the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, which throughout the Bible "are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire," Jude 7.—A. 10. Day and night it shall not be quenched; for ever shall its smoke go up; from generation to generation shall it lie waste, for ever and ever, there shall be no one passing through it. These sublime and fearful images are copied in the book of Rev. xiv. 10, 11, but it does not follow that the copy, though inspired and prophetic, was intended to determine the sense of the original. Rosenmuller and Knobel understand the last words as meaning that no one shall 'go to it,' or 'pass into it,' but Gesenius and Ewald with the older writers, that no one shall pass 'through' or 'over it,' implying that it shall not be a thoroughfare for caravans or single travellers. Keith, in his Evidences of Prophecy, has collected some remarkable illustrations of this passage from the incidental statements of modern travellers with respect to what was once the land of Edom. Thus Volney speaks of thirty deserted towns within three days' journey; Seetzen, of a wide tract utterly without a place of habitation, and of his own route through it as one never before attempted; Burckhardt, of the passage as declared by the people of the nearest inhabited districts to be impossible, in accordance with which notion he was unable to procure guides at any price. These are striking coincidences, and, as illustrations of the prophecy, important, but are not to be insisted on as constituting its direct fulfilment, for in that case the passage of these very travellers through the country would falsify the prediction which they are cited to confirm. The truth of the prophecy in this clause is really no more suspended on such facts, than that of the first clause and of the preceding verse upon the actual existence of bituminous streams and a sulphureous soil throughout the ancient Idumæa. The whole is a magnificent prophetic picture, the fidelity of which, so far as it relates to ancient Edom, is notoriously attested by its desolation for a course of ages.—A. 'I would,' says Stephens, when standing amidst the ruins of Petra, the capital of Idumæa, and with this passage of Isaiah in his eye, 'I would that the sceptic could stand as I did, among the ruins of this city among the rocks, and there open the sacred book, and read the words of the inspired penman, written when this desolate place was one of the greatest cities in the world.'—Incidents of Travel, vol. ii. p. 76.

Chap. XXXV.—7. Parched ground. The Hebrew word, Sharab, properly denotes the heat of the sun, (ch. xlix. 10,) and then the phenomenon which is produced by the refraction of the rays of the sun on the glowing sands of a desert, and which gives the appearance of a sea or lake of water, so that the most experienced travellers are often deceived. This phenomenon is witnessed in the deserts of Arabia and Egypt, and has been also seen occasionally in the south of France, and in Russia. We have no word in English to express it. The French word by which it is commonly designated is mirage. The idea of the prophet, if he refers, as I suppose he does, to this phenomenon, is exceedingly beautiful. The hopes and promises which this world can furnish are as delusive as is the mirage to the exhausted and thirsty traveller. But the blessings of religion, the promises of God through the Messiah, are like real lakes of water and running streams to the thirsty traveller.

Chap. XXXVII.—36. Then the angel of the Lord. The terms used can naturally signify nothing but a single instantaneous stroke of Divine vengeance, and the parallel passage (2 Kin. xix. 35) says expressly that the angel smote this number 'in that night.' Sceptical critics would be glad to have it in their power to plead the silence of profane tradition as an objection to the narrative before us. But although such an inference would be wholly inconclusive, even if the fact were so, it happens in this case that the fact is not so. The account which Herodotus received from the Egyptian priests, as to Sennacherib's retreat from Pelusium, occasioned by an irruption of field mice, which Vulcan sent to rescue Sethos, who was priest to that divinity as well as king of Egypt, is admitted by the latest German writers, notwithstanding the denial of Gesenius, to be an evident variation of this history, not more corrupt than in many other cases where the identity of origin has never been disputed. The transfer of the scene of the event to Egypt, and the substitution of Sethos and Vulcan for Hezekiah and Jehovah, are in strict accordance with the common practice of the ancient nations, to connect the most remarkable events, by their traditions, with their own early history. Even the figment of the mice may be regarded as a change of no unusual character or magnitude, unless we choose to assume, with J. D. Michaelis, that it was founded on a misconception of the mouse as the hieroglyphical emblem of destruction.—A. 38. Esar-haddon. The wood engraving in loc. is from the Assyrian marbles, and considered to be authentic.

Chap. XXXVIII.—8. The shadow of degrees. It is most probable that it was an inclination of the rays of the sun, or a miraculous causing of the shadow itself to recede. This is the whole statement of the sacred writer; and this is all that is necessary to be supposed. What Hezekiah desired was a miracle; a sign that he should recover. That was granted. The retrocession of the shadow in this sudden manner was not a natural event. It could be caused only by God; and this was all that was needed. A simple exertion of Divine power on the rays of the sun which rested on the dial deflecting those rays, would accomplish the whole result. It may be added that it is not recorded, nor is it necessary to an understanding of the subject to suppose, that the bending of the rays was permanent, or that so much time was lost. The miracle was instantaneous, and was satisfactory to Hezekiah, though the rays of the sun casting the shadow may have again been soon returned to their regular position, and the shadow restored to the place in which it would have been had it not been interrupted. No infidel, therefore, can object to this statement, unless he can prove that this could not be done by Him who made the sun, and who is himself the fountain of power. By which degrees it was gone down. By the same steps, or degrees on which the shadow had descended. So the Seventy express it; "so the sun reascended the ten steps by which the shadow had gone down." It was the shadow on the dial which had gone down. The sun was ascending, and the consequence was, of course, that the shadow on a vertical dial would descend. The 'sun' here means, evidently, the sun as it appeared; the rays, or the shining of the sun. A return of the shadow was effected such as would be produced by the recession of the sun itself.

Chap. XL. It is admitted, on all hands, that the second part of Isaiah, comprising the prophecies which commence at the fortieth chapter, and which continue to the end of the book, is to be regarded as the most sublime, and to us the most important, part of the Old Testament. In the previous portions of his prophecies there was much that was local and temporary. Indeed, all, or nearly all, that occurs from ch. i. to ch. xxxix. had direct and immediate reference to the times in which the prophet lived, or was suggested by the events which occurred in those times. For though the mind of the prophet is carried forward by the laws of prophetic suggestion, and he describes the times of the Messiah, yet the immediate and primary reference of those prophecies is to events which were then occurring, or soon to occur; and to Judæa, or to the kingdoms and countries in the vicinity of Judæa, with which the Jews were in various ways connected. In this portion of the prophecy, however, there is little that is local and temporary. It is wholly occupied with a description of events which were to occur long after the time of the prophet, and which should be of interest, not only to the Jewish nation, but to the whole human family. It is a beautiful and glowing description of occurrences in which men of these times and of all subsequent times will have as deep an interest as they who have lived at any former period. Indeed, it is not improbable that, as the world advances in age, the interest in this portion of Isaiah will increase; and that as the Gospel is carried around the globe, and the earth comes under its influence, the beauty and accuracy of these descriptions will be more clearly seen, and more highly appreciated; and that nations will yet derive their highest consolations, and see the clearest proof of the inspiration of the sacred volume, from the entire correspondence between this portion of Isaiah and the future events which are yet to gladden the world.—— 9. Lift it up. Barnes thinks it necessary to prevent abuse of this text by affirming, that it 'will not justify boisterous preaching, or a loud and unnatural tone of voice, alike offensive to good taste, injurious to health, and destructive of the life of the preacher.' He also infers from it that 'the glad tidings of salvation should be delivered in an animated and ardent manner; the future punishment of the wicked in a tone serious, solemn, subdued, awful.'—A.

CHAP. XLI. Until the ends of Israel's national existence are accomplished, that existence must continue, in spite of hostile nations and their gods, who shall all perish sooner than the chosen people, ver. 1—16. However feeble Israel may be in himself, Jehovah will protect him, and raise up the necessary instruments for his deliverance and triumph, ver. 17—29. 8. Thou, Israel, art. 'And thou, Israel, my servant, Jacob whom I have chosen, the seed of Abraham my friend.' The insertion of the substantive verb in the first clause, 'thou Israel art my servant,' is unnecessary. This whole verse, with the next, may be understood as a description of the object of address, or of the person to whom the exhortation in ver. 10 is directed. 10. Fear thou not. This may be regarded as the conclusion of the sentence beginning in ver. 8, as the address to which the two preceding verses are an introduction. 15. Threshing instrument. The oriental threshing machine is sometimes a sledge of thick planks armed with iron or sharp stones, sometimes a system of rough rollers joined together like a sledge or dray. Both kinds are dragged over the grain by oxen.—A.

CHAP. XLII.—3. A bruised reed. The verse continues the description of the mode in which the Messiah and his people were to 'bring forth judgment to the nations,' or, in other words, to spread the true religion. It was not to be by clamour or by violence. The first of these ideas is expressed in the preceding verse, the last in this. That such is the true import of the words is clear from the addition of the last clause, which would be unmeaning if the verse related merely to a compassionate and sympathetic temper. That this verse is included in Matthew's quotation (Mat. xii. 10) shews that he did not quote the one before it as descriptive of a modest and retiring disposition. For, although such a temper might be proved by Christ's prohibiting the publication of his miracles, this prohibition could not have been cited as an evidence of tenderness and mildness. The only way in which the whole quotation can be made appropriate to the case in hand, is by supposing that it was meant to be descriptive, not of our Saviour's human virtues, but of the nature of his kingdom, and of the means by which it was to be established. That he was both lowly and compassionate is true, but it is not the truth which he established by his conduct upon this occasion, nor the truth which the evangelist intended to illustrate by the citation of these words. As well in their original connection as in Matthew's application of them, they describe that kingdom which was not of this world; which came not with observation, Lu. xvii. 20; which was neither meat nor drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, Rom. xiv. 17; which was founded and promoted not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord, and of which its founder said, Jno. xviii. 36, "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews, but now is my kingdom not from hence." And again, Jno. xviii. 27, when Pilate said unto him, "Art thou a king then?" Jesus answered, "Thou sayest," rightly, "that I am a king; to this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth; every one that is of the truth heareth my voice." How perfectly does this august description tally with the great prophetic picture of the Servant of Jehovah, who was to bring forth judgment to the nations, and in doing so was not to cry or raise his voice, or let men hear it in the streets, not by brutal force to break the crushed reed, or quench the dim wick, but to conquer by healing and imparting strength.—A. 11. The wilderness—the cities, &c. The only consistent supposition is that sea, islands, deserts, mountains, towns, and camps, are put together as poetical ingredients of the general conception, that the earth in all its parts shall have occasion to rejoice.—A.

> 'The dwellers in the vales and on the rocks,
> Shout to each other, and the mountain tops,
> From distant mountains catch the flying joy;
> Till nation after nation taught the strain,
> Earth rolls the rapturous hosannas round.'—Cowper.

15. I will make waste. 16. Bring the blind. Some writers understand the first clause as specifically meaning, that the exiles in Babylon should be delivered at a time and in a manner which they had not expected; while another class apply the words exclusively to spiritual exercise or religious experience. To both these objects the description admits of an easy application; but neither of them is to be considered its specific subject. It is impossible, without the utmost violence, to separate this one link from the chain of which it forms a part, that is to say, from the series of strong and varied metaphors, by which the prophet is expressing the idea of abrupt and total change. The same thing that is meant by the wasting of cultivated hills, the withering of herbage, and the drying up of streams and lakes, is also meant by the leading of blind men in a new path, that is, causing them to witness things of which they had had no previous experience.—A.

CHAP. XLIII. Israel is the peculiar people of Jehovah, cherished and favoured at the expence of other nations, ver. 1—4. But these are one day to become partakers of the same advantages, ver. 5—9. The proofs of the Divine protection are afforded by the history of Israel, ver. 10—13. One of the most remarkable, yet future, is the downfal of Babylon and the liberation of the exiles, ver. 14, 15. An analogous example in more ancient times was the deliverance from Egypt, ver. 16, 17. But both these instances shall be forgotten in comparison with the great change which awaits the church hereafter, ver. 18—21. Of all these distinguishing favours none was owing to the merit of the people, but all to the sovereign grace of God, ver. 22—25. The people were not only destitute of merit, but deserving of punishment, which they had experienced, and must experience again, ver. 26—28. 1. And now. The prophet is accounting for the sufferings of Israel, and his preservation from destruction on the same ground, namely, Jehovah had chosen them, and therefore would preserve them, but that they were unfaithful, and must therefore suffer. The intermingling of the promises and threatenings is not to be explained by supposing a reference to different periods or different subjects; nor is it to be set down as capricious and unmeaning, but as necessary to the prophet's purpose. The 'now' will then have a logical rather than a temporal meaning, as introductory to an explanation of the strange fact, that the bush was burned but not consumed. 4. Since thou wast precious. The first clause, as the whole context clearly shews, does not refer to intrinsic qualities, but to an arbitrary sovereign choice. Since I began to treat thee as a thing of value, thou hast been distinguished among the nations. The verse, so far from ascribing any merit to the people, refers all to God.—A. Therefore will I give men for thee. He would cause other nations to be destroyed, if it were necessary, in order to effect their deliverance, and to restore them to their own land. As his people, they were of more value than other nations; and he would suffer Cyrus to overturn the Babylonish empire, suffer armies to be discomfited and fall, in order that they might be delivered. We learn here, 1. That nations and armies are in the hand of God, and at his disposal; 2. That his people are dear to his heart, and that it is his purpose to defend them; 3. That the revolutions among nations, the rise of one empire and the fall of another, are often in order to promote the welfare of his church, to defend it in danger, and deliver it in time of calamity; and, 4. That his people should put the utmost confidence in God, as being able to defend them, and as having formed a purpose to preserve and save them. 10. No god before me. Instead of saying, in a bald prosaic form, all other gods are the work of men's hands, but I am uncreated and exist from all eternity, he condenses all into the pregnant declaration, there was no god manufactured before me, that is, all other gods were made, but none of them was made before I had a being. The sarcasm is rendered still more pungent by the use of the Divine name, thus bringing into the most revolting contrast the pretended divinity of idols and their impotence; as if he had said, none of these almighty gods were made before I had a being.—A.

CHAP. XLIV.—3, 4. I will pour water—and they shall spring up. These two verses teach us, 1. That God will pour his blessing on the children of his people—a promise which, in all ages, when parents are faithful, is abundantly fulfilled. 2. That one of the richest blessings which can be imparted to a people is, that God's Spirit should descend on their children. Nothing can be better fitted to comfort them in calamity and trial. 3. That the Spirit of God alone is the source of true happiness and prosperity to our children. All else, property, learning, accomplishment, beauty, vigour, will be vain. It is by his blessing only—by the influence of piety—that they will spring forth as among the grass, and like willows by the streams of water. 4. Parents should seek this blessing as the richest inheritance which they can have for their children. Parents may leave the world in peace, if they see the Divine blessing—the Spirit of God, descend on their children like waters on the thirsty land, and like torrents upon the dry ground. 5. Parents should pray earnestly for a revival of religion. No better description can be given of a revival than that given here, of the Spirit of God descending like streams and floods, on the children and the young; and their springing forth, in the graces of piety, as among the grass, and growing in love to God and love to men, like willows by the water-courses. Who would not pray for such a work of grace? What family, what congregation, what people, can be happy or blessed without it? 5. I am the Lord's. I belong to Jehovah; I devote myself to him. This expresses the true nature of a profession of religion, a feeling that we are not our own, but that we belong to God. It is, that we not only feel that we are bound to worship him, but that we actually belong to him; that our bodies and spirits, and all that we have and are, are his, and are to be sacredly employed in his service, and his service alone: see 1 Cor. vi. 20; 2 Cor. viii. 5; v. 14, 15. 22. As a thick cloud—and as a cloud. 'I have blotted out, like a cloud, thy transgressions, and, like a vapour, thy sins.' Many think they improve the verse by putting the 'thick cloud' last. They overlook the true force of the words. The Lord declares his full forgiveness; forgiveness that leaves not a stain remaining. I have blotted out thy transgressions as the sun would break through and scatter a thick cloud; nay, more, it is like the sun dissolving and dissipating even the thin cloud or vapour that might still be lingering in the sky, so that not even the vestige remains of what formed a veil between you and God. It is thus the prophet describes complete forgiveness, the entire pardon of sin, and the delivering of the soul from the slightest stain. Not a thread of the veil is left, not a breath of the vapour. The thick cloud melts into vapour, and the vapour is dissolved—a clear blue sky remains, and a cloudless sun.—Presbyterian Review, Edin., No. 79.

CHAP. XLV.—1. To subdue nations before him. Besides his native subjects, the nations which Cyrus subdued, and over which he reigned, were the Cilicians, Syrians, Paphlagonians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, Lydians, Carians, Phœnicians, Arabians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Bactrians, Sacæ, and Maryandines. Xenophon describes his empire as extending from the Mediterranean and Egypt to the Indian Ocean, and from Ethiopia to the Euxine sea, and conveys a physical idea of its extent by observing that the extremities were difficult to inhabit from opposite causes,—some from excess of heat, and others from excess of cold; some from a scarcity of water, and others too great abundance. To open the two leaved gates. In the scene of revelry which prevailed in Babylon when Cyrus took the city, the gates within the city which led from the streets to the river were left open, or the city could not have been taken, even after Cyrus had got within the walls; for the city was not only enclosed with walls, but there were walls within the city, on each side of the river Euphrates, with gates, by which the inhabitants had access to the water of the river. Had not these gates been left open on that occasion, contrary to the usual custom, the Persians would have been shut up in the bed of the river, and could all have been destroyed. And the gates shall not be shut. This is a most remarkable prophecy, and its fulfilment was remarkable. It was usual to close the gates of a city at night, and on the approach of an enemy. But in regard to Babylon, the inner gates leading to the river were left open in the revelry which prevailed in the city, and Cyrus had unarrested and unopposed access even to the palace itself. None but an omniscient Being could have predicted, a hundred and fifty years before it occurred, that such an event would take place; and this is one of the many prophecies which demonstrate in the most particular manner, that Isaiah was inspired. 3. Treasures of darkness. The treasures of the kings of the east were usually hidden in some obscure and strong place, and were not to be touched, except in cases of pressing necessity. Alexander found vast quantities of treasure thus hidden among the Persians; and it was by taking such treasures that the rapacity of the soldiers who followed a conqueror was satisfied, and in fact by a division of the spoils thus taken that they were paid. There can be no doubt that large quantities of treasure in this manner would be found in Babylon. 14. They shall fall down unto thee. Instead of saying, 'they shall worship God who dwells in thee,' the prophet makes his language more expressive by saying, 'they shall worship thee;' and then immediately explains his own language by adding their acknowledgment, 'only in thee is God,' or, to give the Hebrew word its full force, 'an almighty God,' implying that the gods of other nations were but gods in name. This exclusive recognition of the God of Israel is then repeated in a way which may to some seem tautological, but which is really emphatic in a high degree.—A.——One of the most remarkable characteristics of the present time is, that a state of religious inquiry extensively exists; that heathen nations are becoming increasingly sensible of their ignorance, and comparative degradation; that they welcome the ministers and teachers sent out from Christian lands; and the increased commerce of the world is thus diffusing a spirit of universal inquiry, and preparing the world for the final spread of the Gospel.

CHAP. XLVIII.—22. There is no peace with the wicked. This verse was intended to restrict the operation of the foregoing promises to true believers, or the genuine Israel, as if he had said, All this will God accomplish for his people, but not for the wicked among them. The grand conclusion to which all tends is, that God is all, and man nothing; that even the chosen people must be sufferers, because they are sinners; that peculiar favour confers no immunity to sin or exemption from responsibility, but that even in the Israel of God, and the enjoyment of the most extraordinary privileges, it still remains for ever true, that "there is no peace to the wicked."—A.

CHAP. XLIX.—12. The land of Sinim. See a work under the title of "The Land of Sinim, or an exposition of Isaiah xlix. 12, together with a brief account of the Jews and Christians in China." (Philadelphia, 1845.) It is well said by this writer, that the verse before us is the central point of the prophetical discourse of which it forms a part, inasmuch as it embodies the great promise, which in various forms is exhibited before and afterwards. This relation of the text to the context is important, because it creates a presumption in favour of the widest meaning which can be put upon the terms of the prediction, and against a restricted local application. If the land of Sinim meant the wilderness of Sin, or even Egypt, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to give a satisfactory solution of its singular position here as one of the great quarters or divisions of the world. But if it mean China, that extreme limit of the eastern world, that hive of nations, supposed to comprehend a third part of the human race, the enigma explains itself. Even to us there would be nothing unintelligible or absurd, however strange or novel, in the combination, north, west, south, and China. On the whole then, a hypothesis which solves all difficulties, satisfies the claims of philology and history, unites the suffrages of the most independent schools and parties, fully meets the requisitions of the text and context, and opens a glorious field of expectation and of effort to the church, may be safely regarded as the true one. 22. Daughters upon the shoulders. Children of both sexes are carried on the shoulders. Thus may be seen the father carrying his son, the little fellow being astride on the shoulder, having with his hand, hold of his father's head. Girls, however, sit on their shoulder, as if on a chair, their legs hanging in front, while they also, with their hands, lay hold of the head. In going to or returning from heathen festivals, thousands of parents and their children may be thus seen marching along with joy.—Roberts. It is no forced interpretation of this passage which regards it as teaching, that the parents who should be converted among the Gentiles should bring their offspring to the Redeemer, and present them publicly to God.

CHAP. LI.—16. My words in thy mouth. The Messiah is the object of address, and that his work or mission is here described, namely, to plant the heavens, that is, to establish them, perhaps with allusion to the erection of a tent by the insertion of its stakes in the ground. The new creation thus announced can only mean the reproduction of the church in a new form, by what we usually call the change of dispensations. The outward economy should all be new, and yet the identity of the chosen people should remain unbroken; for he whom God had called to plant new heavens and to found a new earth was likewise commissioned to say to Zion, Thou art still my people.

CHAP. LIII.—3. Grief. The word rendered 'grief,' means usually sickness, disease, Deu. vii. 15; xxviii. 61; Isa. i. 5; but it also means anxiety, affliction, grief, Eccl. v. 16; and then any evil or calamity, Eccl. vi. 2. 7. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter. 'As a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so was he.' He made no resistance; he uttered no complaint. He suffered himself to be led quietly along to be put to death. What a striking and beautiful description! How tender and how true! We can almost see here the meek and patient Redeemer led along without resistance; and amidst the multitude that were assembled with various feelings to conduct him to death, himself perfectly silent and composed. With all power at his disposal, yet as quiet and gentle as though he had no power; and with a perfect consciousness that he was going to die, as calm and as gentle as though he were ignorant of the design for which they were leading him forth. 8. He was taken from prison. 'From distress and from judgment he was taken; and in his generation who will think that he was cut off from the land of the living for the transgression of my people,' as 'a curse for them?' In (or among) his generation (that is, his contemporaries,) who considered that he was cut off from the land of the living? &c. 9. Because. This word here has probably the signification of, although. Thus it is used in Job xvi. 17, "Not for any injustice in my hands," Heb., 'Although there is no injustice in my hands.' The sense here demands this interpretation. According to our common version, the meaning is, that he was buried with the rich man because he had done no violence, and was guilty of no deceit; whereas it is rather to be taken in connection with the entire strain of the passage, and to be regarded as meaning, that he was wounded, rejected, put to death, and buried by the hands of men, although he had done no violence. Assuming now (see the Analysis in Barnes' Commentary, on ch. lii. 13, seq.) that this was written more than seven hundred years before the Lord Jesus was born, there are some remarks of great importance, to which we may just refer in the conclusion of this exposition. 1. The first is, the minute accuracy of the statements here as applicable to the Lord Jesus. It describes, as minutely as could have been done after the events occurred, the manner of his trial, of his rejection, the fact of his being taken from detention, and by a judicial sentence, and the manner in which it was designed that he should be buried, and yet the remarkable fact that this was prevented, and that he was interred in the manner in which the rich were buried. 2. We are then prepared to ask an infidel how he will dispose of this prophecy. That it existed seven hundred years before Christ, is as certain as that the poems of Homer or Hesiod had an existence before the Christian era; as certain as the existence of any ancient document whatever. It will not do to say that it was forged, for this is not only without proof, but would destroy the credibility of all ancient writings. It will not do to say that it was the result of natural sagacity in the prophet—for whatever may be said of conjectures about empires and kingdoms, no natural sagacity can tell what will be the character of an individual man, or whether such a man as here referred to would exist at all. It will not do to say that the Lord Jesus was a cunning impostor, and resolved to fulfil this ancient writing, and thus establish his claims; for such an attempt would have belied human nature; and, if attempted, could not have been accomplished. It remains then to ask, what solution the infidel will give of these remarkable facts. We present him the prophecy, not a rhapsody, not conjecture, not a general statement, but minute, full, clear, unequivocal, relating to points which could not have been the result of conjecture, and over which the individual had no control. And then we present him with the record of the life of Jesus,—minutely accurate in all the details of the fulfilment, a coincidence as clear as that between a biography and the original, and ask him to explain it. And we demand a definite and consistent answer to this. To turn away from it does not answer it. To laugh does not answer it. To say that it is not worth inquiry is not true, for it pertains to the great question of human redemption. But if he cannot explain it, then he should admit that it is such a prediction as only God could give, and that Christianity is true. 3. This chapter proves that the Redeemer died as an atoning sacrifice for men. It would be impossible to state in more explicit language the truth that he died as a sacrifice for the sins of men,—that he suffered to make proper expiation for the guilty. No confession of faith on earth, no creed, no symbol, no standard of doctrine, contains more explicit statements on the subject. And if the language here used does not demonstrate that the Redeemer was an atoning sacrifice, it is impossible to conceive how such a doctrine could be taught or conveyed to men. 4. This whole chapter is exceedingly important to Christians. It contains the most full, continuous statement in the Bible of the design of the Redeemer's sufferings and death. And after all the light which is shed on the subject in the New Testament, after all the full and clear statements made by the Redeemer and the apostles, still, if we wish to see a full and continuous statement on the great doctrine of the atonement, we naturally recur to this portion of Isaiah. If we wish our faith to be strengthened, and our hearts warmed, by the contemplation of his sufferings, we shall find no portion of the Bible better adapted to it than this. It is a portion that should not only be the subject of contemplation, but of much fervent prayer. No man can study it too profoundly. No one can feel too much anxiety to understand it. Every verse, every phrase, every word, should be studied and pondered, until it fixes itself deep in the memory, and makes an eternal impression on the heart. If a man understands this portion of the Bible, he will have a correct view of the plan of salvation. And it should be the subject of profound and prayerful contemplation, till the heart glows with love to that merciful God who was willing to give the Redeemer to such sorrow, and to the gracious Saviour who for our sins was willing to pour out his soul unto death.

CHAP. LIV.—11, 12. Sapphires—agates. Lowth says that, 'these seem to be general images to express beauty, magnificence, purity, strength, and solidity agreeably to the ideas of the eastern nations, and to have never been intended to be strictly scrutinized, or minutely and particularly explained, as if they had each of them some precise moral or spiritual meaning.'—A.

CHAP. LVII.—20. The wicked are like the troubled sea. The agitation and commotion of the sinner here referred to relates to such things as the following: 1. There is no permanent happiness or enjoyment. There is no reconciliation with God. 2. Raging passions. The sinner is under their influence, and they may be compared to the wild and tumultuous waves of the ocean. 3. Conscience. Nothing more resembles an agitated ocean casting up mire and dirt than a soul agitated by the recollections of past guilt. 4. The fear of judgment and of hell. Many a sinner has no rest day or night, from the fear of future wrath. His troubled mind looks onward, and he sees nothing to anticipate but the wrath of God, and the horrors of an eternal hell. How invaluable is religion! All these commotions are stilled by the voice of pardoning mercy, as the billows of the deep were hushed by the voice of Jesus. —We all must soon lie down on beds of death; and in all these scenes there is nothing that can give permanent and solid peace but the religion of the Redeemer. Oh, that stills all the agitation of a troubled soul; lays every billow of tumultuous passion to rest; calms all the conflicts of a guilty bosom; reveals God, reconciled through a Redeemer, to our souls; and removes all the anticipated terrors of a bed of death, and of the approach to the judgment bar. Peacefully the Christian can die, not like the troubled sinner, when he leaves the world with a bosom agitated like the stormy ocean, but as peacefully as the gentle ripple dies away on the beach.

CHAP. LVIII.—3. And exact all your labours. There was no kindness shewn to the poor, to the labouring classes, to those who were in their employ, to those who were indebted to them, to those who had injured or offended them. Alas, how often is this still true! 14. For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. This formula often occurs when an important promise is made, and it is regarded as ample security for the fulfilment that Jehovah has promised it. What more ample security can be required, or conceived, than the promise of the eternal God? From the closing portion of this chapter we may derive the following important inferences respecting the sabbath: 1. It is to be of perpetual obligation. The whole chapter occurs in the midst of statements that relate to the times of the Messiah. But there is no intimation that the sabbath was to be abolished; but it is fairly implied, that its observance was to be attended with most happy results in those future times. At all events, Isaiah regarded it as of binding obligation, and felt that its proper observance was identified with the national welfare. 2. We may see the manner in which the sabbath is to be observed. In no place in the Bible is there a more full account of the proper mode of keeping that holy day. We are to refrain from ordinary travelling and employments; we are not to engage in doing our own pleasure; we are to regard it with delight, and to esteem it a day worthy to be honoured; and we are to shew honour to it by not performing our own ordinary works, or pursuing pleasure, or engaging in the common topics of conversation. 3. Important benefits result from the right observance of the sabbath. In the passage before us these are said to be, that they who thus observed it should find pleasure in Jehovah, and should be signally prospered and be safe. But those benefits are by no means confined to the Jewish people. It is as true now as it was then, that they who observe the sabbath in a proper manner find a pleasure and happiness in the Lord—in his existence, perfections, promises, law, and in communion with him—which is to be found nowhere else. Of this fact there are abundant witnesses now in every Christian church, and they will continue to be multiplied, in every coming age. 4. Society will have seasons of cessation from labour, and when they are not made occasions for the promotion of virtue, they will be for the promotion of vice. It is vain to attempt to blot out wholly the observance of the Christian sabbath; and since it will and must be observed as a day of cessation from toil, all that remains is, for society to avail itself of the advantages which may be derived from its proper observance, and to make it the handmaid of temperance, intelligence, and pure religion. It is deeply, therefore, to be regretted that this sacred institution has been, and is, so widely abused in Christain lands. As it is, it is extensively a day of feasting, amusement, dissipation, and revelry. And while its observance is more decidedly than any thing else the means of perpetuating virtue and religion on earth, it is, perhaps, not too much to say, that it is the occasion of more intemperance, vice, and crime, than all the other days of the week put together. This is particularly the case in our large cities and towns. 6. While the friends of religion, therefore, mourn over the desecration of the Christian sabbath, let them remember that their example may contribute more to secure a proper observance of that day. On the friends of the Redeemer it devolves to rescue the day from desecration; and by the Divine blessing it may be done. The happiness of every Christian is indissolubly connected with the proper observance of the sabbath. The perpetuity of the true religion, and its extension throughout the earth, is identified with the observance of the sabbath. And every true friend of God the Saviour, as he values his own peace, and as he prizes the religion which he professes to love, is bound to restrain his foot on the sabbath; to cease to find his own pleasure, and to speak his own words on that holy day; and to shew that the sabbath is to him a delight, and that he esteems the holy day of Jehovah a day to be honoured and to be loved.

CHAP. LIX.—21. From henceforth and for ever. This is in accordance with the promises which everywhere occur in the Scriptures, that God would bless the posterity of his people, and that the children of the pious should partake of his favour: see Ex. xx. 6, "shewing mercy unto thousands" (that is, thousands of generations) "of them that love me, and keep my commandments:" compare Deu. vii. 9; iv. 37; v. 29; Ps. lxxxix. 24—36; Jer. xxxii. 39, 40. There is no promise of the Bible that is more full of consolation to the pious, or that has been more strikingly fulfilled than this. And though it is true that not all the children of holy parents become truly pious; though there are instances where they are signally wicked and abandoned, yet it is also true that rich spiritual blessings are imparted to the posterity of those who serve God, and who keep his commandments. The following facts are well known to all who have ever made any observation on this subject. 1. The great majority of those who become religious are the descendants of those who were themselves the friends of God. Those who now compose the Christian churches the world over, are not those generally who have been taken from the ways of open vice and profligacy; from the ranks of infidelity; or from the immediate descendants of scoffers, drunkards, and blasphemers. Such men usually tread, for a few generations at least, in the footsteps of their fathers. The church is composed mainly of the descendants of those who have been true Christians, and who trained their children to walk in the ways of pure religion. 2. It is a fact that comparatively a large proportion of the descendants of the pious themselves, for many generations, become true Christians. I know that it is often thought to be otherwise, and especially that it is often said that the children of clergymen are less virtuous and religious than others. But it should be remembered that such cases are more prominent than others; that they attract attention; and especially that the profane and the wicked have a malicious pleasure in making them the subject of remark. The son of a drunkard will be intemperate without attracting notice; for such a result is expected; the son of an infidel will be an infidel; the son of a scoffer will be a scoffer; of a thief a thief; of a licentious man licentious, without being the subject of special remark. It is expected, and is regarded as a matter of course. But when the son of an eminent Christian is profane, licentious, or an infidel,—when he treads the path of open profligacy, it at once excites remark, because such is not the usual course, and is not usually expected; and because a wicked world has pleasure in marking the case, and calumniating religion through the prominent instances of imperfection and sin. But such is not the common result of religious training. Some of the most devotedly pious people of the United States are the descendants of the Hugonots who were expelled from France. A very large proportion of all the piety in this country has been derived from the "Pilgrims," who landed on the rock of Plymouth, and God has blessed their descendants in New England, and elsewhere, with numerous revivals of religion. I am acquainted with the descendants of John Rogers, the first martyr in Queen Mary's reign, of the tenth and eleventh generations. With a single exception, the oldest son in the family has been a clergyman; some of them eminently distinguished for learning and piety; and there are few families now in this land a greater proportion of whom are pious than of that family. The secretary of the Massachusetts Sabbath School Society made a limited investigation this year (1838) for the purpose of ascertaining the facts about the religious character of the families of ministers and deacons, with reference to the charge so often urged that the "sons and daughters of ministers and deacons were worse than common children." The following is the result. In 268 families which he canvassed, he found 1,290 children over fifteen years of age; of these children, 884, almost three-fourths, are hopefully pious; 794 have united with the churches; sixty-one entered the ministry; only seventeen are dissipated, and about half only of these became so while with their parents. In eleven of these families there are 123 children, and all but seven pious. In fifty-six of these families there are 249 children over fifteen, and all hopefully pious. When and where can any such result be found in the families of infidels, of the vicious, or of irreligious men? Indeed, it is the great law by which religion and virtue are spread and perpetuated in the world, that God is faithful to this covenant, and that he blesses the efforts of his friends in endeavouring to train up generations for his service. 3. All pious parents should repose on this promise of a faithful God. They may and should believe that it is his design to perpetuate religion in the families of those who truly serve and obey him. They should be faithful in imparting religious truth; faithful in prayer; faithful in a meek, holy, pure and benevolent example; they should so live, that their children may safely tread in their footsteps; they should look to God for his blessing on their efforts, and their efforts will not be in vain. They shall see their children walk in the ways of virtue; and when they die they may leave the world with unwavering confidence that God will not suffer his faithfulness to fail; that he will not break his covenant, nor alter the thing that is gone out of his lips, Ps. lxxxix. 33, 34.

CHAP. LX. Having repeatedly and fully shewn that the national pre-eminence of Israel was not to be perpetual, that the loss of it was the natural consequence, and righteous retribution, of iniquity, and that their loss did not involve the destruction of the true church or spiritual Israel, the prophet now proceeds to shew, that to the latter the approaching change would be a glorious and blessed one. 11. Therefore thy gates shall be open continually. The sense is, 1. That there will be immense multitudes that shall enter the true church from the heathen world. 2. That the Gospel will be constantly and unceasingly offered to men. The doors of the church shall at no time be closed. 3. It will be a time of safety, when the world shall be brought under the influence and the dominion of the Prince of peace. Should the principles of Christianity be every where diffused, the walls of all cities might be suffered to fall down, their gates to stand open till they should decay, ships of war to lie in the dock till they should sink to the bottom, forts and fleets to be dismantled, and the whole business of making locks, and shackles, and of building prisons, and manufacturing instruments of war, would come to an end. 12. For the nation. The "For" at the beginning of the verse is commonly explained as introducing a reason for the confluence of strangers just before predicted, namely, the desire of escaping this destruction; but it may as well be understood to give a reason for the promise of increase in general. The gates of Zion shall be crowded, because all shall enter into them but those who are to perish.—A.

CHAP. LXI.—6. Ye shall eat the riches. 'And ye,' or more emphatically, as for you, 'the priests of Jehovah shall ye be called, the ministers of our God shall be said to you,' (or of you,) 'the strength of nations shall ye eat, and in their glory shall ye substitute yourselves,' or into their glory shall ye enter by exchange. The true antithesis is, 'ye shall be their priests, and they shall be your purveyors; you shall supply their spiritual wants, and they shall supply your temporal wants.' This explanation of the verse, to which we have been naturally led by philological induction, and the context, coincides, in a manner too remarkable to be considered accidental, with the words of Paul in writing to the Romans of the contribution made by the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, for the poor saints at Jerusalem. "It hath pleased them verily, and their debtors they are," that is, they have chosen to do it, and indeed were bound to do it, "for if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things," Rom. xv. 27. This may seem, however, to determine the object of address to be the Jews; but no such inference can fairly be deduced from the words of the apostle, who is only making one specific application of the general truth taught by the prophet. What was true of the Gentile converts then, in relation to the Jewish Christians as their mother church, is no less true of the heathen now, or even of converted Jews, in reference to the Christians who impart the Gospel to them. The essential idea in both places is, that the church, the chosen people, or the Israel of God, is charged with the duty of communicating spiritual things to those without, and entitled in return to an increase of outward strength from those who thus become incorporated with it.—But it is not merely in this lower sense that the people of God are in the law (Ex. xix. 20) and the Gospel, (1 Pet. i. 3,) as well as in the prophets, represented as the ministers and priests of God. Not only as instructors and reclaimers of the unbelieving world do they enjoy this sacred dignity, but also as the only representatives of their great High Priest, in him and through him possessing free access to the fountain of salvation and the throne of grace, Heb. iv. 14—16. In this respect, as in every other, which concerns the method of salvation and access to God, there is no distinction of Jew and Gentile, any more than of Greek and barbarian, male and female, bond and free, but all are Christ's, and Christ is God's, and all alike are priests and ministers of God.—A. To the system of more literally interpreting this and other chapters in Isaiah, reference is made in the Supplementary Notes to Jeremiah. ch. xxiii.

CHAP. LXIII. The influx of the Gentiles into Zion having been described in the preceding verses, the destruction of her enemies is now sublimely represented as a sanguinary triumph of Jehovah or the Messiah, ver. 1—6. The prophet then supposes the catastrophe already past, and takes a retrospective view of God's compassions towards his people, and of their unfaithfulness during the old economy, ver. 7—14. He then assumes the tone of earnest supplication, such as might have been offered by the believing Jews when all seemed lost in the destruction of their commonwealth and temple, ver. 15—19. 1. From Edom. With some exceptions, most interpreters, even of the modern German school, suppose Edom to be here, as in ch. xxxiv., the representative of Israel's most inveterate enemies. 3. I have trodden the winepress alone. The most satisfactory solution seems to be, that these words are added to convey the idea that all the nations were on the adverse side, none on that of the conqueror. The sense will then be, not that they refuse to join in trampling others, but simply that they were among the trampled; as if he had said, I trod the press alone, and all the nations, without exception, were trodden in it. By all the nations we are of course to understand all but God's people. The treading of the winepress alone is an expression often applied in sermons, and in religious books and conversation, to our Saviour's sufferings. This application is described as customary in his own time by Vitringa, who considers it as having led to the forced exposition of the whole passage by the fathers and Cocceius as a description of Christ's passion. While the impossibility of such a sense in the original passage cannot be too strongly stated, there is no need of denying that the figure may be happily accommodated in the way suggested; as many expressions of the Old Testament may be applied to different objects with good effect, provided we are careful to avoid confounding such accommodations with the strict and primary import of the passage. 16. Though Abraham be ignorant of us. The true sense of the verse, as it appears to me, is that the church or chosen people, although once, for temporary reasons, coextensive and coincident with a single race, is not essentially a national organization, but a spiritual body. Its father is not Abraham or Israel, but Jehovah, who is, and always has been, its Redeemer, who has borne that name from everlasting.—A.

CHAP. LXIV.—4. Thou meetest him. There is perhaps no sentence in Isaiah or indeed in the Old Testament, which has more divided and perplexed interpreters, or on which the ingenuity and learning of the modern writers have thrown less light. To enumerate the various interpretations would be endless and of no avail. I shall not attempt to define what is correct and what erroneous in these various constructions, but simply to justify the one assumed in my own version. The general meaning of the sentence may be thus expressed in paraphrase: 'Although thou hast cast off Israel as a nation, thou hast nevertheless met, or favourably answered, every one rejoicing to do righteousness, and in thy ways or future dispensations such shall still remember and acknowledge thee; thou hast been angry, and with cause, for we have sinned, but in them, thy purposed dispensations, there is perpetuity, and we shall be saved.' The abrogation of the old economy, though fatal to the national pre-eminence of Israel, was so far from destroying the true church or the hopes of true believers, that it revealed the way of life more clearly than ever, and substituted for an insufficient, temporary system, a complete and everlasting one.—A.

CHAP. LXVI.—24. Their worm shall not die. The Saviour (Mar. ix. 44, 64,) applied the language to the future punishment of the wicked, and no one, I think, can doubt that in Isaiah it includes that consummation of worldly affairs. The radical and essential idea in the prophet is, as it seems to me, that all the foes of God would be destroyed; that his people and cause would be firmly established, and would be delivered from all their foes; and that such would be the entire overthrow and punishment of the enemies of God; so condign their punishment, so deep their sufferings, so loathsome and hateful when visited with the Divine vengeance for their sins, that they would be an object of loathing and abhorrence. They would be swept off as unworthy to live with God, and they would be consigned to punishment—loathsome, like that of ever-gnawing worms on the carcases of the slain, and interminable and dreadful like ever-consuming and inextinguishable fires. This is the consummation of the series of bright visions that passed before the mind of Isaiah. This is an appropriate termination of this succession of wonderful revelations. Where could it more appropriately terminate than in the consummation of all things,—in the final triumph of the true religion, and in the complete and final destruction of all the enemies of God? The vision stretches on to the judgment, and is closed by a contemplation of those scenes which commence there, but which never end. The church is triumphant; its conflicts cease; its foes are slain; its Redeemer is revealed; and its everlasting happiness is founded on a basis which can never be shaken.

THE TEMPLE.

OF THE BOOK OF

THE PROPHET JEREMIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE prophecies of the Old Testament, as the epistles of the New, are placed rather according to their bulk than their seniority,—the longest first, not the oldest. There were divers prophets, and writing ones, that were contemporaries with Isaiah, as Micah; or a little before him, as Hosea, and Joel, and Amos; or soon after him, as Habakkuk and Nahum are supposed to be; and yet the prophecy of Jeremiah, who began many years after Isaiah finished, is placed next to his, because there is so much in it. Where we meet with most of God's word, there let the preference be given; and yet those of lesser gifts are not to be despised or excluded. Nothing now occurs to be observed farther concerning prophecy in general, but concerning this prophet Jeremiah we may observe, I. That he was betimes a prophet; he began young, and therefore could say from his own experience that it is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth, the yoke both of service and of affliction, Lam. iii. 27. Jerome observes, that Isaiah, who had more years over his head, had his tongue touched with a coal of fire, to purge away his iniquity, ch. vi. 7; but when God touched Jeremiah's mouth, who was yet but young, nothing was said of the purging of his iniquity, ch. i. 9, because, by reason of his tender years, he had not so much sin to answer for. II. That he continued long a prophet; some reckon fifty years, others above forty. He began in the thirteenth year of Josiah, when things went well under that good king; but he continued through all the wicked reigns that followed: for when we set out for the service of God, though the wind may then be fair and favourable, we know not how soon it may turn and be tempestuous. III. That he was a reproving prophet; was sent in God's name to tell Jacob of their sins, and to warn them of the judgments of God that were coming upon them. And the critics observe, that therefore his style and manner of speaking is more plain and rough, and less polite, than that of Isaiah and some other of the prophets. Those that are sent to discover sin ought to lay aside the enticing words of man's wisdom; plain dealing is best when we are dealing with sinners to bring them to repentance. IV. That he was a weeping prophet. So he is commonly called, not only because he penned the Lamentations, but because he was all along a mournful spectator of the sins of his people, and of the desolating judgments that were coming upon them; and for this reason, perhaps, those who imagined our Saviour to be one of the prophets thought him of any of them to be most like to Jeremiah, Mat. xvi. 14, because he was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. V. That he was a suffering prophet. He was persecuted by his own people more than any of them, as we shall find in the story of this book,—for he lived and preached just before the Jews' destruction by the Chaldeans, when their character seems to have been the same as it was just before their destruction by the Romans, when they killed the Lord Jesus, and persecuted his disciples, pleased not God, and were contrary to all men,—for wrath was come upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thes. ii. 15, 16. The last account we have of him in his history is, that the remaining Jews forced him to go down with them into Egypt, where, as the current tradition is among Jews and Christians, he suffered martyrdom. Hottinger, out of Elmakin, an Arabic historian, relates that, he continuing to prophesy in Egypt, against the Egyptians and other nations, he was stoned to death; and that long after, when Alexander entered Egypt, he took up the bones of Jeremiah, where they were buried in obscurity, and carried them to Alexandria, and buried them there. The prophecies of this book, which we have in the first nineteen chapters, seem to be the heads of the sermons he preached in a way of general reproof for sin, and denunciation of judgment; afterwards they are more particular and occasional, and mixed with the history of his day, but not placed in due order of time. With the threatenings many gracious promises are intermixed of mercy to the penitent, of the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity, and some that have a plain reference to the kingdom of the Messiah. Among the Apocryphal writings there is extant an epistle, said to be written by Jeremiah to the captives in Babylon, warning them against the worship of idols, by exposing the vanity of idols, and the folly of idolaters; it is in Baruch, ch. vi. But it is supposed not to be authentic; nor has it, methinks, any thing like the life and spirit of Jeremiah's writings. It is also related concerning Jeremiah, 2 Mac. ii. 4, that when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans, he, by direction from God, took the ark and the altar of incense, and carried them to mount Nebo, lodged them in a hollow cave there, and stopped the door; but some that followed him, and thought they had marked the place, could not find it: he blamed them for seeking it, telling them the place should be unknown till the time that God should gather his people together again. But I know not what credit is to be given to that story, though it is there said to be found in the records. We cannot but be concerned, in the reading of Jeremiah's prophecies, to find that they were so little regarded by the men of that generation; but let us make use of that as a reason why we should regard them the more, for they are written for our learning too, and for warning to us and to our land.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The general inscription or title of this book; with the time of the continuance of Jeremiah's public ministry, ver. 1—3. II. The call of Jeremiah to the prophetical office, his modest objection against it answered, and an ample commission given him for the execution of it, ver. 4—10. III. The visions of an almond-rod and a seething-pot, signifying the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, ver. 11—16. IV. Encouragement given to the prophet to go on undauntedly in his work, in an assurance of God's presence with him, ver. 17—19. Thus is he set to work by One that will be sure to bear him out.

THE words of Jeremiah the son of Hilkiah, of the priests that were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin: 2 To whom the word of the LORD came in the days of Josiah the son of Amon king of Judah, in the thirteenth year of his reign. 3 It came also in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, unto the end of the eleventh year of Zedekiah the son of Josiah king of Judah, unto the carrying away of Jerusalem captive in the fifth month.

We have here as much as it was thought fit we should know of the genealogy of this prophet, and the chronology of his prophecy.

First. We are told what family the prophet was of. He was the son of Hilkiah. It is supposed not that Hilkiah that was high priest in Josiah's time, for then he would have been called so, and not, as here, one "of the priests that were in Anathoth," but another of the same name. Jeremiah signifies 'one raised up by the Lord.' It is said of Christ, that he is a prophet whom the Lord our God raiseth up unto us, Deu. xviii. 15, 18. He was of the priests, and, as a priest, was authorized and appointed to teach the people; but to that authority and appointment God added the extraordinary commission of a prophet. Ezekiel also was a priest. Thus God would support the honour of the priesthood at a time when, by their sins and God's judgments upon them, it was sadly eclipsed. He was of the priests in Anathoth, a city of priests, which lay but three miles from Jerusalem. Abiathar had his country house there, 1 Kin. ii. 26.

Secondly. We have the general date of his prophecies, the knowledge of which is requisite to the understanding of them. 1. He began to prophesy in the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, ver. 2. Josiah, in the twelfth year of his reign, began a work of reformation; applied himself, with all sincerity, to purge Judah and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the images, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 3. And very seasonably then was this young prophet raised up to assist and encourage the young king in that good work. Then the word of the Lord came to him; not only a charge and commission to him to prophesy, but a revelation of the things themselves which he was to deliver. As it is an encouragement to ministers to be countenanced and protected by such pious magistrates as Josiah was, so it is a great help to magistrates, in any good work of reformation, to be advised and animated, and to have a great deal of their work done for them by such faithful, zealous, ministers as Jeremiah was. Now one would have expected when these two joined forces, such a prince and such a prophet, (as in a like case, Ezr. v. 1, 2,) and both young, such a complete reformation should have been brought about and settled, as would have prevented the ruin of the church and state; but it proved quite otherwise. In the eighteenth year of Josiah we find there were a great many of the relics of idolatry that were not purged out; for what can the best princes and prophets do to prevent the ruin of a people that hate to be reformed? And therefore, though it was a time of reformation, Jeremiah continued to foretell the destroying judgments that were coming upon them. For there is no symptom more threatening to any people than fruitless attempts of reformation. Josiah and Jeremiah would have healed them, but they would not be healed. 2. He continued to prophesy through the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, who each reigned eleven years. He prophesied to "the carrying away of Jerusalem captive," ver. 3, that great event which he had so often prophesied of. He continued to prophesy after that, ch. xl. 1, but the computation here is made to end with that, because it was the accomplishment of many of his predictions; and from the thirteenth of Josiah to the captivity was just forty years. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that as Moses was so long with the people a teacher in the wilderness, till they entered into their own land, Jeremiah was so long in their own land a teacher before they went into the wilderness of the heathen; and he thinks that therefore a special mark is set upon the last forty years of the iniquity of Judah, which Ezekiel bore forty days, a day for a year; because during all that time they had Jeremiah prophesying among them, which was a great aggravation of their impenitency. God, in this prophet, suffered their manners, their ill manners, forty years, and at length sware in his wrath that they should not continue in his rest.

4 Then the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
5 Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee;
And before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee,
And I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations.
6 Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD! behold, I cannot speak: for I am a child. 7 But the LORD said unto me, Say not, I am a child: for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak. 8 Be not afraid of their faces: for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the LORD. 9 Then the LORD put forth his hand, and touched my mouth. And the LORD said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth.
10 See, I have this day set thee over the nations
And over the kingdoms,
To root out, and to pull down,
And to destroy, and to throw down,
To build, and to plant.

Here is, First. Jeremiah's early designation to the work and office of a prophet, which God gives him notice of as a reason for his early application to that business, ver. 4, 5. The word of the Lord came to him with a satisfying assurance to himself that it was the word of the Lord, and not a delusion; and God told him, 1. That he had "ordained him a prophet to the nations," or against the nations. The nation of the Jews in the first place, who are therefore now reckoned among the nations, because they had learned their works, and mingled themselves with them in their idolatries, which otherwise they should not have been, Num. xxiii. 9. Yet he was given to be a prophet, not to the Jews only, but to the neighbour nations, to whom he was to send yokes, ch. xxvii. 3, and whom he must make to drink of the cup of the Lord's anger, ch. xxv. 17. He is still in his writings a prophet to the nations, (to our nation among the rest,) to tell them what the national judgments are which may be expected from national sins. It would be well for the nations, would they take Jeremiah for their prophet, and attend to the warnings he gives them. 2. That before he was born, even in his eternal counsel, he had designed him to be so. Let him know that he who gave him this commission is the same that gave him his being; that formed him in the belly, and brought him forth out of the womb, and therefore was his rightful owner, and might employ him and make use of him as he pleased; and that this commission was given him in pursuance of the purpose God had purposed in himself concerning him, before he was born: "I knew thee, and I sanctified thee;" that is, I determined that thou shouldest be a prophet, and set thee apart for the office. Thus St. Paul saith of himself, that God had separated him from his mother's womb, to be a Christian and an apostle, Gal. i. 15. Observe, 1st. The great Creator knows what use to make of every man before he makes him. He has made all for himself, and of the same lump of clay designs a vessel of honour or dishonour, as he pleaseth, Rom. ix. 21. 2nd. What God has designed men for he will call them to; for his purposes cannot be frustrated. Known unto God are all his own works beforehand, and his knowledge is infallible, and his purpose unchangeable. 3rd. There is a particular purpose and providence of God conversant about his prophets and ministers. They are by special counsel designed for their work; and what they are designed for they are fitted for. I that knew thee, sanctified thee. God destines them to it, and forms them for it, then when he first forms the spirit of man within him. Propheta nascitur, non fit,—'Original endowment, not education, makes a prophet.'

Secondly. His modest declining of this honourable employment, ver. 6. Though God had predestinated him to it, yet it was news to him, and a mighty surprise to hear that he should be "a prophet unto the nations." We know not what God intends us for, but he knows. One would have thought he should have catched at it as a piece of preferment, for so it was; but he objects against it, disables himself; "Ah, Lord God, behold I cannot speak" to great men and multitudes as prophets must. I cannot speak fine nor fluently, cannot word things well, as a message from God should be worded; I cannot speak with any authority, nor can expect to be heeded; for "I am a child," and my youth will be despised. Note, It becomes us, when we have any service to do for God, to be afraid lest we mismanage it, and lest it suffer through our weakness and unfitness for it. It becomes us likewise to have low thoughts of ourselves, and to be diffident of our own sufficiency. Those that are young should consider that they are so; should be afraid, as Elihu was, and not venture beyond their length.

Thirdly. The assurance God graciously gave him, that he would stand by him, and carry him on in his work.

1. Let him not object that he is a child, he shall be a prophet for all that; ver. 7, "Say not" any more "I am a child." It is true thou art; but, 1st. Thou hast God's precept, and let not that hinder thee from obeying it: go to all to whom I shall send thee, and speak whatsoever I command thee. Note, Though a sense of our own weakness and insufficiency should make us go humbly about our work, yet it should not make us draw back from it when God calls us to it. God was angry with Moses even for his modest excuses, Ex. iv. 14. 2nd. Thou hast God's presence, and let not thy being young discourage thee from depending upon it. Though thou art a child, thou shalt be enabled to go to all to whom I shall send thee, though they are never so great, and never so many. And whatsoever I command thee, thou shalt have judgment, memory, and language wherewith to speak it as it should be spoken. Samuel delivered a message from God to Eli when he was a little child. Note, God can when he pleaseth make children prophets, and ordain strength out of the mouth of babes and sucklings.

2. Let him not object that he shall meet with many enemies, and much opposition; God will be his protector, ver. 8; "Be not afraid of their faces." Though they look big, and so think to outface thee, and put thee out of countenance, yet be not afraid to speak to them, no, not to speak that to them which is most unpleasing; thou speakest in the name of the King of kings, and, by authority from him, and with that thou mayest face them down. Though they look angry, be not afraid of their displeasure, nor disturbed with apprehensions of the consequences of it. Those that have messages to deliver from God must not be afraid of the face of man, Eze. iii. 9. And thou hast cause to be both bold and easy, for I am with thee, not only to assist thee in thy work, but to deliver thee out of the hands of thy persecutors; and if God be for thee who can be against thee? If God do not deliver his ministers from trouble, it comes much to one, if he deliver them from sinking under their trouble. Mr. Gataker well observes here, that earthly princes are not wont to go along with their ambassadors, but God goes along with those whom he sends, and is, by his powerful protection, at all times and in all places present with them, and with this they ought to animate themselves, Acts xviii. 10.

3. Let him not object that he cannot speak as becomes him; God will enable him to speak. 1st. To speak intelligently, and as one that had acquaintance with God, ver. 9. He having now a vision of the Divine glory, "the Lord put forth his hand," and, by a sensible sign, conferred upon him so much of the gift of the tongue as was necessary for him. He touched his mouth, and with that touch opened his lips, that his mouth should shew forth God's praise; with that touch sweetly conveyed his words into his mouth, to be ready to him upon all occasions, so that he could never want words, who was thus furnished by him that made man's mouth. God not only put knowledge into his head, but words into his mouth; for there are words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. ii. 13. It is fit God's message should be delivered in his own words, that it may be delivered punctually; Eze. iii. 4, "Speak with my words;" and those that faithfully do so, shall not want instructions as the case requires. God will give them a mouth and wisdom in that same hour, Mat. x. 19. 2nd. To speak powerfully, and as one that had authority from God, ver. 10. It is a strange commission that is here given him: "See, I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms," which sounds very great, and yet Jeremiah is a poor, despicable priest still. He is not set over the kingdoms as a prince, to rule them by the sword, but as a prophet, by the power of the word of God. Those that would from hence prove the Pope's supremacy over kings, and his authority to depose them, and dispose of their kingdoms at his pleasure, must prove that he has the same extraordinary spirit of prophecy that Jeremiah had; else how can he have the power that Jeremiah had by virtue of that spirit? And yet the power that Jeremiah had, (who, notwithstanding his power, lived in meanness and contempt, and under oppression,) would not content those proud men. Jeremiah was set over the nations, the Jewish nation in the first place, and other nations (some great ones) besides, against whom he prophesied,—was set over them, not to demand tribute from them, or enrich himself with their spoils, but to root out, and pull down and destroy, and yet withal to build and plant. First. He must attempt to reform the nations, to root out, and pull down, and destroy idolatry and other wickednesses among them, to extirpate those vicious habits and customs which had long taken root, to throw down the kingdom of sin, that religion and virtue might be planted and built among them. And to the introducing and establishing of that which is good, it is necessary that that which is evil be removed. Secondly. He must tell them, that it would be well or ill with them, according as they were or were not reformed. He must set before them life and death, good and evil, according to God's declaration of the method he takes with kingdoms and nations, ch. xviii. 7—10. He must assure those who persisted in their wickedness, that they should be rooted out and destroyed, and those who repented, that they should be built and planted. He was authorized to read the doom of nations, and God would ratify and fulfil it, Isa. xliv. 26, would do it according to his word, and therefore is said to do it by his word. It is thus expressed, partly to shew how sure the word of prophecy is, it will as certainly be accomplished as if it were done already; and partly to put an honour upon the prophetical office, and make it look truly great, that others may not despise prophets, nor they disparage themselves. And yet more honourable doth the gospel ministry look, in that declarative power Christ gave his apostles to remit and retain sin, Jno. xx. 23; to bind and loose, Mat. xviii. 18.

11 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree. 12 Then said the LORD unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten my word to perform it. 13 And the word of the LORD came unto me the second time, saying, What seest thou? And I said, I see a seething pot; and the face thereof is toward the north. 14 Then the LORD said unto me,

Out of the north an evil shall break forth
Upon all the inhabitants of the land. [north,
15 For, lo, I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the
Saith the LORD;
And they shall come,
And they shall set every one his throne
At the entering of the gates of Jerusalem,
And against all the walls thereof round about,
And against all the cities of Judah.
16 And I will utter my judgments against them touching
all their wickedness,
Who have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto other gods,
And worshipped the works of their own hands.
17 Thou therefore gird up thy loins, and arise,
And speak unto them all that I command thee:
Be not dismayed at their faces,
Lest I confound thee before them.
18 For, behold, I have made thee this day a defenced city,
and an iron pillar,
And brasen walls against the whole land,
Against the kings of Judah, against the princes thereof, Against the priests thereof, and against the people of the land.
19 And they shall fight against thee;
But they shall not prevail against thee;
For I am with thee, saith the LORD, to deliver thee.

Here, First. God gives Jeremiah, in vision, a view of the principal errand he was to go upon, which was to foretell the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for their sins, especially their idolatry. This was at first represented to him in a way proper to make an impression upon him, that he might have it upon his heart in all his dealings with this people.

1. He intimates to him that the people were ripening apace for ruin, and ruin was hastening apace towards them. God having answered his objection, that he was a child, goes on to initiate him in the prophetical learning and language; and, having promised to enable him to speak intelligibly to the people, he here teaches him to understand what God saith to him; for prophets must have eyes in their heads as well as tongues, must be seers as well as speakers: he therefore asks him, "Jeremiah, what seest thou?" Look about thee, and observe now. And he was soon aware what was presented to him; "I see a rod," noting affliction and chastisement, a correcting rod hanging over us; and it is "a rod of an almond tree," which is one of the forwardest trees in the spring, is in the bud and blossom presently, when other trees are scarce broken out. It flourisheth, saith Pliny, in the month of January, and by March hath ripe fruits; hence it is called in the Hebrew, Shakedh, 'the hasty tree.' Whether this rod that Jeremiah saw had already budded, as some think, or whether it was stripped and dry, as others think, and yet Jeremiah knew it to be of an almond tree, as Aaron's rod was, is uncertain; but God explained it in the next words, ver. 12, "Thou hast well seen." God commended him that he was so observant, and so quick of apprehension, as to be aware, though it was the first vision he ever saw, that it was "a rod of an almond tree," that his mind was so composed as to be able to distinguish. Prophets have need of good eyes; and those that see well shall be commended, and not those only that speak well. Thou hast seen a hasty tree, that signifies that "I will hasten my word to perform it." Jeremiah shall prophesy that which he himself shall live to see accomplished. We have the explication of this, Eze. vii. 10, 11, "The rod hath blossomed, pride hath budded, violence is risen up into a rod of wickedness." The measure of Jerusalem's iniquity fills very fast; and, as if their destruction slumbered too long, they waken it, they hasten it, and I will hasten to perform what I have spoken against them.

2. He intimates to him whence the intended ruin should arise. Jeremiah is a second time asked, "What seest thou?" And he sees a seething pot upon the fire, ver. 13, representing Jerusalem and Judah in a mighty toss and commotion, like boiling water, by reason of the descent which the Chaldean army made upon them; made like a fiery oven, Ps. xxi. 9, all in a heat, wasting away as boiling water doth, and sensibly evaporating and growing less and less; ready to boil over, to be thrown out of their own city and land, as out of the pan into the fire, from bad to worse. Some think those scoffers referred to this who said, Eze. xi. 3, "This city is the caldron, and we be the flesh." Now the mouth or face of the furnace or hearth, over which this pot boiled, was towards the north, for thence the fire and fuel was to come that must make the pot boil thus. So the vision is explained, ver. 14, "Out of the north an evil shall break," or shall be opened. It had been long designed by the justice of God, and long deserved by the sin of the people, and yet hitherto the Divine patience had restrained it, and held it in as it were. The enemies had intended it, and God had checked them; but now all restraints shall be taken off, and the "evil shall break forth;" the direful scene shall open, and the enemy shall come in like a flood. It shall be an universal calamity; it shall come "upon all the inhabitants of the land," from the highest to the lowest, for they have all corrupted their way. Look for this storm to arise out of the north, whence fair weather used to come, Job xxxvii. 22. When there was friendship between Hezekiah and the king of Babylon, they promised themselves many advantages out of the north, but it proved quite otherwise, out of the north their trouble arose. Thence, sometimes, the fiercest tempests come, whence we expected fair weather. This is farther explained, ver. 15, where we may observe, 1st. The raising of the army that shall invade Judah, and lay it waste; "I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north, saith the Lord." All the northern crowns shall unite under Nebuchadnezzar, and join with him in this expedition. They lie dispersed, but God, that has all men's hearts in his hand, will bring them together; they lie at a distance from Judah, but God, that directs all men's steps, will call them, and they shall come, though they be never so far off. God's summons shall be obeyed; they whom he calls shall come. When he has work to do of any kind, he will find instruments to do it, though he send to the utmost parts of the earth for them. And, that the armies brought into the field may be sufficiently numerous and strong, he will call, not only the kingdoms of the north, but all the families of those kingdoms into the service; not one able-bodied man shall be left behind. 2nd. The advance of this army. The commanders of the troops of the several nations shall take their post in carrying on the siege of Jerusalem, and other the cities of Judah. "They shall set every one his throne," or seat. When a city is besieged, we say, the enemy sits down before it. They shall encamp, some at the entering of the gates, others against the walls round about, to cut off both the going out of the mouths and the coming in of the meat, and so to starve them.

3. He tells him plainly what was the procuring cause of all these judgments: it was the sin of Jerusalem, and of the cities of Judah, ver. 16. 'I will pass sentence upon them,' so it may be read, or, give judgment against them, this sentence, this judgment, because of all their wickedness; that is it that plucks up the flood-gates, and lets in this inundation of calamities. They have forsaken God, and revolted from their allegiance to him, and have burnt incense to other gods, new gods, strange gods, and all false gods, pretenders, usurpers, the creatures of their own fancy, and they have "worshipped the works of their own hands." Jeremiah was young, had looked but little abroad into the world, and perhaps did not know, nor could have believed, what abominable idolatries the children of his people were guilty of; but God tells him, that he might know what to level his reproofs against, and what to ground his threatenings upon, and that he might himself be satisfied in the equity of the sentence which in God's name he was to pass upon them.

Secondly. God excites and encourageth Jeremiah to apply himself with all diligence and seriousness to his business. A great trust is committed to him; he is sent in God's name as a herald at arms, to proclaim war against his rebellious subjects; for God is pleased to give warning of his judgments beforehand, that sinners may be awakened to meet him by repentance, and so turn away his wrath, and that if they do not they may be left inexcusable. With this trust Jeremiah has a charge given him, ver. 17, "Thou therefore gird up thy loins;" free thyself from all those things that would disfit thee for, or hinder thee in, this service; buckle to it with readiness and resolution, and be not entangled with doubts about it. He must be quick, Arise, and lose no time; he must be busy, "Arise, and speak unto them," in season, out of season; he must be bold, "Be not dismayed at their faces," as before, ver. 8. In a word, he must be faithful; it is required of ambassadors that they be so.

1. In two things he must be faithful: 1st. He must speak all that he is charged with; "Speak all that I command thee." He must forget nothing, as minute, or foreign, or not worth mentioning; every word of God is weighty. He must conceal nothing for fear of offending; he must alter nothing under pretence of making it more fashionable or more palatable, but without addition or diminution declare the whole counsel of God. 2nd. He must speak to all that he is charged against. He must not whisper it in a corner to a few particular friends, that will take it well, but he must appear "against the kings of Judah," if they be wicked kings, and bear his testimony against the sins even of "the princes thereof;" for the greatest of men are not exempt from the judgments, either of God's hand or of his mouth. Nay, he must not spare "the priests thereof;" though he himself was a priest, and was concerned to maintain the dignity of his order, yet he must not therefore flatter them in their sins. He must appear "against the people of the land," though they were his own people, as far as they were against the Lord.

2. And two reasons are here given why he should do thus: 1st. Because he had reason to fear the wrath of God, if he should be false; "Be not dismayed at their faces," so as to desert thine office, or balk the duty of it, "lest I confound" and dismay "thee before them," lest I give thee up to thy faintheartedness. Those that consult their own credit, ease, and safety, more than their work and duty, it is just with God to leave them to themselves, and to bring upon them the shame of their own cowardliness. Nay, lest I reckon with thee for thy faint-heartedness, and break thee to pieces, so some read it. Therefore, this prophet says, ch. xvii. 17, Lord, "be not a terror to me." Note, The fear of God is the best antidote against the fear of man. Let us always be afraid of offending God, who, after he has killed, has power to cast into hell, and then we shall be in little danger of fearing the faces of men, that can but kill the body, Lu. xii. 4, 5; see Neh. iv. 14. It is better to have all the men in the world our enemies than God our enemy. 2nd. Because he had no reason to fear the wrath of man, if he were faithful, for the God whom he served would protect him, and bear him out, so that they should neither sink his spirits nor drive him off from his work, should neither stop his mouth nor take away his life, till he had finished his testimony, ver. 18. This young stripling of a prophet is made, by the power of God, as an impregnable city, fortified with iron pillars, and surrounded with walls of brass; he sallies out upon them in reproofs and threatenings, and keeps them in awe. They set upon him on every side; the kings and princes batter him with their power, the priests thunder against him with their church censures, and the people of the land shoot their arrows at him, even slanderous and bitter words; but he shall keep his ground, and make his part good with them; he shall still be a curb upon them, ver. 19. "They shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail" to destroy thee, "for I am with thee to deliver thee" out of their hands; nor shall they prevail to defeat the word that God sends them by Jeremiah, nor to deliver themselves; it shall take hold of them, for God is against them to destroy them. Note, Those who are sure they have God with them, as he is if they be with him, they need not, they ought not, to be afraid, whoever is against them.

CHAPTER II.

It is probable this chapter was Jeremiah's first sermon that he preached after his ordination; and a most lively pathetical sermon it is, as any we have in all the books of the Prophets. Let him not say, I cannot speak, for I am child; for God having touched his mouth, and put his words into it, none can speak better. The scope of the chapter is to shew God's people their transgression, even the house of Jacob their sins; it is all by way of reproof and conviction, that they might be brought to repent of their sins, and so prevent the ruin that was coming upon them. The charge drawn up against them is very high, the aggravations black, the arguments used for their conviction very close and pressing, and the expostulations very pungent and affecting. The sin which they are most particularly charged with here is idolatry, forsaking the true God, their own God, for other false gods. Now they are told, I. That this was ungrateful to God, who had been so kind to them, ver. 1—8. II. That it was without precedent, that a nation should change their gods, ver. 9—13. III. That hereby they had disparaged and ruined themselves, ver. 14—19. IV. That they had broken their covenants, and degenerated from their good beginnings, ver. 20, 21. V. That their wickedness was too plain to be concealed, and too bad to be excused, ver. 22, 23, 35. VI. That they persisted wilfully and obstinately in it, and were irreclaimable and indefatigable in their idolatries, ver. 24, 25, 33, 36. VII. That they shamed themselves by their idolatry, and should shortly be made ashamed of it, when they should find their idols unable to help them, ver. 26—29, 37. VIII. That they had not been convinced and reformed by the rebukes of providence they had been under, ver. 30. IX. That they had put a great contempt upon God, ver. 31, 32. X. That with their idolatries they had mixed the most unnatural murders, shedding the blood of the poor innocents, ver. 34. And those hearts were hard indeed that were untouched and unhumbled when their sins were thus set in order before them. O that by meditating on this chapter we might be brought to repent of our spiritual idolatries; giving that place in our souls to the world and the flesh which should have been reserved for God only!

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came to me, saying,
2 Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying,
Thus saith the LORD; I remember thee,
The kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals,
When thou wentest after me in the wilderness,
In a land that was not sown.
3 Israel was holiness unto the LORD,
And the firstfruits of his increase:
All that devour him shall offend;
Evil shall come upon them, saith the LORD.
4 Hear ye the word of the LORD, O house of Jacob,
And all the families of the house of Israel:
5 Thus saith the LORD,
What iniquity have your fathers found in me,
That they are gone far from me,
And have walked after vanity, and are become vain?
6 Neither said they, Where is the LORD
That brought us up out of the land of Egypt,
That led us through the wilderness,
Through a land of deserts and of pits,
Through a land of drought, and of the shadow of death,
Through a land that no man passed through,
And where no man dwelt?
7 And I brought you into a plentiful country,
To eat the fruit thereof and the goodness thereof;
But when ye entered, ye defiled my land,
And made mine heritage an abomination.
8 The priests said not, Where is the LORD?
And they that handle the law knew me not:
The pastors also transgressed against me,
And the prophets prophesied by Baal,
And walked after things that do not profit.

Here is, First. A command given to Jeremiah to go and carry a message from God to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. He was charged in general, ch. i. 17, to go and speak to them; here he is particularly charged to go and speak this to them. Note, It is good for ministers, by faith and prayer, to take out a fresh commission, when they address themselves solemnly to any part of their work. Let a minister carefully compare what he has to deliver with the word of God, and see that it agrees with it; that he may be able to say not only, The Lord sent me, but, He sent me to speak this. He must go from Anathoth, where he lived in a pleasant retirement, spending his time, it is likely, in diversion and the study of the law, and must make his appearance at Jerusalem, that noisy, tumultuous city, and cry in their ears, as a man in earnest, and that would be heard. Cry aloud, that all may hear, and none may plead ignorance. Go close to them, and cry in the ears of those that have stopped their ears.

Secondly. The message he was commanded to deliver. He must upbraid them with their horrid ingratitude in forsaking a God who had been of old so kind to them, that this might either make them ashamed, and bring them to repentance, or might justify God in turning his hand against them.

1. God here puts them in mind of the favours he had of old bestowed upon them, when they were first formed into a people; ver. 2, "I remember" for thy sake, and would have thee to remember it, and improve the remembrance of it for thy good; I cannot forget "the kindness of thy youth," and "the love of thine espousals." This may be understood,

1st. Of the kindness they had for God. It was not such indeed as they had any reason to boast of, or to plead with God for favour to be shewn them, for many of them were very unkind and provoking; and when they did return and inquire early after God they did but flatter him. Yet God is pleased to mention it and plead it with them; for though it was but little love they shewed him he took it kindly. When they believed the Lord and his servant Moses, when they sang God's praise at the Red sea, when, at the foot of mount Sinai, they promised, "All that the Lord shall say unto us, we will do, and will be obedient," then was "the kindness of their youth," and "the love of their espousals." When they seemed so forward for God he said, "Surely they are my people," and will be faithful to me, "children that will not lie." Note, Those that begin well and promise fair, but do not perform and persevere, will justly be upbraided with their hopeful and promising beginnings. God remembers the kindness of our youth and love of our espousals, the zeal we then seemed to have for him, and the affection wherewith we made our covenants with him, the buds and blossoms that never came to perfection; and it is good for us to remember them, that we may remember whence we are fallen, and return to our first love, Rev. ii. 4, 5; Gal. iv. 15. In two things appeared the kindness of their youth: First. That they followed the conduct of the pillar of cloud and fire in the wilderness, and though sometimes they spoke of returning into Egypt or pushing forward into Canaan, yet they did neither, but for forty years together went after God in the wilderness, and trusted him to provide for them, though it was a land that was not sown. This God took kindly, and took notice of it to their praise long after, that, though much was amiss among them, yet they never forsook the conduct they were under. Thus, though Christ often chid his disciples, yet he commended them at parting for continuing with him, Lu. xxii. 28. It must be the strong affection of the youth and the espousals that will carry us on to follow God in a wilderness with an implicit faith and an entire resignation; and it is pity those that have so followed him should ever leave him. Secondly. That they entertained Divine institutions, set up the tabernacle among them, and attended the service of it. Israel was then holiness to the Lord; they joined themselves to him in covenant as a peculiar people. Thus they began in the spirit; and God puts them in mind of it, that for shame they might not end in the flesh. Or it may be understood,

2nd. Of God's kindness to them; and of that he afterwards speaks largely, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him," Hos. ii. 1. He then espoused that people to himself, with all the affection with which a young man marries a virgin, Isa. lxii. 5, for the time was a time of love, Eze. xvi. 8. First. God appropriated them to himself. Though they were a sinful people, yet, by virtue of the covenant made with them and the church set up among them, they were "holiness to the Lord," dedicated to his honour, and taken under his special tuition. They were the "firstfruits of his increase," the first constituted church he had in the world; they were the firstfruits, but the full harvest was to be gathered from among the Gentiles. The firstfruits of the increase were God's part of it, were offered to him, and he was honoured with them. So were the people of the Jews; what little tribute, rent, and homage God had from the world, he had it chiefly from them; and it was their honour to be thus set apart for God. This honour have all the saints; they are the firstfruits of his creatures, Jas. i. 18. Secondly. Having espoused them he espoused their cause, and became an enemy to their enemies, Ex. xxiii. 22. Being the firstfruits of his increase, all that devoured him (so it should be read) did offend, they trespassed, they contracted guilt, and evil befell them; as those were reckoned offenders that devoured the firstfruits, or anything else that was holy to the Lord, that embezzled them, or converted them to their own use, Lev. v. 15. Whoever offered any injury to the people of God, it was at their peril; their God was ready to avenge their quarrel, and said to the proudest of kings, "Touch not mine anointed," Ps. cv. 14, 15; Ex. xvii. 14. He had in a special manner a controversy with those that attempted to debauch them, and draw them off from being holiness to the Lord; witness his quarrel with the Midianites, about the matter of Peor, Num. xxv. 17, 18. Thirdly. He brought them out of Egypt with a high hand and great terror, Deu. iv. 34, and yet with a kind hand and great tenderness led them through a vast howling wilderness, ver. 6, "a land of deserts and of pits," or of graves; terram sepulchralem,—'a sepulchral land;' where there was ground, not to feed them, but to bury them; where there was no good to be expected, for it was "a land of drought," but all manner of evil to be feared, for it was "the shadow of death." In that darksome valley they walked forty years, but God was with them; his rod, in Moses' hand, and his staff comforted them, and even there God prepared a table for them, Ps. xxiii. 4, 5, gave them bread out of the clouds and drink out of the rocks. It was a land abandoned by all mankind, as yielding neither road nor rest; it was no thoroughfare, for no man passed through it; no settlement, for no man dwelt there; for God will teach his people to tread untrodden paths, to dwell alone, and to be singular. The difficulties of the journey are thus insisted upon, to magnify the power and goodness of God, in bringing them through all safe to their journey's end at last. All God's spiritual Israel must own their obligations to him for a safe conduct through the wilderness of this world no less dangerous to the soul than that was to the body. Fourthly. At length he settled them in Canaan; ver. 7, "I brought you into a plentiful country," which would be the more acceptable, after they had been for so many years in a land of drought. They did "eat the fruit thereof, and the goodness thereof," and were allowed so to do. 'I brought you into a land of Carmel,' so the word is. Carmel was a place of extraordinary fruitfulness; Canaan was as one great fruitful field, Deu. viii. 7. Fifthly. God gave them the means of knowledge, and grace, and communion with him. That is implied, ver. 8; they had priests that handled the law, read it, and expounded it to them; that was part of their business, Deu. xxxiii. 8. They had pastors to guide them and take care of their affairs, magistrates, and judges; they had prophets to consult God for them, and to make known his mind to them.

2. He upbraids them with their horrid ingratitude, and the ill returns they had made him for these favours; let them all come and answer to this charge, ver. 4. It is exhibited in the name of God against all the families of the house of Israel, for they can none of them plead not guilty.

1st. He challenges them to produce any instance of his being unjust and unkind to them. Though he had conferred favours upon them in some things, yet if in other things he had dealt hardly with them, they had not been altogether without excuse. He therefore puts it fairly to them, to shew cause for their deserting him, ver. 5, "What iniquity have your fathers found in me," or you either? Have you, upon trial, found God a hard master? Have his commands put any hardship upon you, or obliged you to any thing unfit, unfair, or unbecoming you? Have his promises put any cheats upon you, or raised your expectations of things, which you were afterwards disappointed of? You that renounce your covenant with God, can you say it was a hard bargain and that which you could not live upon? You that forsake the ordinances of God, can you say it was because they were a wearisome service, or work that there was nothing to be got by? No, what disappointments you have met with, it was long of yourselves, not long of God. The yoke of his commandments is easy, and in keeping of them there is great reward. Note, Those that forsake God cannot say that he has ever given them any provocation to do so. And for this we may safely appeal to the consciences of sinners; the slothful servant, that offered such a plea as this, had it overruled out of his own mouth, Lu. xix. 22. Though he afflicts us we cannot say there is iniquity in him; he doth us no wrong. The ways of the Lord are undoubtedly equal; all the iniquity is in our ways.

2nd. He chargeth them with being very unjust and unkind to him notwithstanding. First. They had quitted his service; They are gone from me; nay, they are gone far from me. They studied how to estrange themselves from God and their duty, and got as far as they could out of the reach of his commandments and their own convictions. Those that have deserted religion commonly set themselves at a greater distance from it, and in greater opposition to it, than those that never knew it. Secondly. They had quitted it for the service of idols, which was so much the greater reproach to God and his service. They went from him, not to mend themselves, but to cheat themselves; "They have walked after vanity," that is, idolatry, for an idol is a vain thing; it is nothing in the world, 1 Cor. viii. 4; Deu. xxxii. 21; ch. xiv. 22. Idolatrous worships are vanities, Acts xiv. 15; idolaters are vain, for they that make idols are like unto them, Ps. cxv. 8; as much stocks and stones as the images they worship, and good for as little. Thirdly. They had with idolatry introduced all manner of wickedness. When they entered into the good land which God gave them, they defiled it, ver. 7, by defiling themselves, and disfitting themselves for the service of God. It was God's land; they were but tenants to him, sojourners in it, Lev. xxv. 23. It was his heritage, for it was a holy land, Immanuel's land; but they made it an abomination, even to God himself, who was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel. Fourthly. Having forsaken God, though they soon found they had changed for the worse, yet they had no thoughts of returning to him again, nor took any steps towards it. Neither the people nor the priests made any inquiry after him, took no thought about their duty to him, nor expressed any desire to recover his favour. 1*st*. The people said not, "Where is the Lord?" ver. 6. Though they were trained up in observance of him as their God, and had been often told that he brought them out of the land of Egypt, to be a people peculiar to himself, yet they never asked after him, nor desired the knowledge of his ways. 2*nd*. "The priests said not, Where is the Lord?" ver. 8. They whose office it was to attend immediately upon him were in no concern to acquaint themselves with him, or approve themselves to him. They who should have instructed the people in the knowledge of God took no care to get the knowledge of him themselves. The scribes, that handled the law, did not know God nor his will; either could not expound the Scriptures at all or not aright. The pastors, that should have kept the flock from transgressing, were themselves ringleaders in transgression; They have transgressed against me. The pretenders to prophecy prophesied by Baal, in his name, to his honour, being backed and supported by the wicked kings to confront the Lord's prophets. Baal's prophets joined with Baal's priests, and walked after the things that do not profit, that is, after the idols which can be no way helpful to their worshippers. See how the best characters are usurped, and the best offices liable to corruption; and wonder not at the sin and ruin of a people when the blind are leaders of the blind.

9 Wherefore I will yet plead with you, saith the LORD,
And with your children's children will I plead.
10 For pass over the isles of Chittim, and see;
And send unto Kedar, and consider diligently,
And see if there be such a thing.
11 Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods?
But my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit.
12 Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this,
And be horribly afraid,
Be ye very desolate, saith the LORD.
13 For my people have committed two evils;
They have forsaken me the fountain of living waters,
And hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns,
That can hold no water.

The prophet, having shewed their base ingratitude in forsaking God, here shews their unparalleled fickleness and folly; ver. 9, "I will yet plead with you." Note, Before God punisheth sinners he pleads with them, to bring them to repentance. And when much hath been said of the evil of sin, yet still there is more to be said. When one article of the charge is made good, there is another to be urged; when we have said a great deal, still we "have yet to speak on God's behalf," Job xxxvi. 2. And those that deal with sinners for their conviction must urge a variety of arguments, and follow their blow. God had before pleaded with their fathers, and asked why they walked after vanity and became vain, ver. 5; now he pleads with them who persisted in that vain conversation received by tradition from their fathers, and with their children's children, that is, with all that in every age tread in their steps. Let those that forsake God know that he is willing to argue the case fairly with them, that he may be justified when he speaks; he pleads that with us which we should plead with ourselves.

First. He shews that they acted contrary to the usage of all nations. Their neighbours were more firm and faithful to their false gods than they were to the true God. They were ambitious of being like the nations, and yet in this they were unlike them; he challengeth them to produce an instance of any nation that had changed their gods, ver. 10, 11, or were apt to change them. Let them survey either the old records or the present state of the isles of Chittim, Greece, and the European islands, the countries that were more polite and learned; and of Kedar, that lay south-east, (as the other north-west from them,) which were more rude and barbarous; and they should not find an instance of a nation that had changed their gods, though they had never done them any kindness, nor could do, for they were no gods. Such a veneration had they for their gods, and so good an opinion of them, and such a respect for the choice their fathers had made, that though they were gods of wood and stone they would not change them for gods of silver and gold,—no, not for the living and true God. Shall we praise them for this? we praise them not. But it may well be urged to the reproach of Israel that they, who were the only people that had no cause to change their God, were yet the only people that had changed him. Note, Men are hardly brought off that religion which they have been brought up in, though never so absurd and grossly false. The zeal and constancy of idolaters should shame Christians out of their coldness and inconstancy.

Secondly. He shews that they acted contrary to the dictates of common sense, in that they not only changed,—it may sometimes be our duty and wisdom to do so,—but they changed for the worse, and made an ill bargain for themselves. 1. They parted from a God that was their glory, that made them truly glorious, and every way put honour upon them; one whom they might with an humble confidence glory in as theirs, who is himself a glorious God, and the glory of those whose God he is. He was particularly the glory of his people Israel, for his glory had often appeared on their tabernacle. 2. They closed with gods that could do them no good, gods that do not profit their worshippers. Idolaters change God's glory into shame, Rom. i. 23, and so they do their own. In dishonouring him they disgrace and disparage themselves, and are enemies to their own interest. Note, Whatever they turn to that forsake God it will never do them any good; it will flatter them and please them, but it cannot profit them, Heaven itself is here called upon to stand amazed at the sin and folly of these apostates from God; ver. 12, 13, "Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this." The earth is so universally corrupt that it will take no notice of it, but let the heavens and heavenly bodies be astonished at it. Let the sun blush to see such ingratitude, and be afraid to shine upon such ungrateful wretches. They that forsook God worshipped the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; but these, instead of being pleased with the adorations that were paid to them, were astonished and horribly afraid, and would rather have been very desolate, utterly exhausted, (as the word is,) and deprived of their light, than that it should have given occasion to any to worship them. Some refer it to the angels of heaven. If they rejoice at the return of souls to God we may suppose they are astonished and horribly afraid at the revolt of souls from him. The meaning is, that the carriage of this people towards God was such as, 1st. We may well admire and wonder at, that ever men that pretend to reason should do a thing so very absurd. 2nd. Such as we ought to have a holy indignation at, as impious, and a high affront to our Maker, whose honour every good man is jealous for. 3rd. Such as we may tremble to think of the consequences of; what will be in the end hereof? Be horribly afraid to think of that wrath and curse which will be the portion of those that thus throw themselves out of God's grace and favour. Now what is it that is to be thought of with all this horror? It is this: My people, whom I have taught and should have ruled, have committed two great evils, ingratitude and folly; they have acted contrary both to their duty and to their interest. First. They have affronted their God by turning their back upon him, as if he were not worthy their notice; "They have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters," in whom they have an abundant and constant supply of all that comfort and relief they stand in need of, and they have it freely; God is their fountain of life, Ps. xxxvi. 9. There is in him an all-sufficiency of grace and strength; all our springs are in him, and our streams from him; to forsake him is in effect to deny this. He has been to us a bountiful benefactor, "a fountain of living waters," overflowing, everflowing in the gifts of his favour; to forsake him is to refuse to acknowledge his kindness, and to withhold that tribute of love and praise which his kindness calls for. Secondly. They have cheated themselves; they forsook their own mercies, but it was for lying vanities. They took a great deal of pains to hew them out cisterns, to dig pits or pools in the earth or rock, which they would carry water to, or which should receive the rain; but they proved broken cisterns, false at the bottom, so that they could hold no water. When they came to quench their thirst there, they found nothing but mud and mire, and the filthy sediments of a standing lake. Such idols were to their worshippers; and such a change did they experience who turned from God to them. If we make an idol of any creature, wealth, or pleasure, or honour, if we place our happiness in it, and promise ourselves that comfort and satisfaction in it which is to be had in God only,—if we make it our joy and love, our hope and confidence,—we shall find it a cistern, which we take a great deal of pains to hew out and fill, and at the best it will hold but a little water, and that dead and flat, and soon corrupting, and become nauseous. Nay, it is a broken cistern, that cracks and cleaves in hot weather, so that the water is gone when we have most need of it, Job vi. 15. Let us therefore, with purpose of heart, cleave to the Lord only; for whither else shall we go? He hath the words of eternal life.

14 Is Israel a servant? is he a homeborn slave?
Why is he spoiled?
15 The young lions roared upon him, and yelled,
And they made his land waste:
His cities are burned without inhabitant.
16 Also the children of Noph and Tahapanes have broken the crown of thy head.
17 Hast thou not procured this unto thyself,
In that thou hast forsaken the LORD thy God,
When he led thee by the way?
18 And now what hast thou to do in the way of Egypt,
To drink the waters of Sihor?
Or what hast thou to do in the way of Assyria,
To drink the waters of the river?
19 Thine own wickedness shall correct thee,
And thy backslidings shall reprove thee:
Know therefore and see
That it is an evil thing and bitter,
That thou hast forsaken the LORD thy God, [hosts.
And that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord GOD of

The prophet, farther to evince the folly of their forsaking God, shews them what mischiefs they had already brought upon themselves by it; it had already cost them dear, for to this was owing all the calamities their country was now groaning under; which were but an earnest of more and greater, if they repented not. See how they smarted for their folly!

First. Their neighbours, that were their professed enemies, prevailed against them; and that was long of their sin.

1. They were enslaved, and lost their liberty; ver. 14, "Is Israel a servant?" No; "Israel is my son, my firstborn," Ex. iv. 22. They are children, they are heirs; nay, their extraction is noble, they are the seed of Abraham, God's friend, and of Jacob his chosen. "Is he a home-born slave?" No, he is not the son of the bondwoman, but of the free. Every thing in their constitution carried on it the marks of freedom and honour. "Why then is he spoiled" of his liberty? Why is he used as a servant, as a home-born slave? Why doth he make himself a slave to his lusts, to his idols, to that which doth not profit? ver. 11. What a thing is this, that such a birthright should be sold for a mess of pottage? Such a crown profaned, and laid in the dust? Why is he made a slave to the oppressor? God provided that a Hebrew servant should be free the seventh year, and that their slaves should be of the heathen, not of their brethren, Lev. xxv. 44, 46. But, notwithstanding this, the princes made slaves of their subjects, and masters of their servants, ch. xxxiv. 11, and so made their country mean and miserable, which God had made happy and honourable. The neighbouring princes and powers broke in upon them, and made some of them slaves even in their own country, and perhaps sold others for slaves into foreign countries. And how came they thus to lose their liberties? Why, for their iniquities they sold themselves, Isa. l. 1. We may apply this spiritually: Is the soul of man a servant? Is it a home-born slave? No, it is not. Why then is it spoiled? It is because it has sold its own liberty, and enslaved itself to divers lusts and passions, which is a lamentation, and should be for a lamentation.

2. They were impoverished, and had lost their wealth. God brought them into a plentiful country, ver. 7, but all their neighbours made a prey of it; ver. 15, Young lions roar alond over him, and yell; they are a continual terror to him; sometimes one potent enemy, and sometimes another, and sometimes many in confederacy, fall upon him, and triumph over him. They carry off the fruits of his land, and make that waste; burn his cities, when first they have plundered them; so that they remain without inhabitant, either because there are no houses to dwell in or because those that should dwell in them are carried into captivity.

3. They were abused and insulted over, and beaten by every body; ver. 16, even "the children of Noph and Tahapanes," despicable people, not famed for military courage or strength, "have broken the crown of thy head," or fed upon it. In all their struggles with thee they have been too hard for thee, and thou hast always come off with a broken head. The principal part of thy country, that which lay next Jerusalem, has been, and is, a prey to them. How calamitous the condition of Judah had been of late in the reign of Manasseh, we find, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11; and perhaps it had not now much recovered itself.

4. All this was owing to their sin; ver. 17, "Hast thou not procured this unto thyself?" By their sinful confederacies with the nations, and especially their conformity to them in their idolatrous customs and usages, they had made themselves very mean and contemptible; as all those do that have made a profession of religion and afterwards throw it off. Nothing now appeared of that which, by their constitution, made them both honourable and formidable; and therefore nobody either respected them, or feared them. But this was not all; they had provoked God to give them up into the hands of their enemies, and to make them a scourge to them, and give them success against them. And thus "thou hast procured it to thyself, in that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God," revolted from thine allegiance to him, and so thrown thyself out of his protection; for protection and allegiance go together. Whatever trouble we are in at any time we may thank ourselves for it, for we bring it upon our own head by our forsaking God: 'Thou hast forsaken thy God at the time that he was leading thee by the way;' so it should be read. Then when he was leading thee on to a happy peace and settlement, and thou wast within a step of it; then thou forsookest him, and so didst put a bar in thine own door.

Secondly. Their neighbours, that were their pretended friends, deceived them, distressed them, and helped them not; and this also was owing to their sin.

1. They did in vain seek to Egypt and Assyria for help; ver. 18, "What hast thou to do in the way of Egypt?" When thou art under apprehensions of danger, thou art running to Egypt for help, Isa. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1. Thou art for drinking the waters of Sihor, that is, Nilus. Thou reliest upon their multitude, and refreshest thyself with the fair promises they make thee. At other times thou art in the way of Assyria, sending or going with all speed to fetch recruits from thence, and thinkest to satisfy thyself with the waters of the river Euphrates. But what hast thou to do there? What wilt thou get by applying thyself to them? They shall help in vain, shall be broken reeds to thee; and what thou thoughtest would be to thee as a river will be but a broken cistern.

2. This also was because of their sin. The judgment shall unavoidably come upon them which their sin has deserved; and then to what purpose is it to call for help against it? ver. 19, "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee," and then it is impossible for them to save thee. "Know and see" therefore, upon the whole matter, "that it is an evil thing that thou hast forsaken God," for that is it that makes thine enemies enemies indeed, and thy friends friends in vain. Observe here, 1st. The nature of sin. It is forsaking the Lord as our God; it is the soul's alienation from him, and aversion to him. Cleaving to sin is leaving God. 2nd. The cause of sin. It is because his fear is not in us. It is for want of a good principle in us, particularly for want of the fear of God, that is at the bottom of our apostacy from him. Therefore men forsake their duty to God, because they stand in no awe of him, nor have any dread of his displeasure. 3rd. The malignity of sin. "It is an evil thing, and bitter." Sin is an evil thing, an only evil; an evil that has no good in it; an evil that is the root and cause of all other evil. It is an evil indeed, for it is not only the greatest contrariety to the Divine nature, but the greatest corruption of the human nature. It is bitter. A state of sin is the gall of bitterness; and every sinful way will be bitterness in the latter end. The wages of it is death, and death is bitter. 4th. The fatal consequences of sin. As it is in itself evil and bitter, so it has a direct tendency to make us miserable. "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee;" not only destroy and ruin thee hereafter, but correct and reprove thee now; that is, it will certainly bring trouble upon thee. The punishment will so inevitably follow the sin, that the sin shall itself be said to punish thee. Nay, the punishment, in the kind and circumstances of it, shall so directly answer the sin, that thou mayest read the sin in the punishment; and the justice of the punishment shall be so plain, that thou shalt not have a word to say for thyself; thy own wickedness shall convince thee, and stop thy mouth for ever, and thou shalt be forced to own that the Lord is righteous. 5th. The use and application of all this. "Know, therefore, and see" it, and repent of thy sin, that so the iniquity, that is thy correction, may not be thy ruin.

20 For of old time I have broken thy yoke,
And burst thy bands; and thou saidst, I will not transgress;
When upon every high hill
And under every green tree
Thou wanderest, playing the harlot.
21 Yet I had planted thee a noble vine,
Wholly a right seed:
How then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me?
22 For though thou wash thee with nitre,
And take thee much sope,
Yet thine iniquity is marked before me,
Saith the Lord GOD.
23 How canst thou say, I am not polluted,
I have not gone after Baalim?
See thy way in the valley,
Know what thou hast done:
Thou art a swift dromedary traversing her ways;
24 A wild ass used to the wilderness,
That snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure;
In her occasion who can turn her away?
All they that seek her will not weary themselves;
In her month they shall find her.
25 Withhold thy foot from being unshod,
And thy throat from thirst:
But thou saidst,
There is no hope:
No; for I have loved strangers,
And after them will I go.
26 As the thief is ashamed when he is found,
So is the house of Israel ashamed;
They, their kings, their princes,
And their priests, and their prophets,
27 Saying to a stock, Thou art my father;
And to a stone, Thou hast brought me forth: [face:
For they have turned their back unto me, and not their
But in the time of their trouble they will say, Arise, and save us
28 But where are thy gods that thou hast made thee?
Let them arise, if they can save thee in the time of thy [trouble:
For according to the number of thy cities
Are thy gods, O Judah.

In these verses the prophet goes on with his charge against this backsliding people. Observe here,

First. The sin itself that he charges them with, and that is idolatry, that great provocation which they were so notoriously guilty of. 1. They frequented the places of idol worship; ver. 20, "upon every high hill, and under every green tree;" in the high places and the groves, such as the heathen had a foolish fondness and veneration for. Thou wanderest first to one, and then to another, like one unsettled, and still uneasy and unsatisfied; but in all playing the harlot, worshipping false gods, which is spiritual whoredom, and was commonly accompanied with corporal whoredom too. Note, They that leave God wander endlessly, and a vagrant lust is insatiable. 2. They made images for themselves, and gave Divine honour to them, ver. 26, 27. Not only the common people, but even the kings and princes, that should have restrained the people from doing ill, and the priests and prophets, that should have taught them to do well, were themselves so wretchedly sottish and stupid, and under the power of such a strong delusion, as to say to a stock, "Thou art my father," that is, thou art my god, the author of my being, to whom I owe duty, and on whom I have a dependence; saying to a stone, to an idol made of stone, "Thou hast begotten me," or "brought me forth," therefore protect me, provide for me, and bring me up. What greater affront could men put upon God, who is our Father that has made us? It was a downright disowning of their obligations to him. What greater affront could men put upon themselves and their own reason, to acknowledge that which is in itself absurd and impossible; and, by making stocks and stones their parents, to make themselves no better than stocks and stones? When these were first made the objects of worship, they were supposed to be animated by some celestial power or spirit; but by degrees the thought of this was lost, and so vain did idolaters become in their imagination, even the princes and priests themselves, that the very idol, though made of wood and stone, was supposed to be their father, and adored accordingly. 3. They multiplied their dunghill deities endlessly; ver. 28, "According to the number of thy cities are thy gods, O Judah." When they had forsaken that God, who is one, and all-sufficient for all, 1st. They were not satisfied with any gods they had, but still desired more. That idolatry being in this respect of the same nature with covetousness, which is spiritual idolatry, that the more men have the more they would have; which is a plain evidence that what men make an idol of, they find to be insufficient and unsatisfying, and that it cannot make the comers thereunto perfect. 2nd. They could not agree in the same god. Having left the centre of unity, they fell into endless discord; one city fancied one deity, and another another, and each was fond to have one of its own, to be near them, and to take special care of them. Thus did they in vain seek that in many gods which is to be found in one God only.

Secondly. The proof of this upon them. No witnesses need be called, it is proved by the notorious evidence of the facts.

1. They went about to deny it, and were ready to plead not guilty. They pretended they would acquit themselves from this guilt, washed themselves with nitre, and took much soap; offered many things in excuse and extenuation of it, ver. 22. They pretended they did not worship these as gods, but as demons, and mediators between the immortal God and mortal men; or that it was not Divine honour that they gave them, but civil respect; thus they sought to evade the convictions of God's word, and to screen themselves from the dread of his wrath. Nay, some of them had the impudence to deny the thing itself; they said, "I am not polluted, I have not gone after Baalim," ver. 23. Because it was done secretly, and industriously concealed, Eze. viii. 12, they thought it could never be proved upon them, and they had front enough to deny it. In this, as in other things, their way was like that of the adulterous woman, that saith, "I have done no wickedness," Pr. xxx. 20.

2. Notwithstanding all their evasions, they are convicted of it, and found guilty. How canst thou deny the fact, and say, "I have not gone after Baalim?" How canst thou deny the fault, and say, "I am not polluted?" The prophet speaks with wonder at their impudence. How canst thou put on a face to say so, when it is certain: 1st. God's omniscience is a witness against thee? "Thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God." It is laid up, and hidden, to be produced against thee in the day of judgment; sealed up among his treasures, Deu. xxxii. 34; Job xxi. 9; Hos. xiii. 12. It is imprinted deep, and stained before me, so some read it. Though thou endeavour to wash it out, as murderers to get the stain of the blood of the person slain out of their clothes, yet it will never be got out; God's eye is upon it, and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth. 2nd. Thine own conscience is a witness against thee. "See thy way in the valley." They had worshipped idols not only on the high hills, but in the valleys, Isa. lvii. 5, 6. In the valley over against Beth-peor, so some, where they worshipped Baal-peor, Deu. xxiv. 6; Num. xxv. 3; as if the prophet looked as far back as the iniquity of Peor. But if it mean any particular valley, surely it is the valley of the son of Hinnom; for that was the place where they sacrificed their children to Moloch, and which therefore witnessed against them more than any other. Look into that valley, and thou canst not but know what thou hast done.

Thirdly. The aggravations of this sin with which they are charged, which speak it exceeding sinful.

1. God had done great things for them, and yet they revolted from him, and rebelled against him; ver. 20, "Of old time I have broken thy yoke, and burst thy bonds." This refers to the bringing of them out of the land of Egypt and the house of bondage, which they would not remember, ch. ii. 6, but God did; for when he told them they should have no other gods before him, he prefixed this as a reason, "I am the Lord thy God, that brought thee out of the land of Egypt;" and these bonds of theirs, which God had loosed, should have bound them for ever to him; but they had ungratefully broken the bonds of duty to that God who had broken the bonds of their slavery.

2. They had promised fair, but had not made good their promise; "Thou saidst, I will not transgress." Then, when the mercy of thy deliverance was fresh, thou wast so sensible of it that thou wast willing to lay thyself under the most sacred ties to continue faithful to thy God, and never to forsake him. Then they said, "Nay, but we will serve the Lord," Jos. xxiv. 21. How often have we said we would not transgress, we would not offend any more, and yet we have started aside like a deceitful bow, and repeated and multiplied our transgressions.

3. They had wretchedly degenerated from what they were when God first formed them into a people; ver. 21, "I had planted thee a noble vine." The constitution of their government, both in church and state, was excellent, their laws righteous, and all the ordinances instructive and very significant; and a generation of good men there was amongst them when they first settled in Canaan; "Israel served the Lord," and kept close to him, "all the days of Joshua, and the elders that outlived Joshua," Jos. xxiv. 31; they were then wholly a right seed, likely to replenish the vineyard they were planted in with choice vines. But it proved otherwise; the very next generation "knew not the Lord, nor the works which he had done," Jud. ii. 10; and so they were worse and worse, till they became "the degenerate plants of a strange vine." They were now the reverse of what they were at first; their constitution was quite broken, and there was nothing in them of that good which one might have expected from a people so happily formed; nothing of the purity and piety of their ancestors. "Their vine is as the vine of Sodom," Deu. xxxii. 32. This may fitly be applied to the nature of man; it was planted by its great Author a noble vine, a right seed. God made man upright; but it is so universally corrupt, that it is become "the degenerate plant of a strange vine," that bears gall and wormwood; and it is so to God, it is highly distasteful and offensive to him.

4. They were violent and eager in the pursuit of their idolatries, doated on their idols, and were fond of new ones; and they would not be restrained from them either by the word of God or by his providences, so strong was the impetus with which they were carried out after this sin. They are here compared to "a swift dromedary traversing her ways;" a female of that species of creature hunting about for a male, ver. 23; and to the same purpose, "a wild ass used to the wilderness," ver. 24, not tamed by labour, and therefore very wanton; "snuffing up the wind at her pleasure," when she comes near the he ass, and on such an "occasion who can turn her away?" who can hinder her from that which she lusteth after? "They that seek her then will not weary themselves for her," for they know it is to no purpose; but will have a little patience until she is big with young, until that month comes which is the last of the months which she fulfils, Job xxxix. 2; when she is heavy and unwieldy, and then they shall find her, and she cannot outrun them. Note, 1st. Eager lust is a brutish thing, and those that will not be turned away from the gratifying and indulging of it by reason, and conscience, and honour, are to be reckoned as brute beasts, and no better; such as were born, and still are, like the wild ass's colt. Let them not be looked upon as rational creatures. 2nd. Idolatry is strangely intoxicating, and those that are addicted to it will very hardly be cured of it. That lust is as headstrong as any other. 3rd. There are some so violently set upon the prosecution of their lusts, that it is to no purpose to attempt to give check to them. They that do it weary themselves in vain. "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone." 4th. The time will come when the most fierce will be tamed, and the most wanton will be manageable; when distress and anguish comes upon them, then their ears will be open to discipline; that is the month in which you may find them, Ps. cxli. 5, 6.

5. They were obstinate in their sin, and, as they could not be restrained, so they would not be reformed, ver. 25. Here is, 1st. Fair warning given them of the ruin that this wicked course of life would certainly bring them to at last, with a caution therefore not to persist in it, but to break off from it. He would certainly bring them into a miserable captivity when their feet should be unshod, and they should be forced to travel barefoot; and when they would be denied fair water by their oppressors, so that their throat should be dried up with thirst; this will be in the end hereof. They that affect strange gods, and strange ways of worship, will justly be made prisoners to a strange king in a strange land. Take up in time therefore; thy running after thy idols will run the shoes off thy feet, and thy panting after them will bring thy throat to thirst; and therefore withhold thy foot from these violent pursuits, and thy throat from these violent desires. One would think it should effectually check us in the career, to consider what it will bring us to at last. 2nd. Their rejecting this fair warning. They said to those that would have persuaded them to repent and reform, "There is no hope;" no, never expect to work upon us, or prevail with us to cast away our idols, for "we have loved strangers, and after them we will go;" we are resolved we will, and therefore trouble not yourselves or us any more with your admonitions; it is to no purpose. There is no hope that we should ever break this corrupt habit and disposition we have got, and therefore we had as good yield to it as go about to get the mastery of it. Note, Their case is very miserable who have brought themselves to such a pass that their corruptions triumph over their convictions; they know they should reform, but own they cannot, and therefore resolve they will not. But, as we must not despair of the mercy of God, but believe that sufficient for the pardon of our sins, though never so heinous, if we repent and sue for that mercy; so neither must we despair of the grace of God, but believe that able to subdue our corruption, though never so strong, if we pray for and improve that grace. A man must never say there is no hope as long as he is on this side hell.

6. They had shamed themselves by their sin, in putting confidence in that which would certainly deceive them in the day of their distress, and putting him away that would have helped them; ver. 26—28, "As the thief is ashamed when," notwithstanding all his arts and tricks to conceal his theft, "he is found," and brought to punishment, "so is the house of Israel ashamed," not with a penitent shame for the sin they had been guilty of, but with a penal shame for the disappointment they met with in that sin. They will be ashamed when they find,

1st. That they are forced to cry to the God whom they had put contempt upon. In their prosperity they had turned the back to God, and not the face; they had slighted him; took on them they had forgotten him, or did what they could to forget him; would not look towards him, but looked another way. They went from him as fast and as far as they could; but in the time of their trouble they will find no satisfaction but in applying themselves to him; then they will say, "Arise, and save us." Their fathers had many a time taken this shame to themselves, Jud. iii. 9; iv. 3; x. 10, yet they would not be persuaded to cleave to God, that they might have come to him in their trouble with the more confidence.

2nd. That they have no relief from the gods they have made their court to. They will be ashamed when they perceive that the gods they have made cannot serve them, and the God that made them will not serve them. To bring them to this shame, if so be they might hereby be brought to repentance, they are here sent to the gods whom they served, as Jud. x. 14. They cried to God, "Arise, and save us." God saith of the idols, "Let them arise and save thee," for thou hast no reason to expect that I should. Let them arise if they can from the places where they are fixed; let them try whether they can save thee. But thou wilt be ashamed when thou findest that they can do thee no good; for though thou hadst a god for every city, yet thy cities are burnt without inhabitant, ver. 15. Thus it is the folly of sinners to please themselves with that which will certainly be their grief, and pride themselves in that which will certainly be their shame.

29 Wherefore will ye plead with me?
Ye all have transgressed against me, saith the LORD.
30 In vain have I smitten your children;
They received no correction:
Your own sword hath devoured your prophets,
Like a destroying lion.
31 O generation, see ye the word of the LORD.
Have I been a wilderness unto Israel?
A land of darkness?
Wherefore say my people,
We are lords;
We will come no more unto thee?
32 Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?
Yet my people have forgotten me days without number.
33 Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love?
Therefore hast thou also taught the wicked ones thy ways.
34 Also in thy skirts is found the blood
Of the souls of the poor innocents:
I have not found it by secret search, but upon all these.
35 Yet thou sayest,
Because I am innocent,
Surely his anger shall turn from me.
Behold, I will plead with thee,
Because thou sayest, I have not sinned.
36 Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?
Thou also shalt be ashamed of Egypt,
As thou wast ashamed of Assyria.
37 Yea, thou shalt go forth from him,
And thine hands upon thine head:
For the LORD hath rejected thy confidences,
And thou shalt not prosper in them.

The prophet here goes on in the same strain, aiming to bring a sinful people to repentance, that their destruction might be prevented.

First. He avers the truth of the charge. It was evident beyond contradiction, it was the greatest absurdity imaginable in them to think of denying it; ver. 29, "Wherefore will ye plead with me," and put me upon the proof of it? Or wherefore will ye go about to plead any thing in excuse of the crime, or to obtain a mitigation of the sentence? Your plea will certainly be overruled, and judgment given against you. You know you have all transgressed, one as well as another; why then do you quarrel with me for contending with you?

Secondly. He aggravates it, from the consideration both of their incorrigibleness and of their ingratitude.

1. They had not been wrought upon by the judgments of God which they had been under; ver. 30, "In vain have I smitten your children;" that is, the children, or people, of Judah. They had been under Divine rebukes of many kinds. God therein designed to bring them to repentance, but it was in vain; they did not answer God's end in afflicting them. Their consciences were not awakened, nor their hearts softened and humbled, nor were they driven to seek unto God; they received no instruction by the correction, were not made the better by it. And it is a great loss thus to lose an affliction. They did not receive, that is, they did not submit to, or comply with, the correction; but their hearts fretted against the Lord, and so they were smitten in vain. Even the children, the young people among them, (so it may be taken,) were smitten in vain; they were so soon prejudiced against repentance, that they were as untractable as the old ones, that had been long accustomed to do evil.

2. They had not been wrought upon by the word of God which he had sent them in the mouth of his servants the prophets; nay, they had killed the messengers for the sake of the message. "Your own sword hath devoured your prophets, like a destroying lion;" you have put them to death for their faithfulness with as much rage and fury, and with as much greediness and pleasure, as a lion devours his prey. Their prophets, who were their greatest blessings, were treated by them as if they had been the plagues of their generation; and this was their measure-filling sin, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16. They killed their own prophets, 1 Thes. ii. 15.

3. They had not been wrought upon by the favours God had bestowed upon them; ver. 31, "O generation." He doth not call them, as he might, "O faithless and perverse generation, O generation of vipers;" but speaks them fair; O ye men of this generation, "see the word of the Lord;" do not only hear it, but consider it diligently; apply your minds closely to it. As we are bid to hear the rod, Mic. vi. 9, for that has its voice, so we are bid to see the word, for that has its visions, its views. It intimates that what is here said is plain and undeniable. You may see it very evident; it is written as with a sunbeam, so that he that runs may read it; "Have I been a wilderness to Israel, a land of darkness?" Note, Those that have had any dealings with God never had reason to complain of him as a wilderness, or a land of darkness. He has blessed us with the fruits of the earth, and therefore we cannot say that he hath been a wilderness to us, a dry and barren land; that (as Mr. Gataker expresses it,) he hath held us to hard meat, as cattle fed upon the common. No, his sheep have been led into green pastures. He has also blessed us with the lights of heaven, and has not withheld them; so that we cannot say he hath been to us a land of darkness. He hath caused his sun to shine, as well as his rain to fall, upon the evil and unthankful. Or, the meaning is in general, that the service of God hath not been to any either an unpleasant or an unprofitable service. God sometimes hath led his people through a wilderness, and a land of darkness; but he himself was then to them all that which they needed. He so fed them with manna, and led them by a pillar of fire, that it was to them a fruitful field and a land of light. The world is to those who make it their home and portion, a wilderness, and a land of darkness, vanity, and vexation of spirit; but those that dwell in God have their lines fallen to them in pleasant places.

4. Instead of being wrought upon by these, they were grown intolerably insolent and imperious. They say, "We are lords, we will come no more unto thee." Now they were become a potent kingdom, or thought themselves such they set up for themselves, and shook off their dependence upon God. This is the language of presumptuous sinners; and it is not only very impious and profane, but very unreasonable and foolish. 1st. It is absurd for us, that are subjects, to say, "We are lords;" that is, rulers, and we will come no more to God to receive commands from him; for, as he is King of old, so he is King for ever, and we can never pretend to be from under his authority. 2nd. It is absurd for us, that are beggars, to say, "We are lords," that is, we are rich; and we will come no more to God, to receive favours from him, as if we could live without him, and need not be beholden to him. God justly takes it ill of those to whom he has been a bountiful benefactor, and yet they care not either for hearing from him, or speaking to him.

Thirdly. He lays the blame of all their wickedness upon their forgetting God; ver. 22, "They have forgotten me;" they have industriously banished the thoughts of God out of their minds, jostled those thoughts out with thoughts of their idols, and avoided all those things that would put them in mind of God. 1. Though they were his own people, in covenant with him, and professing relation to him, and had the tokens of his presence in the midst of them, and his favour to them; yet they forgot him. 2nd. They had long neglected him, days without number, time out of mind, as we say. They had not for a great while entertained any serious thoughts of him, so that they seem quite to have forgotten him, and resolved never to remember him again. How many days of our lives have passed without suitable remembrance of God? Who can number those empty days? 3. They had not had such a regard and affection to him as young ladies generally have to their fine clothes. "Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?" No, their hearts are upon them; they value them so much, and themselves by them, that they are ever and anon thinking and speaking of them. When they are to appear in public, they do not forget any of their ornaments, but put every one in its place, as they are described, Isa. iii. 18. And yet "my people have forgotten me." It is sad that any should be more in love with their fine clothes than with their God, and should rather leave their religion behind them, or part with that, than leave any of their ornaments behind them, or part with them. Is not God our ornament? Is he not a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty to his people? Did we look upon him to be so, and upon our religion as an ornament of grace to our head, and chains about our neck, Pr. i. 9, we should be as mindful of them as ever any maid was of her ornaments, or a bride of her attire; should be as careful to preserve them, and as fond to appear in them.

Fourthly. He shews them what an ill influence their sins had upon others. The sins of God's professing people harden and encourage those about them in their evil ways, especially when they appear forward and ringleaders in sin; ver. 33, "Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love?" alluding to the practice of lewd women, that strive to recommend themselves by their ogling looks and garish dress, as Jezebel, that painted her face, and tired her head. Thus had they courted their neighbours into sinful confederacies with them, and communion in their idolatries; and had taught the wicked ones their ways, their ways of mixing God's institutions with their idolatrous customs and usages, which was a great profanation of that which was sacred, and made the ways of their idolatry worse than that of others. Those have a great deal to answer for, that, by their fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, make wicked ones more wicked than otherwise they would be.

Fifthly. He chargeth them with the guilt of murder, added to the guilt of their idolatry; ver. 34, "Also in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls;" that is, the life-blood of the poor innocents, which cried to heaven, and for which God was now making inquisition. Either the children that were offered in sacrifice to Moloch; or, it may be taken more generally, for all the innocent blood which Manasseh shed, and with which he had filled Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxi. 16: the righteous blood, especially the blood of prophets and others that witnessed against their impieties. This blood was found, "not by secret search," not 'by digging,' so the word is, "but upon all these;" it was above ground. This intimates that the guilt of this kind they had contracted was certain and evident, not doubtful, or which would bear a dispute; and that it was avowed and barefaced, and which they had not so much sense either of shame or fear as to endeavour to conceal, which was a great aggravation of it.

Sixthly. He overrules their plea of not guilty. Though this matter be so plain, yet thou sayest, "Because I am innocent, surely his anger shall turn from me;" and again, "Thou sayest, I have not sinned," ver. 35; therefore "I will plead with thee," and will convince thee of thy mistake. Because they deny the charge, and stand upon their own justification, therefore God will join issue with them and plead with them, both by his word and by his rod. Those shall be made to know how much they deceive themselves, 1. That say they have not offended God, that they are innocent, though they have been guilty of the grossest enormities. 2. That expect God will be reconciled to them though they do not repent and reform. They own they had been under the tokens of God's anger, but they think it was causeless; and that they, by pleading innocency, had proved it to be so; and therefore conclude God will immediately let fall his action, and his anger shall be turned from them. This is very provoking; and God will plead with them, and convince them that his anger is just, for they have sinned, and he will never cease his controversy till they, instead of justifying themselves thus, humble, and judge, and condemn themselves.

Seventhly. He upbraids them with the shameful disappointments they met with in making creatures their confidence, while they made God their enemy, ver. 36, 37. It was a piece of spiritual idolatry they were often guilty of, that they trusted in an arm of flesh, and their hearts therein departed from the Lord; now here he shews them the folly of it. 1. They were restless and unsatisfied in the choice of their confidences. "Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?" Doubtless it is because thou meetest not with that in those thou didst confide in which thou promisedst thyself. Those that make God their hope, and walk in a continual dependence upon him, need not gad about to change their way; for their souls may return to him, and repose in him as their rest. But they that trust in creatures will be perpetually uneasy, like Noah's dove, that found no rest for the sole of her foot. Every thing they trust to fails them, and then they think to change for the better, but will be still disappointed. They first trusted to Assyria, and, when that proved a broken reed, they depended upon Egypt, and that proved no better. Creatures being vanity, they will be vexation of spirit to all those that put their confidence in them; they gad about, seeking rest and finding none. 3. They were quite disappointed in the confidences they made choice of; so the prophet tells them they should be. "Thou shalt be ashamed of Egypt," which thou now trustest in, "as" formerly "thou wast of Assyria," who distressed them, and helped them not, 2 Chr. xxviii. 20. The Jews were a peculiar people in their profession of religion, and for that reason none of the neighbour nations cared for them, or could heartily love them; and yet they were still courting them, and confiding in them, and were well enough served when they deceived them. See what will come of it; ver. 37, "Thou shalt go forth from him," thine ambassadors, or envoys, shall return from Egypt 'disappointed,'—re infecta; and therefore, "with their hands upon their heads," condoling the desperate condition of their people. Or, "Thou shalt go forth from hence," namely, into captivity in a strange land, "with thine hands upon thine head," holding it because it aches, (ubi dolor ibi digitus,—'where the pain is, the finger will be applied,') or as a people ashamed; for Tamar, in the height of her confusion, laid her hand on her head, 2 Sam. xiii. 19. And Egypt, that thou reliedst on, shall not be able to prevent it, or to rescue thee out of captivity. They that will not lay their hand on their heart in godly sorrow, which worketh life, shall be made to lay their hand on their head in the sorrow of the world, which worketh death. And no wonder that Egypt cannot help them, when God will not. If the Lord do not help thee, whence should I? The Egyptians are broken reeds, for "the Lord hath rejected thy confidences;" he will not make use of them for thy relief; will neither so far honour them nor so far give countenance to thy confidence in them as to appoint them to be the instruments of any good to thee, and therefore "thou shalt not prosper in them;" they shall not stand thee in any stead, nor give thee any satisfcation. As there is no counsel or wisdom that can prevail against the Lord, so there is none that can prevail without him. Some read it, 'The Lord hath rejected thee for thy confidences,' because thou hast dealt so unfaithfully with him as to trust in his creatures, nay, in his enemies, when thou shouldest have trusted in him only; he has abandoned thee to that destruction from which thou thoughtest thus to have sheltered thyself: and then thou canst not prosper, for none ever either hardened himself against God or estranged himself from God, and prospered.

CHAPTER III.

The foregoing chapter was wholly taken up with reproofs and threatenings against the people of God for their apostacies from him; but in this chapter gracious invitations and encouragements are given them to return and repent, notwithstanding the multitude and greatness of their provocations, which are here aggravated, to magnify the mercy of God, and to shew, that as sin abounded grace did much more abound. Here, I. It is farther shewed how bad they had been, and how well they had deserved to be quite abandoned, and yet how ready God was to receive them into his favour upon their repentance, ver. 1—5. II. The impenitency of Judah, and their persisting in sin, is aggravated from the judgments of God upon Israel, which they should have taken warning by, ver. 6—11. III. Great encouragements are given to these backsliders to return and repent; and promises made of great mercy which God had in store for them, and which he should prepare them for by bringing them home to himself, ver. 12—19. IV. The charge renewed against them for their apostacy from God, and the invitation repeated to return and repent, to which are here added the words that are put in their mouth which they should make use of in their return to God, ver. 20—25.

THEY say, If a man put away his wife,
And she go from him, and become another man's,
Shall he return unto her again?
Shall not that land be greatly polluted?
But thou hast played the harlot with many lovers;
Yet return again to me, saith the LORD.

2 Lift up thine eyes unto the high places,
And see where thou hast not been lien with.
In the ways hast thou sat for them,
As the Arabian in the wilderness;
And thou hast polluted the land
With thy whoredoms and with thy wickedness.

3 Therefore the showers have been withholden,
And there hath been no latter rain;
And thou hadst a whore's forehead,
Thou refusedst to be ashamed.

4 Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me,
My father, thou art the guide of my youth?

5 Will he reserve his anger for ever?
Will he keep it to the end?
Behold, thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldest.

These verses some make to belong to the sermon in the foregoing chapter, and they open a door of hope to those who receive the conviction of the reproofs we had there; God wounds that he may heal. Now observe here,

First. How basely this people had forsaken God, and gone a whoring from him. The charge runs very high here. 1. They had multiplied their idols, and their idolatries. To have admitted one strange god among them had been bad enough, but they were insatiable in their lustings after false worships; "Thou hast played the harlot with many lovers," ver. 1. She was become a common prostitute to idols; not a foolish deity was set up in all the neighbourhood, but the Jews would have it presently. Where was a high place in the country, but they had had an idol in it? ver. 2. Note, In repentance it is good to make sorrowful reflections upon the particular acts of sin we have been guilty of, and the several places and companies where it has been committed, that we may give glory to God, and take shame to ourselves, by a particular confession of it. 2. They had sought opportunity for their idolatries, and had sent about to inquire for new gods. "In the highways hast thou sat for them," as Tamar, when she put on the disguise of a harlot, Gen. xxxviii. 14; and as the foolish woman, that sits to call passengers, who go right on their way, Pr. ix. 14, 15. "As the Arabian in the wilderness." The Arabian huckster, so some, that courts customers, or waits for the merchants, to get a good bargain, or forestall the market. Or, the Arabian thief, so others, that watches for his prey; so had they waited either to court new gods to come among them, the newer the better, and the more fond they were of them; or to court others to join with them in their idolatries. They were not only sinners, but Satans; not only traitors themselves, but tempters to others. 3. They were grown very impudent in sin. They not only polluted themselves, but their land, with their whoredoms, and with their wickedness, ver. 2; for it was universal and unpunished, and so became a national sin. And yet, ver. 3, "Thou hadst a whore's forehead," a brazen face of thy own; "Thou refusedest to be ashamed;" thou didst enough to shame thee for ever, and yet wouldest not take shame to thyself. Blushing is the colour of virtue, or at least a relic of it; but those that are past shame, we say, are past hope. Those that have an adulterous heart, if they indulge that, will come at length to have a whore's forehead, void of all shame and modesty. 4. They abounded in all manner of sin. They polluted the land not only with their whoredoms, that is, their idolatries, but with their wickedness, or malice, ver. 2. Sins against the second table; for how can we think those should be true to their neighbour that are false to their God? Nay, ver. 5, "Thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldest;" and wouldest have spoken and done worse, if thou hadst known how; thy will was to do it, but thou lackedst opportunity. Note, Those are wicked indeed that sin to the utmost of their power; that never refuse to comply with a temptation because they should not, but because they cannot.

Secondly. How gently God had corrected them for their sins. Instead of raining fire and brimstone upon them, because like Sodom they had avowed their sin, and had gone after strange gods, as Sodom after strange flesh, he only withheld the showers from them, and that only one part of the year. "There has been no latter rain;" which might serve as an intimation to them of their continual dependence upon God; when they had the former rain, that was no security to them for the latter, but they must still look up to God. But it had not this effect.

Thirdly. How justly God might have abandoned them utterly, and refused ever to receive them again, though they should return. This would have been but according to the known rule of divorces; ver. 1, "They say," that is, it is an adjudged case, nay, it is a case in which the law is very express, and it is what every body knows and speaks of, Deu. xxiv. 4, that if a woman be once put away for whoredom, and be joined to another man, her first husband shall never, upon any pretence whatsoever, take her again to be his wife; such playing fast and loose with the marriage-bond would be a horrid profanation of that ordinance, and would greatly pollute that land. Observe, What the law saith in this case. "They say." Every one will say, and subscribe to the equity of the law in it; for every man finds something in himself that forbids him to entertain one that is another man's. And, in like manner, they had reason to expect, that God should refuse ever to take them to be his people again who had not only been joined to one strange god, but had played the harlot with many lovers. If we had to do with a man like ourselves, after such provocations as we have been guilty of, he would have been implacable, and we might have despaired of his being reconciled to us.

Fourthly. How graciously he not only invites them, but directs them to return to him.

1. He encourageth them to hope that they shall find favour with him upon their repentance. Though thou hast been bad, yet "return again to me," ver. 1; which implies a promise that he will receive them: return, and thou shalt be welcome. God has not tied himself by the laws which he made to us, nor has he the peevish resentments that men have. He will be more kind to Israel, for the sake of his covenant with them, than ever any injured husband was to an adulterous wife; for in receiving penitents, as much as in any thing, he is God and not man.

2. He therefore kindly expects they will repent, and return to him, and directs them what to say to him; ver. 4, "Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me?" Wilt not thou, who hast been in such relation to me, and on whom I have laid such obligations, "wilt not thou cry to me?" Though thou hast gone a whoring from me, yet when thou findest the folly of it sure thou wilt think of returning to me; now at least, now at last in this thy day. "Wilt thou not at this time," nay, wilt thou not from this time and forward "cry unto me?" Whatever thou hast said or done hitherto, wilt thou not from this time apply thyself to me? from this time of conviction and correction; now thou hast been made to see thy sins, ver. 2, and to smart for them, ver. 3, wilt thou not now forsake them, and return to me, saying, "I will go and return to my first husband, for then it was better with me than now?" Hos. ii. 7. Or, from this time that thou hast had so kind an invitation to return, and assurance that thou shalt be well received, will not this grace of God overcome thee? Now pardon is proclaimed wilt thou not come in and take the benefit of it? Sure thou wilt.

1st. He expects they will claim relation to God, as theirs. "Wilt thou not cry unto me, My Father, thou art the guide of my youth?" First. They will surely come towards him as a father, to beg his pardon for their undutiful carriage to him, ("Father, I have sinned,") and will hope to find in him the tender compassions of a father towards a returning prodigal. They will come to him as a father, to whom they will make their complaints, and in whom they will put their confidence for relief and succour. They will now own him as their father, and themselves fatherless without him; and therefore hoping to find mercy with him, as those penitents, Hos. xiv. 3. Secondly. They will come to him as the guide of their youth; that is, as their husband, for so that relation is described, Mal. ii. 14. Though thou hast gone after many lovers, surely thou wilt at length remember the love of thine espousals, and return to the husband of thy youth. Or, it may be taken more generally; as, "My Father, thou art the guide of my youth." Youth needs a guide. In our return to God we must thankfully remember that he was the guide of our youth, in the way of comfort; and we must faithfully covenant that he shall be our guide from henceforward in the way of duty; and that we will follow his guidance, and give up ourselves entirely to his conduct; that in all doubtful cases we will be determined by our religion.

2nd. He expects they will appeal to the mercy of God, and crave the benefit of that mercy, ver. 5, that they will reason thus with themselves, for their encouragement to return to him: "Will he reserve his anger for ever?" Sure he will not; for he hath proclaimed his name gracious and merciful. Repenting sinners may encourage themselves with this, that though God chide, he will not always chide; though he be angry, he will not keep his anger to the end; but, "though he cause grief, he will have compassion;" and may thus plead for reconciliation. Some understand this as describing their hypocrisy, and the impudence of that. Though thou hast a whore's forehead, ver. 3, and art still doing evil as thou canst, ver. 5, yet art thou not ever and anon crying to me, My Father? Even when they were most addicted to idols they pretended a regard to God and his service, and kept up the forms of godliness and devotion. It is a shameful thing for men thus to call God Father, and yet do the works of the devil, as the Jews, Jno. viii. 44; to call him the guide of their youth, and yet give up themselves to walk after the flesh; and to flatter themselves with expectations that his anger shall have an end, while they are continually treasuring up unto themselves wrath against the day of wrath.

6 The LORD said also unto me in the days of Josiah the king, Hast thou seen that which backsliding Israel hath done? she is gone up upon every high mountain and under every green tree, and there hath played the harlot. 7 And I said after she had done all these things, Turn thou unto me. But she returned not. And her treacherous sister Judah saw it. 8 And I saw, when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery I had put her away, and given her a bill of divorce; yet her treacherous sister Judah feared not, but went and played the harlot also. 9 And it came to pass through the lightness of her whoredom, that she defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and with stocks. 10 And yet for all this her treacherous sister Judah hath not turned unto me with her whole heart, but feignedly, saith the LORD. 11 And the LORD said unto me, The backsliding Israel hath justified herself more than treacherous Judah.

The date of this sermon must be observed, in order to the right understanding of it. It was "in the days of Josiah," who set on foot a blessed work of reformation; in which he was hearty, but the people were not sincere in their compliance with it. To reprove them for that, and warn them of the consequences of their hypocrisy, is the scope of that which God here said to the prophet, and which he delivered to them. The case of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah is here compared; the ten tribes that revolted from the throne of David and the temple at Jerusalem, and the two tribes that adhered to both. The distinct history of those two kingdoms we have in the two books of the Kings; and here we have an abstract of both, as far as relates to this matter.

First. Here is a short account of Israel, the ten tribes. Perhaps the prophet had been just reading the history of that kingdom when God came to him, and said, "Hast thou seen what backsliding Israel has done?" ver. 9. For he could not see it otherwise than in history, they having been carried into captivity long before he was born. But what we read in the histories of Scripture should instruct us and affect us as if we ourselves had been eyewitnesses of it. She is called backsliding Israel, because that kingdom was first founded in an apostacy from the Divine institutions, both in church and state. Now he had seen concerning them,

1. That they were wretchedly addicted to idolatry. They had "played the harlot upon every high mountain, and under every green tree," ver. 6; that is, they had worshipped other gods in their high places and groves; and no marvel, when from the first they had worshipped God by the images of the golden calves at Dan and Bethel. The way of idolatry is downhill. They that are in love with images, and will have them, soon become in love with other gods, and will have them too. For how should they stick at the breach of the first commandment who make no conscience of the second?

2. That God, by his prophets, had invited and encouraged them to repent and reform; ver. 7, "After she had done all these things," (for which she might justly have been abandoned) "yet I said unto her, Turn thou unto me," and I will receive thee. Though they had forsaken both the house of David and the house of Aaron, who both had their authority jure divino,—'from God,' without dispute, yet God sent his prophets among them, to call them to return to him, to the worship of him only; not insisting so much as one would have expected upon their return to the house of David as that of Aaron. We read not that Elijah, that great reformer, ever mentioned that; but, return to the faithful service of the true God, according as they had it among them. It is serious piety that God stands upon more than even his own rituals.

3. That notwithstanding this they had persisted in their idolatries. "But she returned not," and God saw it. He took notice of it, and was much displeased with it, ver. 7, 8. Note, God keeps account, whether we do or no, how often he has called to us to turn to him, and we have refused.

4. That he had therefore cast them off, and given them up into the hands of their enemies; ver. 8, 'When I saw it' (so it may be read) 'that for all the actions wherein she had committed adultery, I must dismiss her, I gave her a bill of divorce.' God divorced them when he threw them out of his protection, and left them an easy prey to any that would lay hands on them; when he scattered all their synagogues and schools of the prophets, and excluded them from laying any farther claim to the covenant made with their fathers. Note, Those will justly be divorced from God that join themselves to such as are rivals with him. For proof of this, go and see what God did to Israel

Secondly. Let us now see what was the case of Judah, the kingdom of the two tribes. She is called, treacherous sister Judah; a sister, because descended from the same common stock, Abraham and Jacob. But as Israel had the character of a backslider, so Judah is called treacherous, because, though she professed to keep close to God, when Israel was backslidden, (she adhered to the kings and priests that were of God's own appointing, and did not withdraw from her allegiance, so that it was expected she should deal faithfully,) yet she proved treacherous, and false, and unfaithful to her professions and promises. Note, The treachery of those who pretend to cleave to God will be reckoned for, as well as the apostacy of those that openly revolt from him. Judah saw what Israel did, and what came of it, and should have taken warning. Israel's captivity was intended for Judah's admonition, but it had not the designed effect. Judah feared not, but thought herself safe, because she had Levites to be her priests, and sons of David to be her kings. Note, It is an argument of great stupidity and security, when we are not awakened to a holy fear by the judgments of God upon others. It is here charged on Judah,

1. That when they had a wicked king that debauched them, they heartily concurred with him in his debaucheries. Judah was forward enough to play the harlot, to worship any idol that was introduced among them, and to join in any idolatrous usage, so that "through the lightness" (or, as some read it, the vileness and baseness) "of her whoredom," or (as the margin reads it) by the fame and report of her whoredom, that is, her notorious whoredom, for which she was become infamous, "she defiled the land," and made it an abomination to God; for she "committed adultery with stones and stocks," that is, with the most scoundrel idols, those made of wood and stone. In the reigns of Manasseh and Amon, when they were disposed to idolatry, the people were so too; and all the country was corrupted with it, and none feared the ruin which Israel by this means had brought upon themselves.

2. That when they had a good king that reformed them, they did not heartily concur with him in the reformation. And that was the present case. God tried whether they would be good in a good reign, but the evil disposition was still the same. They "returned not to me with their whole heart, but feignedly," ver. 10. Josiah went farther in destroying idolatry than the best of his predecessors had done; and, for his own part, he "turned to the Lord with all his heart and with all his soul," so it is said of him, 2 Kin. xxiii. 25. The people were forced to an external compliance with him, and joined with him in keeping a very solemn passover, and in renewing their covenants with God, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 32; xxxv. 17. But they were not sincere in it, nor were their hearts right with God; for which reason God at that very time said, "I will remove Judah out of my sight, as I removed Israel," 2 Kin. xxiii. 27, because Judah was not removed from their sin by the sight of Israel's removal from their land. Hypocritical reformations, and ineffectual ones, bode ill to a people. We deceive ourselves if we think to deceive God by a feigned return to him. I know no religion without sincerity.

Thirdly. The case of these sister kingdoms is compared, and judgment given upon the comparison, that of the two Judah was the worse; ver. 11, "Israel hath justified herself more than Judah," that is, is not so bad as Judah is. This comparative justification will stand Israel in little stead. What will it avail us to say, we are not so bad as others, when yet we are not really good ourselves? But it will serve as an aggravation of the sin of Judah, which was in two respects worse than that of Israel: 1. That more was expected from Judah than from Israel, so that Judah dealt treacherously; they vilified a more sacred profession, and falsified a more solemn promise than Israel did. 2. That Judah might have taken warning by the ruin of Israel for their idolatry, and would not. God's judgments upon others, if they be not the means of our reformation, will help to aggravate our destruction. The prophet Ezekiel, ch. xxiii. 11, makes the same comparison between Jerusalem and Samaria that this prophet here makes between Judah and Israel; nay, and between Jerusalem and Sodom, and Jerusalem is made the worst of the three, Eze. xvi. 48.

12 Go and proclaim these words toward the north, and say,
Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the LORD;
And I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you:
For I am merciful, saith the LORD,
And I will not keep anger for ever.
13 Only acknowledge thine iniquity,
That thou hast transgressed against the LORD thy God,
And hast scattered thy ways to the strangers
Under every green tree,
And ye have not obeyed my voice, saith the LORD.
14 Turn, O backsliding children, saith the LORD;
For I am married unto you:
And I will take you one of a city, and two of a family,
And I will bring you to Zion:
15 And I will give you pastors according to mine heart,
Which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding.
16 And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and increased in the land,
In those days, saith the LORD, [LORD:
They shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Neither shall it come to mind:
Neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit it;
Neither shall that be done any more. [LORD;
17 At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the
And all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the LORD, to Jerusalem:
Neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart.
18 In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel,
And they shall come together out of the land of the north
To the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers.
19 But I said, How shall I put thee among the children,
And give thee a pleasant land,
A goodly heritage of the hosts of nations?
And I said, Thou shalt call me, My father;
And shalt not turn away from me.

Here is a great deal of Gospel in these verses, both that which was always Gospel, God's readiness to pardon sin, and to receive and entertain returning, repenting sinners; and those blessings which were in a special manner reserved for gospel times, the forming and founding of the gospel church, by the bringing of the children of God into it that were scattered abroad; the superseding of the ceremonial law, and the uniting of Jews and Gentiles, typified by the uniting of Israel and Judah in their return out of captivity. The prophet is directed to "proclaim these words towards the north," for they are a call to backsliding Israel, the ten tribes that were carried captive into Assyria, which lay north from Jerusalem. That way he must look, to shew that God had not forgotten them, though their brethren had; and to upbraid the men of Judah with their obstinacy, and refusing to answer the calls given them. As good call to them who lay many hundred miles off in the land of the north; they will as soon hear as these unbelieving and disobedient people. Backsliding Israel will sooner accept of mercy, and have the benefit of it, than treacherous Judah. And perhaps the proclaiming of these words towards the north looks as far forward as the preaching of repentance and remission of sins unto all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, Lu. xxiv. 47. A call to Israel in the land of the north is a call to others in that land, even as many as belong to the election of grace. When it was suspected that Christ would go to the dispersed Jews among the Gentiles, it was concluded he would teach the Gentiles, Jno. vii. 35; so here,

First. Here is an invitation given to backsliding Israel, and in them to the backsliding Gentiles, to return unto God, the God from whom they had revolted; ver. 12, "Return, thou backsliding Israel." And again, ver. 14, "Turn, O backsliding children," repent of your backslidings, return to your allegiance; come back to that good way which you have missed, and out of which you have turned aside. Pursuant to this invitation, 1. They are encouraged to return; "Repent, and be converted, and your sins shall be blotted out," Acts iii. 19. You have incurred God's displeasure, but return to me, and "I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you." God's anger is ready to fall upon sinners, as a lion falls on his prey, and there is none to deliver; as a mountain of lead falling on them, to sink them past recovery into the lowest hell. But if they repent, it shall be turned away; Isa. xii. 1, "I will not keep mine anger for ever," but will be reconciled, "for I am merciful." We that are sinful were for ever undone if God were not merciful; but the goodness of his nature encourageth us to hope that, if we by repentance undo what we have done against him, he will by a pardon unsay what he has said against us. 2. They are directed how to return; ver. 13, "Only acknowledge thine iniquity;" own thyself in a fault, and thereby take shame to thyself, and give glory to God. "I will not keep my anger for ever;" that is a previous promise. You shall be delivered from that anger of God which is everlasting, from the wrath to come. But upon what terms? Very easy and reasonable ones; "Only acknowledge thy sins." "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive them." This will aggravate the condemnation of sinners, that the terms of pardon and peace were brought so low, and yet they would not come up to them. "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing wouldest thou not have done it? How much more when he saith," "Only acknowledge thine iniquity," 2 Kin. v. 13. In confessing sin, 1st. We must own the corruption of our nature; "acknowledge thine iniquity," the perverseness and irregularity of thy nature. 2nd. We must own our actual sins; "that thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God," hast affronted him, and offended him. 3rd. We must own the multitude of our transgressions, that "thou hast scattered thy ways to the strangers;" run hither and thither in pursuit of thine idols, "under every green tree." Wherever thou hast rambled, thou hast left behind thee the marks of thy folly. 4th. We must aggravate our sin from the disobedience that there is in it to the Divine law. The sinfulness of sin is the worst thing in it. "Ye have not obeyed my voice;" acknowledge that, and let that humble you more than any thing else.

Secondly. Here are precious promises made to these backsliding children, if they do return, which were in part fulfilled in the return of the Jews out of their captivity; many that belonged to the ten tribes having perhaps joined themselves to those of the two tribes, in the prospect of their deliverance and returning with them. But it is to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, and the gathering together of the children of God, that were scattered abroad, to that; "Return," for though you are backsliders, yet you are children; nay, though a treacherous wife, yet a wife; "for I am married to you," ver. 14, and will not disown the relation. Thus God remembers his covenant with their fathers, that marriage covenant; and, in consideration of that, he remembers their land, Lev. xxvi. 42.

1. He promises to gather them together from all places whither they are dispersed and scattered abroad, Jno. xi. 52. "I will take you one of a city, and two of a family," or clan, "and I will bring you to Zion." All those that by repentance return to their duty shall return to their former comfort. Observe, 1st. God will graciously receive those that return to him; nay, it is he that by his distinguishing grace takes them out from among the rest that persist in their backslidings; and if he had left them they had been undone. 2nd. Of the many that have backslidden from God there are but few, very few in comparison, that return to him, like the gleanings of the vintage, one of a city, and two of a country. Christ's flock is a little flock; and few there be that find the strait gate. 3rd. Of those few, though dispersed, yet not one shall be lost. Though there be but one in a city, God will find out that one; he shall not be overlooked in a crowd, but shall be brought safe to Zion, safe to heaven. The scattered Jews shall be brought to Jerusalem, and those of the ten tribes shall be as welcome there as those of the two. God's chosen, scattered all the world over, shall be brought to the gospel church, that mount Zion, that heavenly Jerusalem, that holy hill on which Christ reigns.

2. He promiseth to set those over them that shall be every way blessings to them; ver. 15, "I will give you pastors after my heart;" alluding to the character given of David when God pitched upon him to be king; 1 Sam. xiii. 14, "The Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart." Observe, 1st. When a church is gathered, it must be governed. "I will bring them to Zion;" not to live as they list, but to be under discipline; not as wild beasts, that range at pleasure, but as sheep that are under the direction of a shepherd. "I will give them pastors," that is, both magistrates and ministers; both are God's ordinance, for the support of his kingdom. 2nd. It is well with a people when their pastors are after God's own heart; such as they should be, such as we would have them be; that shall make his will their rule in all their administrations, and such as endeavour in some measure to conform to his example; that rule for him, and, as they are capable, rule like him. 3rd. Those are pastors after God's own heart, that make it their business to feed the flock, not to feed themselves, and fleece the flocks, but to do all they can for the good of those that are under their charge; that feed them with wisdom and understanding; that is, wisely and understandingly, as David fed them, in the integrity of his heart, and by the skilfulness of his hands, Ps. lxxviii. 72. Those that are not only pastors but teachers must feed them with the word of God, which is wisdom and understanding, which is able to make us wise unto salvation.

3. He promiseth that there should be no more occasion for the ark of the covenant, which had been so much the glory of the tabernacle first, and afterwards of the temple, and was the token of God's presence with them; that shall be set aside, and there shall be no more inquiry after, nor inquiring of it; ver. 16, "When ye be multiplied and increased in the land," that is, when the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up, which, by the accession of the Gentiles, will bring into the church a vast increase, (and the days of the Messiah the Jewish masters themselves acknowledge to be here intended,) then "they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord." They shall have it no more among them to value, or value themselves by, because they shall have a pure spiritual way of worship set up, in which there shall be no occasion for any of those external ordinances. With the ark of the covenant, the whole ceremonial law shall be set aside, and all the institutions of it; for Christ, the truth of all those types, exhibited to us in the word and sacraments of the New Testament, will be to us instead of all. It is very likely, whatever the Jews suggest to the contrary, that the ark of the covenant was in the second temple; being restored by Cyrus, with other "the vessels of the house of the Lord," Ezr. i. 7; but in the gospel temple Christ is the ark; he is the propitiatory, or mercy-seat. And it is the spiritual presence of God in his ordinances that we are now to expect. Many expressions are here used concerning the setting aside of the ark,—that it shall not come to mind, that they shall not remember it, they shall not visit it, that none of these things shall be any more done; for the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, Jno. iv. 24. But this variety of expression is used to shew, that the ceremonies of the law of Moses should be totally and finally abolished, never to be used any more; but that it would be with difficulty that those who had been so long wedded to them should be weaned from them; and that they would not quite let them go till their holy city and holy house should both be levelled with the ground.

4. He promiseth that the gospel church, here called Jerusalem, shall become eminent and conspicuous, ver. 17. Two things shall make it famous: 1st. God's special residence and dominion in it. It shall be called "the throne of the Lord," the throne of his glory, for that shines forth in the church; the throne of his government, for that also is erected there; there he rules his willing people by his word and Spirit, and brings every thought into obedience to himself. As the Gospel got ground, this throne of the Lord was set up there where Satan's seat had been. It is especially the throne of his grace; for they that by faith come to this Jerusalem come "to God the judge of all, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," Heb. xii. 22, 23. 2nd. The accession of the Gentiles to it. All the nations shall be discipled, and so gathered to the church, and shall become subjects to that throne of the Lord which is there set up, and devoted to the honour of that name of the Lord which is there both manifested and called upon.

5. He promiseth that there shall be a wonderful reformation wrought in those that are gathered to the church; "They shall not walk any more after the imagination of their evil hearts." They shall not live as they list, but live by rules; not do according to their own corrupt appetites, but according to the will of God. See what leads in sin, "the imagination of our own evil hearts;" and what sin is,—it is walking after that imagination, being governed by fancy and humour; and what converting grace doth,—it takes us off from walking after our own inventions, and brings us to be governed by religion and right reason.

6. That Judah and Israel shall be happily united in one body, ver. 18. They were so in their return out of captivity, and their settlement again in Canaan; "The house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel," as being perfectly agreed, and become one stick in the hand of the Lord, as Ezekiel also foretold, ch. xxxvii. 16. Both Assyria and Chaldea fell into the hands of Cyrus, and his proclamation extended to all the Jews in all his dominions; and therefore we have reason to think that many of the house of Israel came with those of Judah out of the land of the north; though at first there returned but forty-two thousand, whom we have an account of Ezr. ii., yet Josephus saith, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 4, that some few years after, under Darius, Zerubbabel went and fetched up above four millions of souls, "to the land that was given for an inheritance to their fathers." And we never read of such animosities and enmities between Israel and Judah as had been formerly. And this happy coalescence between Israel and Judah in Canaan was a type of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church, when, all enmities being slain, they should become one sheepfold, under one shepherd.

Thirdly. Here is some difficulty started, that lies in the way of all this mercy, but an expedient is found to get over it.

1. God asks, How shall I do this for thee? not as if God shewed favour with reluctancy, as he punisheth with a "How shall I give thee up?" Hos. xi. 8, 9. No, though he is slow to anger, he is swift to shew mercy. But it intimates, that we are utterly unworthy of his favours, that we have no reason to expect them, that there is nothing in us to deserve them, and we can lay no claim to them. And that he contrives how to do it in such a way as may save the honour of his justice and holiness in the government of the world. Means must be devised "that his banished be not for ever expelled from him," 2 Sam. xiv. 14. How shall I do it? 1st. Even backsliders, if they return and repent, shall be put among the children. And who could ever have expected that? "Behold, what manner of love is this!" 1 Jno. iii. 1. How should we that are so mean and weak, so worthless and unworthy, and so provoking, ever be put among the children? 2nd. Those whom God puts among the children, to them he will give the pleasant land, the land of Canaan, that glory of all lands, that goodly heritage of the hosts of nations, which nations and their hosts wish for, and prefer before their own country; or which the hosts of the nations have now got possession of. It was a type of heaven, where there are pleasures for evermore. Now who could expect a place in that pleasant land, that has so often despised it, Ps. cvi. 24, and is so unworthy of it, and unfit for it? Is this the manner of men?

2. He doth himself return answer to this question; "But I said, Thou shalt call me, My Father." God doth himself answer all the objections that are taken from our unworthiness, or they would never be got over. 1st. That he may put returning penitents among the children, he will give them the spirit of adoption, teaching them to cry, Abba, Father, Gal. iv. 6. "Thou shalt call me my Father," shalt return to me, and resign thyself to me, as a father, and that shall recommend thee to my favour. 2nd. That he may give them the pleasant land, he will put his fear in their hearts, that they may never turn from him, but may persevere to the end.

20 Surely as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband,
So have ye dealt treacherously with me,
O house of Israel, saith the LORD.
21 A voice was heard upon the high places,
Weeping and supplications of the children of Israel:
For they have perverted their way,
And they have forgotten the LORD their God.
22 Return, ye backsliding children,
And I will heal your backslidings.
Behold, we come unto thee;
For thou art the LORD our God.
23 Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills,
And from the multitude of mountains:
Truly in the LORD our God is the salvation of Israel.
24 For shame hath devoured the labour of our fathers from our youth;
Their flocks and their herds, their sons and their daughters.
25 We lie down in our shame,
And our confusion covereth us:
For we have sinned against the LORD our God,
We and our fathers, from our youth even unto this day,
And have not obeyed the voice of the LORD our God.

Here is, First. The charge God exhibits against Israel for their treacherous departures from him, ver. 20. As an adulterous wife elopes from her husband, so have they gone a whoring from God. They were joined to God by a marriage covenant; but they broke that covenant; they dealt treacherously with God, who had always dealt kindly and faithfully with them. Treacherous dealing with men like ourselves is bad enough; but to deal treacherously with God is to deal treasonably.

Secondly. Their conviction and confession of the truth of this charge, ver. 21. When God reproved them for their apostacy, there were some among them, even such as God would take and bring to Zion whose "voice was heard upon the high places, weeping and" praying, humbling themselves before the God of their fathers, lamenting their calamities, and their sins, the procuring cause of them; for this is that which they lament; for this they bemoan themselves, that "they have perverted their way, and forgotten the Lord their God." Note, 1. Sin is the perverting of our way, it is turning aside to crooked ways, and perverting that which is right. 2. Forgetting the Lord our God is at the bottom of all sin. If men would remember God, his eye upon them, and their obligation to him, they would not transgress as they do. 3. By sin we embarrass ourselves, and bring ourselves into trouble, for that also is the perverting of our way, Lam. iii. 9. 4. Prayers and tears well become those whose consciences tell them that they have perverted their way, and forgotten their God. When the foolishness of man perverteth his way, his heart is apt to fret against the Lord, Pr. xix. 3, whereas it should be melted and poured out before him.

Thirdly. The invitation God gives them to return to him; ver. 22, "Return, ye backsliding children." He calls them children in tenderness and compassion to them; foolish and froward as children, yet his sons; whom, though he corrects, he will not disinherit; for though they are refractory children, (so some render it,) yet they are children. God bears with such children, and so must parents. When they are convinced of sin, ver. 21, and humbled for that, then they are prepared, and then they are invited to return; as Christ invites those to him that are weary and heavy laden. The promise to those that return is, "I will heal your backslidings;" I will comfort you under the grief you are in for your backslidings; deliver you out of the troubles you have brought yourselves into by your backslidings, and cure you of your refractoriness and bent to backslide. God will heal our backslidings by his pardoning mercy, his quieting peace, and his renewing grace.

Fourthly. The ready consent they give to this invitation, and their cheerful compliance with it: "Behold we come unto thee." This is an echo to God's call; as a voice returned from broken walls, so this from broken hearts. God saith, "Return;" they answer, "Behold, we come." It is an immediate speedy answer, without delay; not, We will come hereafter, but, We do come now; we need not take time to consider of it. Not, We come towards thee, but, We come to thee; we will make a thorough turn of it. Observe how unanimous they are, We come; one and all.

1. They come devoting themselves to God as theirs; "Thou art the Lord our God," we take thee to be ours, we give up ourselves to thee to be thine; whither shall we go but to thee? for it is our sin and folly that we have gone from thee. It is very comfortable in our returns to God, after our backslidings, to look up to him as ours in covenant.

2. They come, disclaiming all expectations of relief and succour but from God only; "In vain is salvation hoped for from the hills and from the multitude of the mountains;" we now see our folly in relying upon creature confidences, and will never so deceive ourselves any more. They worshipped their idols upon hills and mountains, ver. 6, and they had a multitude of idols upon their mountains, which they had sought unto, and put a confidence in, but now they will have no more to do with them. In vain do we look for any thing that is good from them; while from God we may look for every thing that is good; even salvation itself. Therefore,

3. They come depending upon God only as their God: "In the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel." He is the Lord, and he only can save; he can save when all other succours and saviours fail. And he is our God, and will in his own way and time work salvation for us. It is very applicable to the great salvation from sin which Jesus Christ wrought out for us; that is the salvation of the Lord, his great salvation.

4. They come justifying God in their troubles, and judging themselves for their sins, ver. 24, 25.

1st. They impute all the calamities they had been under to their idols. They had not only done them no good, but done them abundance of mischief, all the mischief that had been done them. "Shame" (that is, the idol, that shameful thing,) "has devoured the labour of our fathers." Note, First. True penitents have learned to call sin shame, even the beloved sin that has been as an idol to them, which they have been most pleased with, and proud of, even that they shall call a scandalous thing, shall put contempt upon, and be ashamed of. Secondly. True penitents have learned to call sin, death and ruin, and to charge upon it all the mischiefs they suffer. It has devoured all those good things which our fathers laboured for, and left to us; we have found from our youth that our idolatry hath been the destruction of our prosperity. Children often throw away upon their lusts that which their fathers took a great deal of pains for; and it is well if at length they are brought (as these here) to see the folly of it, and to call those vices their shame which have wasted their estates, and devoured the labour of their fathers. They instance in the labour of their fathers, which their idols had "devoured, their flocks and their herds, their sons and their daughters." 1*st*. Their idolatries had provoked God to bring these desolating judgments upon them, which had ruined their country and families, and made their estates a prey, and their children captives to the conquering enemy. They had procured these things to themselves. Or rather, 2*nd*. These had been sacrificed to their idols, had been separated unto that shame, Hos. ix. 10; and they had devoured them without mercy, did "eat the fat of their sacrifices," Deu. xxxii. 38, even their human sacrifices.

2nd. They take to themselves the shame of their sin and folly; ver. 25, "We lie down in our shame," being unable to bear up under it; "our confusion covereth us," that is, both our penal and our penitential shame. Sin has laid us under such rebukes of God's providence, and such reproaches of our own consciences, as surround us and fill us with shame. "For we have sinned," and shame came in with sin, and still attends upon it. We are sinners by descent; guilt and corruption are entailed upon us: "We and our fathers have sinned;" we were sinners betimes; we began early in a course of sin; we have sinned "from our youth;" we have continued in it, have sinned "even unto this day," though often called to repent and forsake our sins. And that which is the malignity of sin, the worst thing in it, is the affront we have put upon God by it; "We have not obeyed the voice of the Lord our God," forbidding us to sin, and commanding us, when we have sinned, to repent. Now all this seems to be the language of the penitents of the house of Israel, ver. 20, of the ten tribes; either of those that were in captivity or those of them that remained in their own land. And the prophet takes notice of their repentance, to provoke the men of Judah to a holy emulation. David used it as an argument with the elders of Judah, that it would be a shame for them, that were his bone and his flesh, to be the last in bringing the king back, when the men of Israel appeared forward in it, 2 Sam. xix. 11, 12. So the prophet excites Judah to repent, because Israel did. And well it were if the zeal of others, less likely, would provoke us to strive to get before them, and go beyond them in that which is good.

CHAPTER IV.

It should seem that the first two verses of this chapter might better have been joined to the close of the foregoing chapter, for they are directed to Israel, the ten tribes, by way of reply to their compliance with God's call, directing and encouraging them to hold their resolution, ver. 1, 2. The rest of the chapter concerns Judah and Jerusalem. I. They are called to repent and reform, ver. 3, 4. II. They are warned of the advance of Nebuchadnezzar and his forces against them, and are told it is for their sins, from which they are again exhorted to wash themselves, ver. 5—18. III. To affect them the more with the greatness of the desolation that was coming, the prophet doth himself bitterly lament it, and sympathize with his people in the calamities it brought upon them, and the plunge it brought them to, representing it as a reduction of the world to its first chaos, ver. 19—31.

IF thou wilt return, O Israel,
Saith the LORD, return unto me:
And if thou wilt put away thine abominations out of my sight,
Then shalt thou not remove.
2 And thou shalt swear, The LORD liveth,
In truth, in judgment, and in righteousness;
And the nations shall bless themselves in him,
And in him shall they glory.

When God called to backsliding Israel to return, ch. iii. 22, they presently answered, Lord, we return; now God here takes notice of their answer, and by way of reply to it,

First. He directs them how to pursue their good resolutions. Dost thou say thou wilt return? 1. Then thou must return unto me; make a thorough work of it. Do not only turn from thine idolatries, but return to the instituted worship of the God of Israel. Or, Thou must return speedily, and not delay; as Isa. xxi. 12, "If ye will enquire, enquire ye;" so, if you will return unto me, return ye; do not talk of it, but do it. 2. Thou must utterly abandon all sin, and not retain any of the relics of idolatry; "Put away thine abominations out of my sight," that is, out of all places, for every place is under the eye of God; especially out of the temple, the house which he had in a particular manner his eye upon, to see that it was kept clean. It intimates that their idolatries were not only obvious, but offensive to the eye of God; they were abominations which he could not endure the sight of: therefore, Put them away out of my sight; that is, put them away for this reason, because they are a provocation to the pure eyes of God's glory. Sin must be put away out of the heart, else it is not put away out of God's sight, for the heart, and all that is in it, lies open before his eye. 3. They must not return to sin again, so some understand that, "Thou shalt not remove," reading it, Thou shalt not, or must not wander. "If thou wilt put away thine abominations, and wilt not wander" after them again, as thou hast done, all shall be well. 4. They must give unto God the glory due unto his name; ver. 2, "Thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth." His being shall be with thee the most sacred truth, than which nothing can be more sure; and his judgment the supreme court to which thou shalt appeal, and than which nothing can be more awful. Swearing is an act of religious worship, in which we are to give honour to God three ways: 1st. We must swear by the true God only, and not by creatures, or any false gods; by the God that liveth, not by the gods that are deaf, and dumb, and dead; by him only, and not by the Lord and by Malcham, as Zeph. i. 5. 2nd. We must swear that only which is true, "in truth and in righteousness;" not daring to assert that which is false, or which we do not know to be true, or to assert that as certain which is doubtful, or to promise that which we mean not to perform, or to violate the promise we have made. To say that which is untrue, or to do that which is unrighteous, is bad; but to back either with an oath is much worse. 3rd. We must do it solemnly, swear in judgment, that is, when thou art judicially called to it, and not in common conversation. Rash swearing is as great a profanation of God's name as solemn swearing is an honour to it: see Deu. x. 20; Mat. v. 34, 37.

Secondly. He encourageth them to keep in this good mind, and adhere to their resolutions. If the scattered Israelites will thus return to God, 1. They shall be blessed themselves; for to that sense the first words may be read: 'If thou wilt return to me, then thou shalt return,' that is, thou shalt be brought back out of thy captivity into thy own land again, as was of old promised, Deu. iv. 29; xxx. 2. Or, then thou shalt rest in me, shalt return to me as thy rest, even while thou art in the land of thy captivity. 2. They shall be blessings to others; for their returning to God again will be a means of others turning to him that never knew him. If thou wilt own the living Lord thou wilt thereby influence the nations among whom thou art, to bless themselves in him, to place their happiness in his favour, and to think themselves happy in being brought to the fear of him: see Isa. lxv. 16, "They shall bless themselves in the God of truth," and not in false gods; shall do themselves the honour, and give themselves the satisfaction, to join themselves to him, and then "in him shall they glory;" they shall make him their glory; and shall please, nay, shall pride themselves in the blessed change they have made. Those that part with their sins to return to God, however they scrupled the bargain at first, when they go away, then they boast.

3 For thus saith the LORD
To the men of Judah and Jerusalem,
Break up your fallow ground,
And sow not among thorns.
4 Circumcise yourselves to the LORD,
And take away the foreskins of your heart,
Ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem:
Lest my fury come forth like fire,
And burn that none can quench it,
Because of the evil of your doings.

The prophet here turns his speech in God's name to the men of the place where he lived. We have heard what words he proclaimed towards the north, ch. iii. 12, for the comfort of those that were now in captivity, and were humbled under the hand of God. Let us now see what he saith "to the men of Judah and Jerusalem," who were now in prosperity, for their conviction and awakening. In these two verses he exhorts them to repentance and reformation, as the only way left them to prevent the desolating judgments that were ready to break in upon them. Observe,

First. The duties required of them, which they are concerned to do.

1. They must do by their hearts as they do by their ground, that they expect any good of, they must plough it up; ver. 3, "Break up your fallow-ground." 'Plough to yourselves a ploughing,' or 'plough up your plough land,' that you sow not among thorns; that is, that you may not labour in vain for your own safety and welfare, as those do that sow good seed among thorns, and as you have been doing a great while. Put yourselves into a frame fit to receive mercy from God, and put away all that which keeps it from you, and then you may expect to receive mercy, and to prosper in your endeavours to help yourselves. Note, 1st. An unconvinced, unhumbled heart, is like fallow ground, ground untilled, unoccupied. It is ground capable of improvement; it is our ground, let out to us, and we must be accountable for it; but it is fallow, it is unfenced, and lies common; it is unfruitful, and of no advantage to the owner, and (which is principally intended) it is overgrown with thorns and weeds, which are the natural product of the corrupt heart, if it be not renewed with grace. Rain and sunshine are lost upon it, Heb. vi. 7, 8. 2nd. We are concerned to get this fallow ground ploughed up; we must search into our hearts, let the word of God divide (as the plough doth) between the joints and the marrow, Heb. iv. 12. We must rend our hearts, Joel ii. 13. We must pluck up those corruptions by the root that, as thorns, choke both our endeavours and our expectations, Hos. x. 11.

2. They must do that to their souls which was done to their bodies, when they were taken into covenant with God; ver. 4, "Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart." Mortify the flesh and the lusts of it. Pare off that superfluity of naughtiness, which hinders your receiving with meekness the engrafted word, Jas. i. 21. Boast not of, and rest not in, the circumcision of the body; for that is but a sign, and will not serve without the thing signified. It was a dedicating sign. Do that in sincerity which was done in profession by your circumcision; devote and consecrate yourselves unto the Lord, to be to him a peculiar people. Circumcision was an obligation to keep the law; lay yourselves afresh under that obligation. It was a seal of the righteousness of faith; lay hold then of that righteousness, and so circumcise yourselves to the Lord.

Secondly. The danger they are threatened with, which they are concerned to avoid. Repent and reform, "lest my fury come forth like fire," which it is now ready to do, as that fire which came forth from the Lord, and consumed the sacrifices, and which was always kept burning upon the altar, and none might quench it; such is God's wrath against impenitent sinners, "because of the evil of their doings." Note, 1. That which is to be dreaded by us more than any thing else is the wrath of God; for that is the spring and bitterness of all present miseries, and will be the quintessence and perfection of everlasting misery. 2. It is the evil of our doings that kindles the fire of God's wrath against us. 3. The consideration of the imminent danger we are in, of falling and perishing under this wrath, should awaken us with all possible care to sanctify ourselves to God's glory, and to see to it that we be sanctified by his grace.

5 Declare ye in Judah,
And publish in Jerusalem; and say,
Blow ye the trumpet in the land:
Cry, gather together, and say,
Assemble yourselves, and let us go into the defenced cities.
6 Set up the standard toward Zion:
Retire, stay not:
For I will bring evil from the north,
And a great destruction.
7 The lion is come up from his thicket,
And the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way;
He is gone forth from his place to make thy land desolate;
And thy cities shall be laid waste, without an inhabitant.
8 For this gird you with sackcloth, lament and howl:

For the fierce anger of the LORD is not turned back from us.

9 And it shall come to pass at that day, saith the LORD,
That the heart of the king shall perish, and the heart of the princes;
And the priests shall be astonished, and the prophets shall wonder.

10 Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD!
Surely thou hast greatly deceived this people and Jerusalem,
Saying, Ye shall have peace; [Jerusalem,
Whereas the sword reacheth unto the soul.

11 At that time shall it be said to this people and to Jerusalem,
A dry wind of the high places in the wilderness
Toward the daughter of my people, not to fan, nor to cleanse,

12 Even a full wind from those places shall come unto me:
Now also will I give sentence against them.

13 Behold, he shall come up as clouds,
And his chariots shall be as a whirlwind:
His horses are swifter than eagles.
Woe unto us! for we are spoiled.

14 O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness,
That thou mayest be saved.
How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?

15 For a voice declareth from Dan,
And publisheth affliction from mount Ephraim.

16 Make ye mention to the nations; behold,
Publish against Jerusalem,
That watchers come from a far country,
And give out their voice against the cities of Judah.

17 As keepers of a field, are they against her round about;
Because she hath been rebellious against me, saith the LORD. [thee;

18 Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto
This is thy wickedness, because it is bitter, because it reacheth unto thine heart.

God's usual method is to warn before he wounds. In these verses, accordingly, God gives notice to the Jews of the general desolation that would shortly be brought upon them by a foreign invasion. This must be declared and published in all the cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem, that all might hear and fear; and, by this loud alarm, be either brought to repentance, or left inexcusable. The prediction of this calamity is here given very largely, and in lively expressions, which one would think should have awakened and affected the most stupid. Observe,

First. The war proclaimed, and general notice given of the advance of the enemy. It is published now, some years before, by the prophet; but, since this will be slighted, it shall be published after another manner, when the judgment is actually breaking in, ver. 5, 6. The trumpet must be blown, the standard must be set up. Summons must be issued out to the people to gather together, and to draw towards Zion, either to guard that, or expecting to be guarded by it. There must be a general rendezvous; the militia must be raised, and all the forces mustered. Those that are able men, and fit for service, must go into the defenced cities, to garrison them. Those that are weak, and would lessen their provisions but not increase their strength, must retire, and away, and not stay.

Secondly. An express arrived with intelligence of the approach of the king of Babylon and his army. It is an evil that God will bring from the north, as he had said, ch. i. 15, "even a great destruction," beyond all that had yet come upon the nation of the Jews. The enemy is here compared,

1. To a lion that comes up from his thicket, when he is hungry, to seek his prey, ver. 7. The helpless beasts are so terrified with his roaring, (as some report,) that they cannot flee from him, and so become an easy prey to him. Nebuchadnezzar is this roaring, tearing lion, "the destroyer of the nations," that has laid many countries waste, and now "is on his way," on full speed towards the land of Judah. The destroyer of the Gentiles shall be the destroyer of the Jews too, when they have by their idolatry made themselves like the Gentiles. He is gone forth from his place, from Babylon, or the place of the rendezvous of his army, on purpose against this land; that is the prey he has now his eye upon, not to plunder it only, but to make it desolate; and herein he shall succeed to that degree, that the cities shall be laid waste without inhabitants, shall be overgrown with grass as a field, so some read it.

2. To a drying, blasting wind, (ver. 11,) a parching, scorching wind, which spoils the fruits of the earth, and withers them. Not a wind that brings rain, but such as useth to come out of the north, which drives away rain, Pr. xxv. 23, but brings something worse instead of it; such shall this evil out of the north be to this people. A black, freezing wind, which they can neither fence against nor flee from; but wherever they go it shall surround and pursue them; and they cannot see it before it comes, but when it comes they shall feel it. It is a "wind of the high places in the wilderness," or plain, or that beats upon the tops of the hills, or that carries all before it in the plain, where there is no shelter, but the ground is all champaign. It shall come in its full force "towards the daughter of my people," that have been brought up so tenderly and delicately that they could not endure to have the wind blow upon them. Now this fierce wind shall come against them, not to fan or cleanse them; not such a gentle wind, as is used in winnowing corn; but a full wind, ver. 12, a strong and violent wind, blowing full upon them. This shall come to me, or rather for me; it shall come with commission from God, and shall accomplish that for which he sends it. For this, as other stormy winds, fulfils his word.

3. To clouds and whirlwinds for swiftness, ver. 13. The Chaldean army shall come up as clouds driven with the wind; so thick shall they stand, so fast shall they march, and it shall be to no purpose to offer to stop them, or to make head against them, no more than to arrest a cloud, or give check to a whirlwind. The horses are swifter than eagles, when they fly upon their prey; it is vain to think either of opposing them or of outrunning them.

4. To watchers, and the keepers of a field; ver. 15—17, "The voice declares from Dan," a city which lay farthest north of all the cities of Canaan, and therefore received the first tidings of this evil from the north, and hastened it to mount Ephraim, that part of the land of Israel which lay next to Judea. They received the news of the affliction, and transmitted it to Jerusalem. Ill news flies apace; and an impenitent people, that hates to be reformed, can expect no other but ill news. Now, what is the news? tell the nations, those mixed nations that now inhabit the cities of the ten tribes; mention it to them, that they may provide for their own safety; but publish it against Jerusalem, that is the place aimed at, the game shot at. Let them know that "watchers are come from a far country," that is, soldiers, that will watch all opportunities to do mischief. Private soldiers we call private sentinels, or watchmen. They are coming on a full career, and "give out their voice against the cities of Judah;" they design to invest them, and make themselves masters of them, and then to attack them with loud shouts, as sure of victory. As keepers of a field surround it, to keep all out from it, so shall they surround the cities of Judah, to keep all in them, till they be constrained to surrender at discretion; they "are against her round about, compassing her in on every side:" see Lu. xix. 43. As formerly the good angels, those watchers and holy ones, were like keepers of a field to Jerusalem watching about it, that nothing might go in to its prejudice, so now their enemies were as watchers and keepers of a field, surrounding it, that nothing might go in to its relief and succour.

Thirdly. The lamentable cause of this judgment. How is it that Judah and Jerusalem come to be thus abandoned to ruin? See how it came to this. 1. They sinned against God. It was all long of themselves; "She has been rebellious against me, saith the Lord," ver. 17. Their enemies surrounded them as keepers of a field, because they had taken up arms against their rightful lord and sovereign, and were to be seized as rebels. The Chaldeans are breaking in upon them, and it was sin that opened the gap at which they entered; "Thy ways and thy doings have procured these things unto thee," ver. 18; thy evil way, and thy doings that have not been good. It was not a false step or two that did them this mischief, but their way and course of living was bad. Note, Sin is the procuring cause of all our troubles. Those that go on in sin, while they are endeavouring to ward off mischiefs with one hand, are at the same time pulling them upon their own heads with the other. 2. God was angry with them for their sin. It is the fierce anger of the Lord that makes the army of the Chaldeans thus fierce, thus furious; that is kindled against us, and is not turned back from us, ver. 8. Note, In men's anger against us, and the violence of that, we must see and own God's anger, and the power of that. If that were turned back from us, our enemies should not come forward against us. 3. In his just and holy anger he condemned them to this dreadful punishment; "Now also will I give sentence against them," ver. 12. The execution was done, not in a heat, but in pursuance of a sentence solemnly passed, according to equity, and upon mature deliberation. Some read it, 'Now will I do execution upon them,' according to the doom formerly passed; and "we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth," and the execution of that judgment.

Fourthly. The lamentable effects of this judgment, upon the first alarm given of it. 1. The people that should fight shall quite despair, and shall not have a heart to make the least stand against the enemy; ver. 8, "For this gird you with sackcloth, lament and howl;" that is, you will do so when the cry is made through the kingdom, "Arm, arm." All will be seized with a consternation, and all put into confusion. Instead of girding on the sword, they will gird on the sackcloth; instead of animating one another to a vigorous resistance, they will lament and howl, and so dishearten one another. While the enemy is yet at a distance, they will give up all for gone, and cry, "Woe unto us! for we are spoiled," ver. 13. We are all undone; the spoilers will certainly carry the day, and it is in vain to make head against them. Judah and Jerusalem had been famed for valiant men; but see what is the effect of sin: by depriving men of their confidence towards God, it deprives them of their courage towards men. 2. Their great men, that should contrive for the public safety, shall be at their wit's end; ver. 9, "At that day the heart of the king shall perish;" both his wisdom and his courage. Despairing of success, he shall have no spirit to do any thing; and if he had he will not know what to do. His princes and privy-counsellors, that should animate and advise him, shall be as much at a loss and as much in despair as he. See how easily, how effectually God can bring ruin upon a people that are doomed to it, purely by dispiriting them, "taking away the heart of the chief" of them, Job xii. 20, 24; "cutting off the spirit of princes," Ps. lxvi. 12. The business of the priests was to encourage the people in time of war. They were to say to the people, "Fear not, and let not your hearts faint," Deu. xx. 2, 3. They were to blow the trumpets, for an assurance to them that in the day of battle they should be "remembered before the Lord their God," Num. x. 9. But now the priests themselves shall be astonished, and shall have no heart themselves to do their office, and therefore not likely to put spirit into the people. The prophets too, the false prophets that had cried peace to them, shall be put into the greatest amazement imaginable; seeing their own guilty blood ready to be shed by that sword which they had many a time told the people there was no danger of. Note, God's judgments come with the greatest terror upon those that have been most secure. Our Saviour foretells that, at the last destruction of Jerusalem, men's hearts should fail them for fear, Lu. xxi. 26; and it is common for those who have cheated and flattered people into a carnal security, not only to fail them, but to discourage them, when the trouble comes.

Fifthly. The prophet's complaint of the people's being deceived, ver. 10. It is expressed strangely, as we read it: "Ah, Lord God, surely thou hast greatly deceived this people, saying, Ye shall have peace." We are sure God deceives none. "Let no man say, when he is tempted," or deluded, that God has tempted or deluded him. But, 1. The people deceived themselves with the promises that God had made in general of his favour to that nation, and the many peculiar privileges with which they were dignified, building upon them, though they took no care to perform the conditions on which the accomplishment of those promises, and the continuance of those privileges did depend; and had no regard to the threatenings which in the law were set over against those promises. Thus they cheated themselves, and then wickedly complained that God had cheated them. 2. The false prophets deceived them with promises of peace, which they made them in God's name, ch. xxiii. 17; xxvii. 9. If God had sent them, he had indeed greatly deceived the people; but he did not. It was the people's fault that they gave them credit; and here also they deceived themselves. 3. God had permitted the false prophets to deceive, and the people to be deceived by them; giving both up to strong delusions, to punish them for not receiving the truth in the love of it. Herein the Lord was righteous; but the prophet complains of it as the sorest judgment of all, for by this means they had been hardened in their sins. 4. It may be read with an interrogation, 'Hast thou indeed thus deceived this people?' It is plain they are greatly deceived, for they expect peace, whereas "the sword reacheth unto the soul;" that is, it is a killing sword, abundance of lives are lost, and more like to be. Now, was it God that deceived them? No; he had often given them warning of judgments in general, and of this in particular; but their own prophets deceive them, and cry peace to them to whom the God of heaven doth not speak peace. It is a piteous thing, and that which every good man greatly laments, to see people flattered into their own ruin, and promising themselves peace when war is at the door; and this we should complain of to God, who alone can prevent such a fatal delusion.

Secondly. The prophet's endeavour to undeceive them. When the prophets they loved and caressed dealt falsely with them, he whom they hated and persecuted dealt faithfully.

1. He shews them their wound. They were loath to see it, very loath to have it searched into; but if they will allow themselves the liberty of a free thought they might discover their punishment in their sin; ver. 18, "This is thy wickedness, because it is bitter." Now thou seest that it is a bitter thing to depart from God, and will certainly be bitterness in the latter end, ch. ii. 19. It produceth bitter effects, and grief that reacheth unto the heart, toucheth to the quick, and in the most tender part; The sword reacheth to the soul, ver. 10. God can make trouble reach the heart, even of those that would lay nothing to heart; and by this thou mayest see what is thy wickedness; that it is a bitter thing, "a root of bitterness, that bears gall and wormwood;" and that it has reached to the heart,—it is the corruption of the soul, of the imagination of the thought of the heart. If the heart were not polluted with sin, it would not be disturbed and disquieted as it is with trouble.

2. He shews them the cure, ver. 14. Since "thy wickedness reacheth to the heart," there the application must be made; "O Jerusalem, wash thine hands from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved." By Jerusalem, he means each one of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; for every man has a heart of his own to take care of; and it is personal reformation that must help the public. Every one must return from his own evil way, and, in order to that, cleanse his own evil heart; and let the heart of the city too be purified, not the suburbs only, as the outskirts of it. The vitals of a state must be amended, by the reformation of those that have the commanding influence upon it. Note, 1st. Reformation is absolutely necessary to salvation. There is no other way of preventing judgments, or turning them away when we are threatened with them, but taking away the sin by which we have procured them to ourselves. 2nd. No reformation is saving but that which reacheth the heart. There is heart-wickedness, that is defiling to the soul, from which we must wash ourselves. By repentance and faith we must wash our hearts from the guilt we have contracted by spiritual wickedness, by those sins which begin and end in the heart, and go no farther; and by mortification and watchfulness we must suppress and prevent this heart-wickedness for the future. The tree must be made good, else the fruit will not. Jerusalem was all overspread with the leprosy of sin. Now, as it is with the body in such a case, (the physicians agree that external applications will do no good, unless a great deal of purging physic be taken inwardly, to change the mass of the humours that lurk there, and to change the mass of the blood,) so it is with the soul, so it is with the state; there will be no effectual reformation of the manners without a reformation of the mind. The mistakes must be rectified; the corruptions there must be mortified, and the evil dispositions there changed. Though thou art Jerusalem, called a holy city; that will not save thee, unless thou wash thine heart from wickedness. In the latter part of the verse he reasons with them, "How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" Where he complains, First. Of the delays of their reformation; How long shall that filthy heart of thine continue unwashed? When shall it once be? Note, The God of heaven thinks the time long that his room is usurped, and his interest opposed in our souls, ch. xiii. 27. Secondly. Of the root of their corruption, the vain thoughts that lodged within them, and defiled their hearts, from which they must wash their hearts. Thoughts of iniquity, or mischief; these are the evil thoughts that are the spawn of the evil heart, from which all other wickedness is produced, Mat. xv. 19; these are our own, the conceptions of our own lusts, Jas. i. 15; and they are most dangerous, when they lodge within us, when they are admitted and entertained as guests, and are suffered to continue. Some read it, thoughts of afflictions; such thoughts as will bring nothing but affliction and misery upon thee. Some, by the vain thoughts here understand all those frivolous pleas and excuses with which they turned off the reproofs and calls of the word, and rendered them ineffectual, and bolstered themselves up in their wickedness. "Wash thy heart from wickedness;" and think not to say, "We are not polluted," ch. ii. 23; or, We are Jerusalem; "We have Abraham to our father," Mat. iii. 8, 9.

19 My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart;
My heart maketh a noise in me; I cannot hold my peace,
Because thou hast heard, O my soul,
The sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war.
20 Destruction upon destruction is cried;
For the whole land is spoiled:
Suddenly are my tents spoiled,
And my curtains in a moment.
21 How long shall I see the standard,
And hear the sound of the trumpet?
22 For my people is foolish,
They have not known me;
They are sottish children,
And they have none understanding:
They are wise to do evil,
But to do good they have no knowledge.
23 I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form, and void;
And the heavens, and they had no light.
24 I beheld the mountains, and, lo, they trembled,
And all the hills moved lightly.
25 I beheld, and, lo, there was no man,
And all the birds of the heavens were fled.
26 I beheld, and, lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness,
And all the cities thereof were broken down
At the presence of the LORD,
And by his fierce anger.
27 For thus hath the LORD said,
The whole land shall be desolate;
Yet will I not make a full end.
28 For this shall the earth mourn,
And the heavens above be black:
Because I have spoken it, I have purposed it,
And will not repent, neither will I turn back from it.
29 The whole city shall flee
For the noise of the horsemen and bowmen;
They shall go into thickets,
And climb up upon the rocks:
Every city shall be forsaken,
And not a man dwell therein.
30 And when thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do?
Though thou clothest thyself with crimson,
Though thou deckest thee with ornaments of gold,
Though thou rentest thy face with painting,

WOMAN WITH PAINTED EYES.

In vain shalt thou make thyself fair;
Thy lovers will despise thee, they will seek thy life.
31 For I have heard a voice as of a woman in travail,
And the anguish as of her that bringeth forth her first child,
The voice of the daughter of Zion,
That bewaileth herself, that spreadeth her hands,
Saying, Woe is me now!
For my soul is wearied because of murderers.

The prophet is here in a mighty agony, and cries out like one upon the rack of pain, with the colic or gripes, or some such acute distemper, or as a woman in travail. The expressions are very pathetical and moving, enough to melt a heart of stone into compassion; "My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart;" and yet well and in health himself, and nothing ails him. Note, A good man, in such a bad world as this is, cannot but be a man of sorrows. "My heart makes a noise in me," through the tumult of my spirits, and "I cannot hold my peace." Note, The grievance and the grief sometimes may be such as that the most prudent, patient man cannot forbear complaining. Now what is the matter? What is it that puts this good man into such a toss? It is not for himself, or any affliction in his family, that he grieves thus; but it is purely upon the public account, it is his people's case that he lays to heart thus.

First. They are very sinful, and will not be reformed, ver. 22. These are the words of God himself, for so the prophet chose to give this character of the people, rather than in his own words, or as from himself. "My people is foolish." God calls them his people though they are foolish. They have cast him off, but he has not cast them off, Rom. xi. 1. They are my people whom I have been in covenant with, and still have mercy in store for. They are foolish, for "they have not known me." Note, Those are foolish indeed that have not known God, especially that call themselves his people, and have the advantages of coming into acquaintance with him and yet have not known him. They are sottish children, stupid and senseless, and have no understanding. They cannot distinguish between truth and falsehood, good and evil; they cannot discern the mind of God, either in his word or in his providence; they do not understand what their true interest is, nor on which side it lies. They are wise to do evil, to plot mischief against the quiet in the land; wise to contrive the gratification of their lust, and then to conceal and palliate it. But "to do good they have no knowledge," no contrivance, no application of mind; they know not how to make a good use either of the ordinances or of the providences of God, nor how to bring about any design for the good of their country. Contrary to this should be our character, Rom. xvi. 19, "I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil."

Secondly. They are very miserable, and cannot be relieved. He cries out thus, "Because thou hast heard, O my soul, the sound of the trumpet," and seen the standard, both giving the alarm of war, ver. 19, 21. He doth not say, Thou hast heard, O my ear, but O my soul, because the event was yet future; and it is by the spirit of prophecy that he sees it, and receives the impression of it. His soul heard it from the words of God, and therefore he was as well assured of it, and as much affected with it, as if he had heard it with his bodily ears. He expresseth this exceeding concern, 1. To shew that, though he foretold this calamity, yet he was far from desiring the woful day; for a woful day it would be to him. It becomes us to tremble at the thoughts of the misery that sinners are running themselves into, though we have good hopes, through grace, that we ourselves are delivered from the wrath to come. 2. To awaken them to a holy fear, and so to a care to prevent so great judgment, by a true and timely repentance. Note, Those that would affect others with the word of God should evidence that they are themselves affected with it. Now let us see what there is in the destruction here foreseen and foretold that is so very affecting.

1st. It is a swift and sudden destruction. It comes upon Judah and Jerusalem ere they are aware, and pours in so fast upon them that they have not the least breathing time. They have no time to recollect their thoughts, much less to recruit or recover their strength, "destruction upon destruction is cried," ver. 20, "breach upon breach," one sad calamity, like Job's messengers, treading upon the heels of another. The death of Josiah breaks the ice, and plucks up the floodgates; within three months after that his son and successor Jehoahaz is deposed by the king of Egypt; within two or three years after, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem and took it, and from thenceforward he was continually making descents upon the land of Judah with his armies during the reigns of Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah, till about nineteen years after he completed their ruin in the destruction of Jerusalem. But "suddenly were their tents spoiled, and their curtains in a moment." Though the cities held out for some time, yet the country was laid waste at the very first. The shepherds, and all that lived in tents, were plundered presently, they and their effects fell into the enemies' hands; therefore we find the Rechabites that used to dwell in tents, upon the first coming of the army of the Chaldees into the land, retiring into Jerusalem, ch. xxxv. 11. The inhabitants of the villages soon ceased; "suddenly were the tents spoiled." The plain men that dwelt in tents were first made a prey of.

2nd. This dreadful war continued a great while, not in the borders, but in the bowels of the country; for the people were very obstinate, and would not submit to, but took all opportunity to rebel against, the king of Babylon, which did but lengthen out the calamity; they might as good have yielded at first as at last. This is complained of, ver. 21, "How long shall I see the standard?" Shall the sword devour for ever? Good men are none of those that delight in war, for they know not how to fish in troubled waters; they are for peace, Ps. cxx. 7, and will heartily say Amen to that prayer, 'Give peace in our time, O Lord.' "O thou sword of the Lord, when wilt thou be quiet?"

3rd. The desolations made by it in the land were general and universal. "The whole land is spoiled" or plundered, ver. 20, so it was at first, and at length it became a perfect chaos. It was such a desolation as amounted in a manner to a dissolution; not only the superstructure, but even the foundations, were all out of course. The prophet in vision saw the extent and extremity of this destruction, and he here gives a most lively description of it; which, one would think, might have made those uneasy in their sins who dwelt in a land doomed to such a ruin, which might yet have been prevented by their repentance. First. The earth is without form, and void, as it was, Gen. i. 2; it is Tohu and Bohu, the words there used, as far as the land of Judea goes. It is confusion and emptiness, stripped of all its beauty, void of all its wealth; and, compared with what it was, every thing out of place, and out of shape. To a worse chaos than this will the earth be reduced at the end of time, when it and "all the works that are therein shall be burnt up." Secondly. The heavens too are without light, as the earth without fruits. This alludes to the darkness that was upon the face of the deep, Gen. i. 2, and represents God's displeasure against them, as the eclipse of the sun did at our Saviour's death. It was not only the earth that failed them, but heaven also frowned upon them; and with their trouble they had darkness, for they could not see through their troubles. The smoke of their houses and cities which the enemy burned, and the dust which their army raised in its march, even darkened the sun, so that the heavens had no light. Or, it may be taken figuratively: the earth, that is the common people, were impoverished, and in confusion; and the heavens, that is the princes and rulers, had no light, no wisdom in themselves, nor were any comfort to the people, nor a guide to them: compare Mat. xxiv. 29. Thirdly. The mountains trembled, and the hills moved lightly, ver. 24, so formidable were the appearances of God against his people, as in the days of old they had been for them, that "the mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs," Ps. cxiv. 4. The everlasting mountains seemed to be scattered, Hab. iii. 6. The mountains on which they had worshipped their idols, the mountains over which they had looked for succours, all trembled as if they had been conscious of the people's guilt. The mountains, those among them that seemed to be highest and strongest, and of the firmest resolution, yet trembled at the approach of the Chaldean army. The hills moved lightly, as being eased of the burthen of a sinful nation, Isa. i. 24. Fourthly. Not the earth only, but the air was dispeopled and left uninhabited, ver. 25. I beheld the cities, the countries that used to be populous, and lo, there was no man to be seen; all the inhabitants were either killed or fled, or taken captives, such a ruining, depopulating thing is sin. Nay, even "the birds of the heavens," that used to fly about, and "sing among the branches," were now fled away, and no more to be seen or heard. The land of Judah is now become like the lake of Sodom, over which, they say, no bird flies: see Deu. xxix. 23. The enemies shall make such havoc of the country that they shall not so much as leave a bird alive in it. Fifthly. Both the ground and the houses shall be laid waste; ver. 26, "Lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness," being deserted by the inhabitants that should cultivate it, and then soon overgrown with thorns and briars. Or, being trodden down by the destroying army of the enemy. The cities also and their gates and walls are broken down, and levelled with the ground. Those that look no farther than second causes impute it to the policy and fury of the invaders; but the prophet, who looked to the first cause, saith it is "at the presence of the Lord," at his face, that is, the anger of his countenance, even "by his fierce anger," that this was done. Even angry men cannot do us any real hurt, unless God be angry with us. If our ways please him all is well. Sixthly. The meaning of all this is that the nation shall be entirely ruined, and every part of it shall share in the destruction; neither town nor country shall escape. 1*st.* Not the country, for "the whole land shall be desolate;" corn land, and pasture land, both common and enclosed, it shall all be laid waste, ver. 27; the conquerors will have occasion for it all. 2*nd.* Not the men; for, ver. 29, "the whole city shall flee," all the inhabitants of the towns shall quit their habitations by consent, "for fear of the horsemen and bowmen." Rather than lie exposed to their fury they shall "go into the thickets," where they are in danger to be torn by briars, nay, to be torn in pieces by wild beasts; and they shall "climb up upon the rocks," where their lodging will be hard and cold, and the precipice dangerous. Let us not be over fond of our houses and cities, for the time may come when rocks and thickets may be preferable, and chosen rather. This shall be the common case, for "every city shall be forsaken," and not a man shall be left that dares dwell therein. Both government and trade shall be at an end, and all civil societies and incorporations dissolved. It is a very dismal idea which this gives of the approaching desolation; but in the midst of all these threatenings comes in one comfortable word, ver. 27, "Yet will not I make a full end;" not a total consumption, for God will reserve a remnant to himself, that shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger; not a final consumption, for Jerusalem shall again be built, and the land inhabited. This comes in here in the midst of the threatenings, for the comfort of those that trembled at God's word; and it speaks to us the changeableness of God's providence, as it breaks down so it raiseth up again. Every end of our comforts is not a full end, however we may be ready to think it so. And it speaks the unchangeableness of God's covenant, which stands so firm that though he may correct his people very severely, yet he will not cast them off, ch. xxx. 11.

4. Their case was helpless, and without remedy. 1. God would not help them; so he tells them plainly, ver. 28. And if the Lord do not help them, who can? This is that which makes their case deplorable; for this "the earth mourns, and the heavens above are black." There are no prospects but what are very dismal, "because I have spoken it," I have given the word, which shall not be called back; "I have purposed it," it is a consumption decreed, determined, and I will not repent," not change this way, but proceed in it, and will not turn back from it. They would not repent and turn back from the way of their sins, ch. ii. 25, and therefore God will not repent and turn back from the way of his judgments. 2. They could not help themselves, ver. 30, 31. When the thing appeared at a distance they flattered themselves with hopes that, though God should not appear for them as he had done for Hezekiah against the Assyrian army, yet they should find some means or other to secure themselves, and give check to the forces of the enemy. But the prophet tells them that when it comes to the setting to they will be quite at a loss. "When thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do?" What course wilt thou take? Sit down now, and consider this in time. He assures them that, whatever were now their contrivances and confidences,

1st. They will then be despised by their allies whom they depended upon for assistance. He had often compared the sin of Jerusalem to whoredom, not only her idolatry, but her trust in creatures, in the neighbouring powers. Now here he compares her to a harlot, abandoned by all the lewd ones that used to make court to her. She is supposed to do all she can to keep up her interest in their affections; she doth what she can to make herself appear considerable among the nations, and a valuable ally; compliments them by her ambassadors to the highest degree, to engage them to stand by her now in her distress. She clothes herself with crimson, as if she were rich; and decks herself with ornaments of gold, as if her treasures were still as full as ever they had been. She rents her face with painting, puts the best colours she can upon her present distresses, and doth her utmost to palliate and extenuate her losses; sets a good face upon it. But this painting, though it beautifies the face for the present, really rents it; the frequent use of paint spoils the skin, cracks it, and makes it rough; so the case, which by false colours has been made to appear better than really it was, when truth comes to light will look so much the worse. And, after all, "in vain shalt thou make thyself fair;" all thy neighbours are sensible how low thou art brought; the Chaldeans will strip thee of thy crimson and ornaments, and then thy confederates will not only slight thee, and refuse to give thee any succour, but they will join with those that seek thy life, that they may come in for a share in the prey of so rich a country. Here seems to be an allusion to the story of Jezebel, who thought, by making herself look fair and fine, to have outfaced her doom; but in vain, 2 Kin. ix. 33. See what creatures prove when we confide in them, how treacherous they are; instead of saving the life they seek the life; they often change so as that they will sooner do us an ill turn than any service. And see to how little purpose it is for those that have by sin deformed themselves in God's eyes to think by any arts they can use to beautify themselves in the eye of the world.

2nd. They will then be themselves in despair; will find their troubles to be like the pains of a woman in travail, which she cannot escape. "I have heard the voice of the daughter of Zion," her groans echoing to the triumphant shouts of the Chaldean army which he heard, ver. 15; it is "like the voice of a woman in travail," whose pain is exquisite, and the fruit of sin, and the curse too, Gen. iii. 16; and extorts lamentable outcries, especially of a woman in travail of her first child, who, having never known before what that pain is, is the more terrified by it. Troubles are most grievous to those that have not been used to them. Zion, in this distress, since her neighbours refuse to pity her, bewaileth herself, fetching deep sighs, so the word signifies; and she spreads her hands, either wringing them for grief or reaching them forth for succour; and all the cry is, "Woe is me now," now the decree is gone forth against her, and is past recall, for "my soul is wearied because of murderers." The Chaldean soldiers put all to the sword that gave them any opposition, so that the land was full of murders. Zion was weary of hearing tragical stories from all parts of the country, and cried out, Woe is me. It was well if their sufferings put them in mind of their sins, the murders committed upon them, of the murders committed by them; for God was now making inquisition for the innocent blood shed in Jerusalem, which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4. Note, As sin will find out the sinner, so sorrow will sooner or later find out the secure.

CHAPTER V.

Reproofs for sin and threatenings of judgment are intermixed in this chapter, and are set the one over against the other; judgments are threatened, that the reproofs of sin might be the more effectual to bring them to repentance; sin is discovered, that God might be justified in the judgments threatened. I. The sins they are charged with are, very great injustice, ver. 1; hypocrisy in religion, ver. 2; incorrigibleness, ver. 3; both poor and rich, corrupt and debauched, ver. 4, 5; idolatry and adultery, ver. 7, 8; treacherous departures from God, ver. 11; and an impudent defiance of him, ver. 12, 13; and that which is at the bottom of all this, want of the fear of God, notwithstanding the frequent calls given them to fear him, ver. 20—24; and in the close of the chapter they are charged with violence and oppression, ver. 26—28; and a combination of those to debauch the nation that should have been active to reform it, ver. 30, 31. II. The judgments they are threatened with are very terrible: in general they shall be reckoned with, ver. 9, 29; a foreign enemy shall be brought in upon them, ver. 15—17; shall set guards upon them, ver. 6; shall destroy their fortifications, ver. 10; shall carry them away into captivity, ver. 19; and keep all good things from them, ver. 25; and herein the words of God's prophets shall be fulfilled, ver. 14. But, III. Here is an intimation, twice given, that God would in the midst of wrath remember mercy, and not utterly destroy them, ver. 10, 18. This was the scope and purport of Jeremiah's preaching in the latter end of Josiah's reign, and the beginning of Jehoiakim's, but the success did not answer expectation.

RUN ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem,
And see now, and know, and seek in the broad places thereof,
If ye can find a man,
If there be any that executeth judgment,
That seeketh the truth; and I will pardon it.
2 And though they say, The LORD liveth;
Surely they swear falsely.
3 O LORD, are not thine eyes upon the truth?
Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved;
Thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction:
They have made their faces harder than a rock;
They have refused to return.
4 Therefore I said,
Surely these are poor; they are foolish:
For they know not the way of the LORD,
Nor the judgment of their God.
5 I will get me unto the great men,
And will speak unto them;
For they have known the way of the LORD,
And the judgment of their God:
But these have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds.
6 Wherefore a lion out of the forest shall slay them,
And a wolf of the evenings shall spoil them,
A leopard shall watch over their cities:
Every one that goeth out thence shall be torn in pieces:
Because their transgressions are many,
And their backslidings are increased.
7 How shall I pardon thee for this?
Thy children have forsaken me,
And sworn by them that are no gods:
When I had fed them to the full, they then committed adultery,
And assembled themselves by troops in the harlots' houses.
8 They were as fed horses in the morning:
Every one neighed after his neighbour's wife.
9 Shall I not visit for these things? saith the LORD:
And shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?

Here is, First. A challenge to produce any one right honest man, or at least any considerable number of such, in Jerusalem, ver. 1. Jerusalem was become like the old world, in which all flesh had corrupted their way. There were some, perhaps, who flattered themselves with hopes that there were yet many good men in Jerusalem that would stand in the gap to turn away the wrath of God; and others that boasted of its being the holy city, and thought that would save it; but God bids them search the town, and they should scarce find a man in it that executes judgment, that makes conscience of what he saith and doth. Look in the streets, where they made their appearance, and conversed together, and in the broad places where they kept their markets; see if you can find a man, that is, a magistrate, (so some,) that executes judgment, and administers justice impartially; that will put the laws in execution against vice and profaneness. When the faithful thus cease and fail, it is time to cry, "Woe is me," Mic. vii. 1, 2, high time to cry, "Help, Lord," Ps. xii. 1. Or if there be here and there a man that is truly conscientious, and doth at least seek the truth, yet you shall not find him in the streets and broad places; he dares not appear publicly, for he shall be abused and run down; "Truth is fallen in the street," Isa. lix. 14, and is forced to seek for corners. So pleasing would it be to God to find any such, that for their sake he would pardon the city, if there were but ten righteous men in Sodom; if but one of a thousand, of ten thousand, in Jerusalem, it should be spared. See how ready God is to forgive, how swift to shew mercy. But it might be said, What do you make of those in Jerusalem that continue to make profession of religion, and relation to God? Are not those men for whose sakes Jerusalem may be spared? No, for they are not sincere in their profession; ver. 2, "They say the Lord liveth," and will swear by his name only, but they swear falsely; that is, 1. They are not sincere in the profession of respect they make to God, but are false to him; they honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him. 2. Though they appeal to God only, they make no conscience of calling him to witness to a lie; though they do not swear by idols, they forswear themselves, which is no less an affront to God, as the God of truth, than the other is as the only true God.

Secondly. A complaint which the prophet makes to God of the obstinacy and wilfulness of these people. God had appealed to their eyes, ver. 1, but here the prophet appeals to his eyes; ver. 3, "Are not thine eyes upon the truth?" Dost thou not see every man's true character? And is not this the truth of their character, that "they have made their faces harder than a rock?" Or, "Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward part;" but where is it to be found among the men of this generation? for though they say, "The Lord liveth," yet they never regard him. Thou hast stricken them with one affliction after another, but they have not grieved for the affliction; they have been as stocks and stones under it, much less have they grieved for the sin by which they have brought it upon themselves. Thou hast gone farther yet, hast consumed them, hast corrected them yet more severely; but they have refused to receive correction, to accommodate themselves to thy design in correcting them, and to answer it. They would not receive instruction by the correction; they have set themselves to outface the Divine sentence, and to outbrave the execution of it; for "they have made their faces harder than a rock." They cannot change countenance, neither blush for shame, nor look pale for fear; cannot be beaten back from the pursuit of their lusts, whatever check is given them; for though often called to it, they have refused to return, and would go forward, right or wrong, as the horse into the battle.

Thirdly. The trial made both of rich and poor, and the ill character given of both.

1. The poor were ignorant, and therefore they were wicked. He found many that refused to return, for whom he was willing to make the best excuse their case would bear, and it was this; ver. 4, "Surely, these are poor, they are foolish," they never had the advantage of a good education, nor have they wherewithal to help themselves now with the means of instruction; they are forced to work hard for their living, and have no time or capacity for reading or hearing, so that they "know not the way of the Lord, nor the judgments of their God;" they understand neither the way in which God by his precept will have them walk towards him nor the way in which he by his providence is walking towards them. Note, 1st. Prevailing ignorance is the lamentable cause of abounding impiety and iniquity. What can one expect but works of darkness from brutish, sottish people, that know nothing of God and religion, but choose to sit in darkness. 2nd. This is commonly a reigning sin among poor people. There are the devil's poor, as well as God's, who, notwithstanding their poverty, might know the way of the Lord so as to walk in it, and do their duty, without being book-learned; but they are willingly ignorant, and therefore their ignorance will not be their excuse.

2. The rich were insolent and haughty, and therefore they were wicked; ver. 5, "I will get me to the great men," and see if I can find them more pliable to the word and providence of God. I will speak to them, preach at court, in hopes to make some impression upon men of polite literature, but all in vain; for though they "know the way of the Lord, and the judgment of their God," yet they are too stiff to stoop to his government; "These have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds;" they know their Master's will, but are resolved to have their own will, "to walk in the way of their heart, and in the sight of their eyes." They think themselves too goodly to be controlled, too big to be corrected, even by the sovereign Lord of all himself. They are for breaking even his bands in sunder, Ps. ii. 3. The poor are weak, the rich are wilful, and so neither do their duty.

Fourthly. Some particular sins instanced which they were most notoriously guilty of, and which cried most loudly to Heaven for vengeance. "Their transgressions," indeed, "were many," of many kinds, and oft repeated, "and their backslidings were increased;" they added to the number of them, and grew more and more impudent in them, ver. 6. But two sins especially were justly to be looked upon as unpardonable crimes: 1. Their spiritual whoredom; giving that honour to idols which is due to God only; "Thy children have forsaken me," to whom they were born and dedicated, and under whom they have been brought up, and they have "sworn by them that are no gods;" have made their appeals to them, as if they had been omniscient, and their proper judges. This is here put for all acts of religious worship due to God only, but with which they had honoured their idols. They have sworn to them, so it may be read; have joined themselves to them, and covenanted with them. They that forsake God make an ill change for those that are no gods. 2. Their corporal whoredom. Because they had forsaken God, and served idols, he gave them up to vile affections; and they that dishonoured him were left to dishonour themselves and their own families. They committed adultery most scandalously, without sense of shame or fear of punishment; for they "assembled themselves by troops in the harlots' houses," and did not blush to be seen by one another in the most scandalous places. So impudent and violent was their lust, so impatient of check, and so eager to be gratified, that they became perfect beasts, ver. 8, like high-fed horses, they "neighed every one after his neighbour's wife," ver. 8. Unbridled lusts make men like natural brute beasts, such monstrous, odious things are they. And that which aggravated their sin was, that it was the abuse of God's favours to them; when they were fed to the full, then their lusts grew thus furious. Fulness of bread was fuel to the fire of Sodom's lusts. Sine Cerere et Baccho friget Venus,—'Luxurious living feeds the flame of lust.' Fasting would help to tame the unruly evil that is so full of deadly poison, and bring the body into subjection.

Fifthly. A threatening of God's wrath against them for their wickedness, and the universal debauchery of their land.

1. The particular judgment that is threatened, ver. 6. A foreign enemy shall break in upon them, and get dominion over them, and shall lay all waste. Their country shall be as if it were overrun and perfectly mastered by wild beasts. This enemy shall be, 1st. Like a lion of the forest, so strong, so furious, so irresistible; and he shall slay them. 2nd. Like a wolf of the evening, that comes out at night when he is hungry to seek his prey, and is very fierce and ravenous. And the noise both of the lions' roaring and the wolves' howling is very hideous. 3rd. Like a leopard, that is very swift and very cruel, and withal careful not to miss his prey. The army of the enemy shall watch over their cities so strictly as to put the inhabitants to this sad dilemma: if they stay in, they are starved; if they stir out, they are stabbed; "Every one that goeth out thence shall be torn in pieces;" which intimates, that in many places the enemy gave no quarter. And all this bloody work is owing to the multitude of their transgressions. It is sin that makes the great slaughter.

2. An appeal to themselves concerning the equity of it; ver. 9, "Shall I not visit for these things?" Can you yourselves think that the God whose name is Jealous will let such idolatries go unpunished? or that a God of infinite purity will connive at such abominable uncleanness? These are things that must be reckoned for, else the honour of God's government cannot be maintained, nor his laws saved from contempt; but sinners will be tempted to think him altogether such a one as themselves, contrary to that conviction of their own consciences concerning the judgment of God which it is necessary should be supported, that they which do such things are worthy of death, Rom. i. 32. Observe, When God punisheth sin, he is said to visit for it, or inquire into it; for he weighs the cause before he passeth sentence. Sinners have reason to expect punishment upon the account of God's holiness, to which sin is highly offensive, as well as upon the account of his justice, to which it renders us obnoxious; which is intimated in that, "Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" It is not only the word of God, but his soul, that takes vengeance; and he has national judgments wherewith to take vengeance for national sins. Such nations as this was cannot long go unpunished; "How shall I pardon thee for this?" ver. 7. Not but that those who have been guilty of these sins have found mercy with God as to their eternal state—Manasseh himself did, though so much accessory to the iniquity of those times; but nations, as such, being only rewardable and punishable in this life, it would not be for the glory of God to let a nation so very wicked as this pass without some manifest tokens of his displeasure.

10 Go ye up upon her walls, and destroy;
But make not a full end:
Take away her battlements;
For they are not the LORD's.
11 For the house of Israel and the house of Judah
Have dealt very treacherously against me, saith the LORD.
12 They have belied the LORD,
And said, It is not he;
Neither shall evil come upon us;
Neither shall we see sword nor famine:
13 And the prophets shall become wind,
And the word is not in them:
Thus shall it be done unto them.
14 Wherefore thus saith the Lord GOD of hosts,
Because ye speak this word,
Behold, I will made my words in thy mouth fire,
And this people wood, and it shall devour them.
15 Lo, I will bring a nation upon you from far,
O house of Israel, saith the LORD:
It is a mighty nation, it is an ancient nation,
A nation whose language thou knowest not,
Neither understandest what they say.
16 Their quiver is as an open sepulchre,
They are all mighty men.
17 And they shall eat up thine harvest, and thy bread,
Which thy sons and thy daughters should eat:
They shall eat up thy flocks and thine herds:
They shall eat up thy vines and thy fig trees:
They shall impoverish thy fenced cities,
Wherein thou trustedst, with the sword.
18 Nevertheless in those days, saith the LORD,
I will not make a full end with you.
19 And it shall come to pass, when ye shall say, [us?
Wherefore doeth the LORD our God all these things unto
Then shalt thou answer them,
Like as ye have forsaken me,
And served strange gods in your land,
So shall ye serve strangers in a land that is not your's.

We may observe in these verses, as before,

First. The sin of this people, upon which the commission signed against them is grounded. God disowns them, and dooms them to destruction, ver. 10. But is there not a cause? Yes; for, 1. They have deserted the law of God; ver. 11, "The house of Israel, and the house of Judah," though at variance with one another, yet both agreed to deal very treacherously against God. They forsook the worship of him, and therein violated their covenants with him; they revolted from him, and played the hypocrites with him. 2. They have defied the judgments of God, and given the lie to his threatenings in the mouth of his prophets, ver. 12, 13. They were often told that evil would certainly come upon them; they must expect some desolating judgments, sword or famine; but they were secure, and said, "We shall have peace, though we go on." For, 1st. They did not fear what God is. They belied him, and confronted the dictates even of natural light concerning him; for they said, It is not he; that is, he is not such a one as we have been made to believe he is; he doth not see, or not regard, or will not requite it; and therefore no evil shall come upon us. Multitudes are ruined by this; they are made to believe that God will not be so strict with them as his word saith he will. Nay, by this artifice Satan undid us all; "Ye shall not surely die;" ye shall not see sword or famine. Vain hopes of impunity are the deceitful support of all impiety. 2nd. They did not fear what God said. The prophets gave them fair warning, but they turned it off with a jest; they do but talk so because it is their trade. They are words of course, and words are but wind. It is not the word of the Lord that is in them, it is only the language of their melancholy fancy, or their ill-will to their country, because they are not preferred. Note, Impenitent sinners are not willing to own any thing to be the word of God that makes against them; that tends either to part them from or disquiet them in their sins. They threaten the prophets, "They shall become wind," shall pass away unregarded. And thus shall it be done unto them; what they threatened against us we will inflict upon them. Do they frighten us with famine? Let them be fed with the bread of affliction; so Micaiah was, 1 Kin. xxii. 27. Do they tell us of the sword? Let them perish by the sword, ch. ii. 30. Thus their mocking and misusing God's messengers filled the measure of their iniquity.

Secondly. The punishment of this people for their sin.

1. The threatenings they laughed at shall be executed; ver. 14, "Because ye speak this word" of contempt concerning the prophets, and the word in their mouths, therefore God will put honour upon them and their words; for not one iota or tittle of them shall fall to the ground, 1 Sam. iii. 19. Here God turns to the prophet Jeremiah, who had been thus bantered, and perhaps had been a little uneasy at it; "Behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire." God owns them for his words, though men denied them; and will as surely make them to take effect as the fire consumes combustible matter that is in its way; "The word shall be fire, and the people wood." Sinners, by sin, make themselves fuel to that wrath of God which is "revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," in the Scripture. The word of God will certainly be too hard for those that contend with it; they shall break that will not bow before it.

2. The enemy they thought themselves in no danger of shall be brought upon them. God gives them their commission; ver. 10, "Go ye up upon her walls;" mount them, trample upon them, tread them down. Walls of stone, before the Divine commission, shall be but mud walls. Having made yourselves masters of the walls, you may destroy at pleasure; you may "take away her battlements," and leave the fenced, fortified cities to lie open; for her battlements are not the Lord's; he doth not own them, and therefore will not protect and fortify them. They were not erected in his fear, nor with a dependence upon him. The people have trusted to them more than to God, and therefore they are not his. When the city is filled with sin, God will not patronize the fortifications of it, and then they are paper walls. What can defend us, when he who is our defence, and the defender of all our defences, is departed from us? Num. xiv. 9. What is not of God cannot stand, not stand long, not stand us in any stead.

3. What dreadful work these invaders should make is here described; ver. 15, "Lo, I will bring a nation upon you, O house of Israel." Note, God has all nations at his command, doth what he pleaseth with them, and makes what use he pleaseth of them. And sometimes he is pleased to make the nations of the earth, the heathen nations, a scourge to the house of Israel, when that is become a hypocritical nation. This nation of the Chaldeans is here said to be a remote nation; it is brought upon them from afar, and therefore will make the greater spoil, and the longer stay, that they may pay themselves well for so long a march. A nation that thou hast had no commerce with by reason of their distance, and therefore canst not expect to find favour with. God can bring trouble upon us from places and causes very remote. It is a mighty nation, that there is no making head against; an ancient nation, that value themselves upon their antiquity, and will therefore be the more haughty and imperious; it is "a nation whose language thou knowest not." They spoke the Syriac tongue, which the Jews at that time were not acquainted with; as appears, 2 Kin. xviii. 26. The difference of language would make it the more difficult to treat with them of peace: compare this with the threatening, Deu. xxviii. 49, which it seems to have a reference to; for the law and the prophets exactly agree. They are well armed; "Their quiver is as an open sepulchre;" that is, their arrows shall fly so thick, hit so sure, and wound so deep, that they shall be reckoned to breathe nothing but death and slaughter. They are able-bodied, all effective, mighty men, ver. 16; and when they have made themselves masters of the country they shall devour all before them, and reckon all their own that they can lay their hands on, ver. 17. 1st. They shall strip the country, shall not only sustain, but surfeit their soldiers with the rich products of this fruitful land. "They shall" not store up, (then it might possibly have been retrieved,) but "eat up thine harvest" in the field, "and thy bread" in the house, "which thy sons and thy daughters should eat." Note, What we have we have for our families, and it is a comfort to see our sons and daughters eating that which we have taken care and pains for; but a grievous vexation to see it devoured by strangers and enemies; to see their camps victualled with our stores, while those that are dear to us are perishing for want of it. This also is according to the curse of the law; Deu. xxviii. 33, "They shall eat up thy flocks and thy herds," out of which thou hast taken sacrifices for thine idols. They shall not leave thee the fruit of "thy vines and thy fig-trees." 2nd. They shall starve the towns; "They shall impoverish thy fenced cities," (and what fence against poverty when it comes like an armed man?) those cities wherein thou trustedst to be a protection to the country. Note, It is just with you to impoverish that which we make our confidence. They shall impoverish them with the sword, cutting off all provisions from coming to them, and intercepting trade and commerce, which will impoverish even fenced cities.

Thirdly. An intimation of the tender compassion God has yet for them. The enemy is commissioned to destroy and lay waste, but must not make a full end, ver. 10. Though they make a great slaughter, yet some must be left to live; and a great spoil, yet something must be left to live upon, for God hath said it, ver. 18, with a non obstante,—'a nevertheless,' to the present desolation; even in those days, as dismal as they are, "I will not make a full end with you;" and if God will not, the enemy shall not. God has mercy in store for this people, and therefore sets bounds to this desolating judgment; "Hitherto it shall come, and no farther."

Fourthly. The justification of God in these proceedings against them. As he will appear to be gracious in not making a full end with them, so he will appear to be righteous in coming so near it, and will have it acknowledged that he has done them no wrong, ver. 19. Observe, 1. A reason demanded, insolently demanded, by the people for these judgments. They will say, "Wherefore doth the Lord our God do all this unto us?" What provocation have we given him, or what quarrel has he with us? As if against such a sinful nation there did not appear cause enough of action. Note, Unhumbled hearts are ready to charge God with injustice in their afflictions, and pretend they are to seek for the cause of them, when it is written in the forehead of them. But, 2. Here is a reason presently assigned. The prophet is instructed what answer to give them, for God will be justified when he speaks, though he speaks with never so much terror. He must tell them that God doth this against them for what they have done against him, and they may, if they please, read their sin in their punishment. Do not they know very well that they have forsaken God, and therefore can they think it strange if he has forsaken them? Have they forgot how often they served strange gods in their own land, that good land, in the abundance of the fruits of which they ought to have served God with gladness of heart? and therefore is it not just with God to make them serve strangers in a strange land, where they can call nothing their own, as he had threatened to do? Deu. xxviii. 47, 48. They that are fond of strangers, to strangers let them go.

20 Declare this in the house of Jacob,
And publish it in Judah, saying, [ing;
21 Hear now this, O foolish people, and without understand-
Which have eyes, and see not;
Which have ears, and hear not:
22 Fear ye not me? saith the LORD:
Will ye not tremble at my presence,
Which have placed the sand for the bound of the sea
By a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it:
And though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail;
Though they roar, yet can they not pass over it?
23 But this people hath a revolting and a rebellious heart;

They are revolted and gone.
24 Neither say they in their heart,
Let us now fear the LORD our God, [season:
That giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in his
He reserveth unto us the appointed weeks of the harvest.

The prophet, having reproved them for sin, and threatened the judgments of God against them, is here sent to them again upon another errand, which he must publish in Judah. The purport of it is to persuade them to fear God, which would be an effectual principle of their reformation, as the want of that fear had been at the bottom of their apostacy.

First. He complains of the shameful stupidity of this people, and their bent to backslide from God, speaking as if he knew not what course to take with them. For,

1. Their understandings were darkened, and unapt to admit the rays of the Divine light. They are a "foolish people, and without understanding," they apprehend not the mind of God, though never so plainly discovered to them by the written word, by his prophets, and by his providence, ver. 21, "They have eyes but they see not, ears but they hear not," like the idols which they made and worshipped, Ps. cxv. 5, 6, 8. One would have thought they took notice of things, but really they did not; they had intellectual faculties and capacities, but they did not employ and improve them as they ought. Herein they disappointed the expectations of all their neighbours, who, observing what excellent means of knowledge they had, concluded, "Surely they are a wise and an understanding people," Deu. iv. 6, and yet really they are a "foolish people, and without understanding." Note, We cannot judge of men by the advantages and opportunities they enjoy. There are those that sit in darkness in a land of light, and live in sin even in a holy land; that are bad in the best places.

2. Their wills were stubborn and unapt to submit to the rules of the Divine law; ver. 23, "This people hath a revolting and a rebellious heart;" and no wonder, when they were "foolish and without understanding," Ps. lxxxii. 5. Nay, it is the corrupt bias of the will that bribes and besots the understanding; none so blind as those that will not see. The character of this people is the true character of all people by nature, till the grace of God has wrought a change: we are foolish, slow of understanding, and apt to mistake and forget; yet that is not the worst, we have "a revolting and a rebellious heart," a carnal mind, that is enmity against God, and is not in subjection to his law; not only revolting from him by a rooted aversion to that which is good, but rebellious against him by a strong inclination to that which is evil. Observe, The revolting heart is a rebellious one; they that withdraw from their allegiance to God stick not there, but, by siding in with sin and Satan, take up arms against him. "They are revolted and gone." The revolting heart will produce a revolting life; they are gone, and they will go, (so it may be read,) now nothing will be restrained from them, Gen. xi. 6.

Secondly. He ascribes this to the want of the fear of God. When he observes them to be without understanding, he asks, "Fear ye not me, saith the Lord, and will ye not tremble at my presence?" ver. 22. If you would but keep up an awe of God, you would be more observant of what he saith to you; and did you but understand yourselves better you would be more under the commanding rule of God's fear. When he observes that "they are revolted and gone," he adds this as the root and cause of their apostacy, ver. 24, "Neither say they in their hearts, Let us now fear the Lord our God." Therefore so many bad thoughts come into their minds, and hurry them to that which is evil, because they will not admit and entertain good thoughts, and particularly not this good thought, "Let us now fear the Lord our God." It is true it is God's work to put his fear into our hearts, but it is our work to stir up ourselves to fear him, and to fasten upon those considerations which are proper to affect us with a holy awe of him; and it is because we do not do this that our hearts are so destitute of his fear as they are, and so apt to revolt and rebel.

Thirdly. He suggests some of those things which are proper to possess us with a holy fear of God.

1. We must fear the Lord and his greatness, ver. 22. Upon this account he demands our fear: shall we not tremble at his presence, and be afraid of affronting him, or trifling with him, who in the kingdom of nature and providence gives such incontestable proofs of his almighty power and sovereign dominion. Here is one instance given of very many that might be given: he keeps the sea within compass; though the tides flow with a mighty strength twice every day, and if they should flow on a while would drown the world; though in a storm the billows rise high and dash to the shore with incredible force and fury, yet they are under check; they return, they retire, and no harm is done. "This is the Lord's doing," and it would be marvellous if it were not common in our eyes. He has "placed the sand for the bound of the sea," not only for a mere-stone to mark out how far it may come and where it must stop, but as a bound or fence to put a stop to it. A wall of sand shall be as effectual as a wall of brass to check the flowing waves, when God is pleased to make it so; nay, that is chosen rather to teach us that a soft answer, like the soft sand, turns away wrath, and quiets the foaming rage, when grievous words, like hard rocks, do but exasperate and make the waters cast forth so much the more mire and dirt. This bound is placed "by a perpetual decree," 'by an ordinance of antiquity,' so some read it; and then it sends us as far back as the creation of the world, when God divided between the sea and the dry land, and fixed marches between them, Gen. i. 9, 10; which is elegantly described, Ps. civ. 6, &c., and Job xxxviii. 8, &c.; or to the period of Noah's flood, when God promised that he would never drown the world again, Gen. ix. 11; an ordinance of perpetuity, so our translation takes it. It is a perpetual decree; it has had its effect all along to this day, and shall still continue, till day and night come to an end. This perpetual decree the waters of the sea cannot pass over or break through. "Though the waves thereof toss themselves," as the troubled sea doth when it cannot rest, "yet can they not prevail;" "though they roar" and rage as if they were vexed at the check given them, "yet can they not pass over it." Now this is a good reason why we should fear God; for, 1st. By this we see that he is a God of almighty power and universal sovereignty, and therefore to be feared and had in reverence. 2nd. This shews us how easily he could drown the world again, and how much we continually lie at his mercy, and therefore we should be afraid of making him our enemy. 3rd. Even the unruly waves of the sea observe his decree, and retreat at his check; and shall not we then? Why are our hearts revolting and rebellious, when the sea neither revolts nor rebels?

2. We must fear the Lord and his goodness, Hos. iii. 5. The instances of this, as of the former, are fetched from God's common providence, ver. 24; we must fear the Lord our God, that is, we must worship him and give him glory, and be always in care to keep ourselves in his love, because he is continually doing us good. He gives us "both the former and the latter" rain; the former a little after seedness, the latter a little before harvest, and both in their season; and by this means "he reserves to us the appointed weeks of harvest." Harvest is reckoned by weeks, because in a few weeks enough is gathered to serve for sustenance the year round. The weeks of harvest are appointed us by the promise of God, that seedtime and harvest shall not fail; and in performance of that promise they are reserved to us by the Divine providence, otherwise we should come short of them. In harvest mercies, therefore, God is to be acknowledged, his power, and goodness, and faithfulness, for they all come from him. And it is a good reason why we should fear him, that we may keep ourselves in his love, because we have such a necessary dependence upon him. The fruitful seasons were witnesses for God, even to the heathen world, sufficient to leave them inexcusable in their contempt of him, Acts xiv. 17; and yet the Jews, who had the written word to explain their testimony by, were not wrought upon to fear the Lord, though it appears how much it is our interest to do so.

25 Your iniquities have turned away these things,
And your sins have withholden good things from you.
26 For among my people are found wicked men:
They lay wait, as he that setteth snares;
They set a trap, they catch men.
27 As a cage is full of birds,
So are their houses full of deceit:
Therefore they are become great, and waxen rich.
28 They are waxen fat, they shine:
Yea, they overpass the deeds of the wicked:
They judge not the cause,
The cause of the fatherless, yet they prosper;
And the right of the needy do they not judge.
29 Shall I not visit for these things? saith the LORD:
Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?
30 A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land;
31 The prophets prophesy falsely,
And the priests bear rule by their means;
And my people love to have it so:
And what will ye do in the end thereof?

Here, First. The prophet shews them what mischief their sins had done them; they "have turned away these things," ver. 25, namely, the former and the latter rain, which they used to have in due season, ver. 24, but had of late been withheld, ch. iii. 3, by reason of which the appointed weeks of harvest had sometimes disappointed them. It is your sin that has withholden good from you, when God was ready to bestow it upon you. Note, It is sin that stops the current of God's favour to us, and deprives us of the blessings we used to receive. It is that that makes the heavens as brass, and the earth as iron.

Secondly. He shews them how great their sins were, how heinous and very provoking. When they had forsaken the worship of the true God, even moral honesty was lost among them; "Among my people are found wicked men," ver. 26; some of the worst of men, and so much the worse they were, in that they were found among God's people.

1. They were spiteful and malicious. Such are properly wicked men, men that delight in doing mischief; they were found, that is, caught in the very act of their wickedness. As hunters or fowlers lay snares for their game, so did they lie in wait to catch men, and made a sport of it, and took as much pleasure in it as if they had been entrapping beasts or birds. They contrived ways of doing mischief to good people, whom they hated for their goodness, especially to those that faithfully reproved them, Isa. xxix. 21; or to those that stood in the way of their preferment, or that they apprehended had affronted them, or done them a diskindness, or to those whose estates they coveted; so Jezebel ensnared Naboth for his vineyard; nay, they did mischief for mischief sake.

2. They were false and treacherous; ver. 27, "As a cage" or coop "is full of birds," and of food for them, to fatten them for the table, "so are their houses full of deceit," that is, of wealth gotten by fraudulent practices, or of arts and methods of defrauding. All the business of their families is done with deceit; whoever deals with them they will cheat them if they can, which is easily done by those who make no conscience of what they say and do. Herein "they overpass the deeds of the wicked," ver. 28. Those that act by deceit, with a colour of law and justice, do more mischief perhaps than those wicked men, ver. 26, that carried all before them by open force and violence; or, they are worse than the heathen themselves, yea, the worst of them. And, would you think it, they prosper in these wicked courses? and therefore their hearts are hardened in them. They are greedy of the world, because they find it flows in upon them, and they stick not at any wickedness in pursuit of it, because they find it is so far from hindering their prosperity, that it furthers it. "They are become great" in the world, "they are waxen rich," and thrive upon it. They have wherewithal to make provision for the flesh, to fulfil all the lusts of it, to which they are very indulgent, so that they are waxen fat with living at ease, and bathing themselves in all the delights of sense; they are sleek and smooth, and shine; they look fair and gay, and every body admires them. And they pass by matters of evil, (so some read the following words,) that is, they escape the evils which one would expect their sins should bring upon them, "They are not in trouble as other men," much less as ill men, Ps. lxxiii. 5, &c.

3. When they were grown great, and had got power in their hands, they did not do that good with it which they ought to have done, "They judge not the cause, the cause of the fatherless, and the right of the needy." The fatherless are often needy, always need assistance and advice, and advantage is taken of their helpless condition to do them an injury. Who should succour them then but the great and rich? What have men wealth for but to do good with it? But these would take no cognizance of any such distressed cases; they had not so much sense of justice or compassion for the injured. Or if they did concern themselves in the cause, it was not to do right, but to protect them that did wrong. And "yet they prosper" still; God layeth not folly to them. Certainly, then, the things of this world are not the best things, for oftentimes the worst men have the most of them; yet we are not to think that because they prosper God allows of their practices. No; though sentence against their evil works be not executed speedily, it will be executed.

4. There was a general corruption of all orders and degrees of men among them; ver. 30, 31, "A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land." The degeneracy of such a people, so privileged and advanced, was a wonderful thing, and to be admired. How could they ever break through so many obligations? It was a horrible thing, and to be detested, and the consequences of it dreaded. To frighten ourselves from sin, let us call it a horrible thing. Why what was the matter? In short this: 1st. The leaders misled the people, the prophets prophesy falsely, counterfeited a commission from heaven, when they were factors for hell. Religion is never more dangerously attacked than under colour and pretence of Divine revelation. But why did not the priests, who had power in their hands for that purpose, restrain these false prophets? Alas! instead of doing that they made use of them as the tools of their ambition and tyranny; they "bear rule by their means," they supported themselves in their grandeur and wealth, their laziness and luxury, their impositions and oppressions, by the help of the false prophets and their interest in the people. Thus they were in a combination against every thing that was good, and strengthened one another's hands in evil. 2nd. The people were well enough pleased to be so misled; They are my people, saith God, and should have stood up for me, and borne their testimony against the wickedness of their priests and prophets, but they love to have it so. If the priests and prophets will let them alone in their sins, they will give them no disturbance in theirs. They love to be ridden with a loose rein, and like those rulers very well that will not restrain their lusts, and those teachers that will not reprove them.

Thirdly. He shews them how fatal the consequences of this would certainly be. Let them consider,

1. What the reckoning would be for their wickedness; ver. 29, "Shall not I visit for these things," as before, ver. 9. Sometimes mercy rejoiceth against judgment; "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" Here judgment is reasoning against mercy, "Shall I not visit?" We are sure Infinite Wisdom knows how to accommodate the matter between them. The manner of the expression is very emphatical, and speaks, 1st. The certainty and necessity of God's judgments; "Shall not my soul be avenged?" Yes, without doubt vengeance will come, it must come, if the sinner repents not. 2nd. The justice and equity of God's judgments. He appeals to the sinner's own conscience. Do not they deserve to be punished that have been guilty of such abominations? Shall he not be avenged on such a nation, such a wicked, provoking nation as this?

2. What the direct tendency of their wickedness was; "What will ye do in the end thereof?" That is, 1st. What a pitch of wickedness will you come to at last! "What will you do?" What will ye not do that is base and wicked? What will this grow to? You will certainly grow worse and worse, till you have filled up the measure of your iniquity. 2nd. What a pit of destruction will you come to at last! When things are brought to such a pass as this, as nothing can be expected from you but a deluge of sin, so nothing can be expected from God but a deluge of wrath, and what will ye do when that comes? Note, Those that walk in ill ways would do well to consider the tendency of them both to greater sin and utter ruin. An end will come, the end of a wicked life will come, when it will be all called over again, and without doubt will be bitterness in the latter end.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter, as before, we have, I. A prophecy of the invading of the land of Judah and the besieging of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, ver. 1—6; with the spoils they should make of the country, ver. 9; and the terror which all should be seized with on that occasion, ver. 22—26. II. An account of those sins of Judah and Jerusalem which provoked God to bring this desolating judgment upon them. Their oppression, ver. 7; their contempt of the word of God, ver. 10—12; their worldliness, ver. 13; the treachery of their prophets, ver. 14; their impudence in sin, ver. 15; their obstinacy against reproofs, ver. 18, 19; which made their sacrifices unacceptable to him, ver. 20; and for which he gave them up to ruin, ver. 21; but tried them first, ver. 27; and then rejected them as irreclaimable, ver. 28—30. III. Good counsel given them in the midst of all this, but in vain, ver. 8, 16, 17.

O YE children of Benjamin, gather yourselves
To flee out of the midst of Jerusalem,
And blow the trumpet in Tekoa,
And set up a sign of fire in Beth-haccerem:
For evil appeareth out of the north,
And great destruction.
2 I have likened the daughter of Zion
To a comely and delicate woman.
3 The shepherds with their flocks shall come unto her;
They shall pitch their tents against her round about;
They shall feed every one in his place.
4 Prepare ye war against her;
Arise, and let us go up at noon.
Woe unto us! for the day goeth away,
For the shadows of the evening are stretched out.
5 Arise, and let us go by night,
And let us destroy her palaces.
6 For thus hath the LORD of hosts said,
Hew ye down trees,
And cast a mount against Jerusalem:
This is the city to be visited;
She is wholly oppression in the midst of her
7 As a fountain casteth out her waters,
So she casteth out her wickedness:
Violence and spoil is heard in her;
Before me continually is grief and wounds
8 Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem,
Lest my soul depart from thee;
Lest I make thee desolate, a land not inhabited.

Here is, First. Judgment threatened against Judah and Jerusalem. That city, that country, were at this time secure, and under no apprehension of danger; they saw no cloud gathering, but every thing looked safe and serene. But the prophet tells them they should shortly be invaded by a foreign power; an army should be brought against them from the north, which should lay all waste, and should cause not only a general consternation, but a general desolation. It is here foretold,

1. That the alarm of this should be loud and terrible. This is represented, ver. 1. The children of Benjamin, in which tribe part of Jerusalem lay, are here called to shift for their own safety in the country; for the city, to which it was first thought advisable for them to flee, ch. iv. 5, 6, would soon be made too hot for them, and they would find it the wisest course to flee out of the midst of it. It is common in public frights for people to think any place safer than that where they are; and therefore those in the city are for shifting into the country, in hopes there to escape out of danger; and those in the country are for shifting into the city, in hopes there to make head against the danger; but it is all in vain when evil pursueth sinners with commission. They are told to send the alarm into the country, and to do what they could for their own safety. "Blow the trumpet in Tekoa," a city which lay twelve miles north from Jerusalem. Let them be stirred up to stand upon their guard. "Set up a sign of fire," that is, kindle the beacons, "in Beth-haccerem," the 'house of the vineyard,' which lay on a hill between Jerusalem and Tekoa. Prepare to make a vigorous resistance, for the "evil appeareth out of the north." This may be taken ironically. Betake yourselves to the best methods you can think of for your own preservation, but all shall be in vain; for when you have done your best it will be a great destruction, for it is in vain to contend with God's judgments.

2. That the attempt upon them should be bold and formidable, and such as they should be a very unequal match for. 1st. See what the daughter of Zion is, on whom the assault is made. She is likened to a comely and delicate woman, ver. 2, bred up in everything that is nice and soft, that will not set so much as the "sole of her foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy," Deu. xxviii. 56, nor suffer the winds to blow upon her; and being not accustomed to hardship, she will be the less able either to resist the enemy,—for those that make war must endure hardness,—or to bear the destruction with that patience that is necessary to make it any thing tolerable. The more we indulge ourselves in the pleasures of this life the more we disfit ourselves for the troubles of this life. 2nd. See what the daughter of Babylon is, by whom the assault is made. The generals and their armies are compared to shepherds and their flocks, ver. 3; in such numbers and in such order did they come; the soldiers following their leaders as the sheep their shepherds. The daughter of Zion dwelt at home, so some read it, expecting to be courted with love, but was invaded with fury. This comparing of the enemies to shepherds inclines me to embrace another reading which some give of ver. 2. The daughter of Zion is like a comely pasture-ground, and a delicate land, which invites the shepherds to bring their flocks thither to graze; and as the shepherds easily make themselves masters of an open field that—as was usual then in some parts—lies common, owned by none, pitch their tents in it, and their flocks presently eat it bare, so shall the Chaldean army easily break in upon the land of Judah, force for themselves a free quarter where they please, and in a little time devour all. For the farther illustration of this he shews,

First. How God shall commission them to make this destruction even of the holy land and the holy city, that were his peculiar. It is he that saith, ver. 4, "Prepare ye war against her;" for he is the Lord of hosts, that hath all hosts at his command, and he hath said, ver. 6, "Hew ye down trees, and cast a mount against Jerusalem," in order to the attacking of it. The Chaldeans have great power against Judah and Jerusalem, and yet they have no power but what is given them from above. God has marked out Jerusalem for destruction: he hath said, "This is the city to be visited," visited in wrath, visited by the Divine justice, and this is the time of her visitation. Those that are careless and secure in sinful ways, the day is coming when they will be visited.

Secondly. How they shall animate themselves and one another to execute that commission. God's counsels being against Jerusalem, which cannot be altered or disannulled, the councils of war which the enemies held are made to agree with his counsels. God having said, "Prepare war against her," their determinations are made subservient to his; and notwithstanding the distance of place, and the many difficulties that lie in the way, it is soon resolved, nemine contradicente,—'unanimously,' "Arise, and let us go." Note, It is good to see how the counsel and decree of God is pursued and executed in the devices and designs of men, even theirs that know him not, Isa. x. 6, 7. In this campaign, 1*st*. They resolve to be very expeditious. They have no sooner resolved upon it, but they address themselves to it. It shall never be said they left any thing to be done towards it to morrow which they could do to day. "Arise, let us go up at noon," though it be in the heat of the day; nay, ver. 5, "Arise, let us go by night," though it be in the dark; nothing shall hinder them, they are resolved to lose no time. They are described as men in care to make dispatch; ver. 4, "Woe unto us, for the day goes away," and we are not going on with our work. "The shadows of the evening are stretched out," and we sit still, and slip the opportunity. O that we were thus eager in our spiritual work and warfare! thus afraid of losing time, or an opportunity in taking the kingdom of heaven by violence. It is folly to trifle when we have an eternal salvation to work out, and the enemies of that salvation to fight against. 2*nd*. They doubt not but to be very successful. "Let us go up" and let us destroy her palaces, and make ourselves masters of the wealth that is in them. It was not that they might fulfil God's counsels, but that they might fill their own treasures, that they were thus eager, yet God thereby served his own purposes.

Secondly. The cause of this judgment assigned. It is all for their wickedness, they have brought it upon themselves; they must bear it, for they must bear the blame of it. They are thus oppressed, because they have been oppressors; they have dealt hardly with one another, each in their turns, as they have had power and advantage, and now the enemy shall come and deal hardly with them all. This sin of oppression, and violence, and wrong doing, is here charged upon them, 1. As a national sin, ver. 6; therefore this city is to be visited. It is time to make inquisition, for "she is wholly oppression in the midst of her." All orders and degrees of men, from the prince on the throne to the meanest master of a shop, were oppressive to those that were under them. Look which way you will, and there were causes for complaints of this kind. 2. As a sin that was become in a manner natural to them, ver. 7. She casts out wickedness, in all the instances of malice and mischievousness, "as a fountain casteth out her waters." so plentifully and constantly; the streams are bitter and poisonous like the fountain. The waters out of the fountain will not be restrained, but will find or force their way; nor will they be checked by laws or conscience in their violent proceedings. This is fitly applied to the corrupt heart of man in his natural state; that casts out wickedness, one evil imagination or other, as a fountain casts out her waters, naturally and easily; it is always flowing and yet always full. 3. As that which was become a constant practice with them; "violence and spoil is heard in her." The cry of it is come up before God as that of Sodom: "Before me continually is grief and wounds." The complaint of those that find themselves aggrieved, being unjustly wounded in their bodies or spirits, in their estates or reputation. Note, He that is the common Parent of mankind regards and resents, and sooner or later will revenge, the mischiefs and wrongs that men do to one another.

Thirdly. The counsel given them how to prevent this judgment. Fair warning is given now upon the whole matter; "Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem," ver. 8; receive the instruction given thee both by the law of God and by his prophets; be wise at length for thyself. They knew very well what they had been instructed to do, nothing remained but to do it; for till then they cannot be said to be instructed. The reason for this counsel is taken from the inevitable ruin they run upon, if they refused to comply with the instructions given them. "Lest my soul depart," or be disjointed from thee. This intimates what a tender affection and concern God had had for them; his very soul had been joined to them, and nothing but sin could disjoin it. Note, 1. The God of mercy is loath to depart even from a provoking people, and is earnest with them, by true repentance and reformation, to prevent things coming to that extremity. 2. Their case is very miserable from whom God's soul is disjoined. It intimates the loss, not only of their outward blessings, but of those comforts and favours which are the more immediate and peculiar tokens of his love and presence. Compare this with that dreadful word, Heb. x. 38, "If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him." 3. Those whom God forsakes are certainly undone. When God's soul departs from Jerusalem, she soon becomes desolate and uninhabited, Mat. xxiii. 38.

9 Thus saith the LORD of hosts,
They shall throughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine:
Turn back thine hand as a grapegatherer into the baskets.
10 To whom shall I speak,
And give warning, that they may hear?
Behold, their ear is uncircumcised,
And they cannot hearken:
Behold, the word of the LORD is unto them a reproach;
They have no delight in it.
11 Therefore I am full of the fury of the LORD;
I am weary with holding in:
I will pour it out upon the children abroad,
And upon the assembly of young men together:
For even the husband with the wife shall be taken,
The aged with him that is full of days.
12 And their houses shall be turned unto others,
With their fields and wives together:
For I will stretch out my hand
Upon the inhabitants of the land, saith the LORD.
13 For from the least of them even unto the greatest of them
Every one is given to covetousness;
And from the prophet even unto the priest
Every one dealeth falsely.
14 They have healed also the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly,
Saying, Peace, peace;
When there is no peace.
15 Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination?
Nay, they were not at all ashamed,
Neither could they blush:
Therefore they shall fall among them that fall:
At the time that I visit them they shall be cast down,
saith the LORD.
16 Thus saith the LORD,
Stand ye in the ways, and see,
And ask for the old paths,
Where is the good way, and walk therein,
And ye shall find rest for your souls.
But they said, We will not walk therein
17 Also I set watchmen over you,
Saying, Hearken to the sound of the trumpet
But they said, We will not hearken.

GRAPE-GATHERERS AND BASKETS.

The heads of this paragraph are the very same with those of the last; for precept must be upon precept, and line upon line.

First. The ruin of Judah and Jerusalem is here threatened. We had before the haste which the Chaldean army made to the war, ver. 4, 5. Now here we have the havoc made by the war. How lamentable are the desolations here described! The enemy shall so long quarter among them, and be so insatiable in their thirst after blood and treasure, that they shall seize all they can meet with, and what escapes them one time shall fall into their hands another; ver. 9, "They shall thoroughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine." As the grapegatherer, that is resolved to leave none behind, still turns back his hand into the baskets to put more in, till he has gathered all, so shall they be picked up by the enemy, though dispersed, though hid, and none of them shall escape their eye and hand. Perhaps this people, being given to covetousness, ver. 13, had not observed the law of God, which forbade them to "glean all their grapes," Lev. x. 19, and now they themselves shall be in like manner thoroughly gleaned, and shall either fall by the sword, or go into captivity. This is explained, ver. 11, 12, where God's fury and his hand are said to be poured out and stretched out, in the fury and by the hand of the Chaldeans; for even wicked men are often made use of as God's hand, Ps. xvii. 14; and in their anger we may see God angry. Now see on whom the fury is poured out in full vials. Upon the children abroad or in the streets where they are playing, Zec. viii. 5, or whither they run out innocently to look about them; the sword of the merciless Chaldeans shall not spare them, ch. ix. 21. The children perish in the calamity which the fathers' sins have procured. The execution shall likewise reach the assembly of young men, their merry meetings, their clubs which they keep up to strengthen one another's hands in wickedness, they shall be cut off together. Nor shall those only fall into the enemies' hands that meet for lewdness, ch. v. 7, but "even the husband with the wife shall be taken," these two in bed together, and neither left, but both taken prisoners. And as they have no compassion for the weak but fair sex, so they have none for the decrepid but venerable age. The old with the full of days, whose deaths can contribute no more to their safety than their lives to their service, that are not in a capacity to do them either good or harm, yet they shall be either cut off or carried off. Their houses shall then be turned to others, ver. 12, the conquerors shall dwell in their habitations, use their goods, and live upon their stores. Their fields and wives shall fall together into their hands, as was threatened, Deu. xxviii. 28, 30, &c. For God "stretcheth out his hand upon the inhabitants of the land," and none can go out of the reach of it. Now as to this denunciation of God's wrath, 1. The prophet justifies himself in preaching thus terribly, for herein he dealt faithfully; ver. 11, "And I am full of the fury of the Lord," full of the thoughts and apprehensions of it, and am carried out with a powerful impulse, by the spirit of prophecy, to speak of it thus vehemently. He took no delight in threatening, nor was it any pleasure to him with such sermons as these to make those about him uneasy; but he could not contain himself, he was "weary with holding in." He suppressed it as long as he could, as long as he durst, but he was so "full of power by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts," that he must speak, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear. Note, When ministers preach the terrors of the Lord according to the Scripture, we have no reason to be displeased at them; for they are but messengers, and must deliver their message, pleasing or unpleasing. 2. He condemns the false prophets, who preached plausibly, for therein they flattered people and dealt unfaithfully; ver. 13, 14, "The priest and the prophet," that should be their watchmen and monitors, have dealt falsely, have not been true to their trust, nor told the people their faults, and the dangers they were in. They should have been their physicians, but murdered their patients by letting them have their wills, and giving them every thing they had a mind to, and flattering them into an opinion that they were in no danger; ver. 14, "They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly," or 'according to the cure of some slight hurt;' skinning over the wound, and never searching it to the bottom; applying lenitives only when there was need of corrosives; soothing people in their sins, and giving them opiates to make them easy for the present, while the disease was preying upon the vitals. They said, "Peace, peace," all shall be well; if there were some thinking people among them, that were awake, and apprehensive of danger, they soon stopped their mouths with their priestly and prophetical authority, boldly averring that neither church nor state was in any danger, when there is no peace, because they go on in their idolatries and daring impieties. Note, Those are to be reckoned our false friends, that is, our worst and most dangerous enemies, that flatter us in a sinful way.

Secondly, The sin of Judah and Jerusalem is here discovered which provoked God to bring this ruin upon them, and justified him in it

1. They would by no means bear to be told of their faults, nor of the danger they were in. God bids the prophet give them warning of the judgment coming, ver. 9; but, saith he, "To whom shall I speak and give warning?" I cannot find out any that will so much as give me a patient hearing; I may give warning long enough, but here is nobody that will take warning. I cannot speak that they may hear, cannot speak to any purpose, or with any hope of success; for their ear is uncircumcised, it is carnal and fleshly, indisposed to receive the voice of God, so that they cannot hearken. They have, as it were, a thick skin grown over the organs of hearing, so that Divine things might to as much purpose be spoken to a stone as to them. Nay, they are not only deaf to it, but prejudiced against it; therefore they cannot hear, because they are resolved they will not. "The word of the Lord is unto them a reproach." Both the reproofs and the threatenings of the word are so; they reckon themselves wronged and affronted by both, and resent the prophet's plain dealing with them as they would the most causeless slander and calumny. This was kicking against the pricks, Acts ix. 5, as the lawyers against the word of Christ, Lu. xi. 45, "Thus saying thou reproachest us also." Note, Those reproofs that are counted reproaches, and hated as such, will certainly be turned into the heaviest woes. When it is here said, "They have no delight in the word," more is implied than is expressed; they have an antipathy to it, their hearts rise at it; it exasperates them, and enrages their corruptions, and they are ready to fly in the face, and pull out the eyes of their reprovers. And how can those expect that the word of the Lord should speak any comfort to them who have no delight in it, but would rather be anywhere than within hearing of it?

2. They were inordinately set upon the world, and wholly carried away by the love of it; ver. 13, "From the least of them even to the greatest," old and young, rich and poor, high and low, those of all ranks, professions, and employments, every one is given to covetousness, greedy of filthy lucre, all for what they can get, per fas per nefas,—'right or wrong,' and this made them oppressive and violent, ver. 6, 7; for of that evil, as well as others, the love of money is the bitter root. Nay, and this hardened their hearts against the word of God and his prophets; they were the covetous Pharisees that derided Christ, Lu. xvi. 14.

3. They were become impudent in sin, and past shame. After such a high charge of flagrant crimes proved upon them, it was very proper to ask, ver. 15, "Were they ashamed when they had committed" all these "abominations," which are such a reproach to their reason and religion? Did they blush at the conviction, and acknowledge that confusion of face belonged to them? If so, there is some hopes of them yet. But, alas! there did not appear so much as this colour of virtue among them; their hearts were so hardened, that "they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush," they had so brazened their faces. They even gloried in their wickedness, and openly confronted the convictions that should have humbled them, and brought them to repentance. They resolved to face it out against God himself, and not to own their guilt. Some refer it to the priests and prophets, that had healed the people slightly, and told them they should have peace, and yet were not ashamed of their treachery and falsehood, no, not when the event disproved them, and gave them the lie. Those that are shameless are graceless, and their case hopeless. But they that will not submit to a penitential shame, nor take that to themselves as their due, shall not escape an utter ruin; for so it follows, "therefore they shall fall among them that fall," they shall have their portion with those that are quite undone; and when God visits the nation in wrath they shall be sure to be cast down, and be made to tremble, because they would not blush. Note, Those that sin, and cannot blush for it, it is ill with them now, and will be worse with them shortly. At first they hardened themselves and would not blush, afterwards they were so hardened that they could not. Quod unum habebant in malis bonum perdant, peccandi verecundiam,—'They have lost the only good property which once blended itself with many bad ones, that is, shame for having done amiss.'—Senec. de Vit. Beat.

Thirdly. They are put in mind of the good counsel which had been often given them, but in vain. They had a great deal said to them to little purpose,

1. By way of advice concerning their duty, ver. 16. God had been used to say to them, "Stand in the ways, and see." That is, 1st. He would have them to consider, not to proceed rashly, but do as travellers in the road, who are in care to find the right way, which will bring them to their journey's end, and therefore pause, and inquire for it. If they have any reason to think they have missed their way they are not easy till they have got satisfaction. O that men would be thus wise for their souls, and would ponder the path of their feet, as those that believe lawful and unlawful are of no less consequence to us than the right way and the wrong is to a traveller. 2nd. He would have them to consult antiquity, the observations and experiences of those that went before them; "Ask for the old paths;" "Enquire of the former age," Job viii. 8; "Ask thy father, thy elders," Deu. xxxii. 7, and thou wilt find that the way of godliness and righteousness hath always been the way that God hath owned and blessed, and in which men have prospered. "Ask for the old paths," that is, the paths prescribed by the law of God, the written word, that true standard of antiquity. Ask for the paths that the patriarchs travelled in before you, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob; and, as you hope to inherit the promises made to them, tread in their steps. "Ask for the old paths, where is the good way?" We must not be guided purely by antiquity, as if the plea of prescription and long usage were alone sufficient to justify our path; no, there is an "old way, which wicked men have trodden," Job xxii. 15. But when we ask for the old paths, it is only in order to find out the good way, the highway of the upright. Note, The way of religion and godliness is a good old way, the way that all the saints in all ages have walked in. 3rd. He would have them to resolve to act according to the result of these inquiries; When you have found out which is the good way, walk therein; practise accordingly, keep close to that way, proceed and persevere in it. Some make this counsel to be given them with reference to the struggles that were between the true and false prophets, between those that said they should have peace and those that told them trouble was at the door. They pretended they knew not which to believe; "Stand in the way," saith God, and see, and inquire which of these two agrees with the written word, and the usual methods of God's providence, which of these directs you to the good way, and do accordingly. 4th. He assures them that if they do thus it will secure the welfare and satisfaction of their own souls; "Walk in the good old way," and you will find that your walking in that way will be easy and pleasant; you will enjoy both your God and yourselves; and the way will lead you to true rest. Though it cost you some pains to walk in that way, you will find an abundant recompence at your journey's end. 5th. He laments it, that this good counsel, which was so rational in itself, and so proper for them, could not find acceptance; "But they said, We will not walk therein." Not only we will not be at the pains to inquire which is the good way, the good old way; but when it is told us, and we have nothing to say to the contrary, but that it is the right way, yet we will not deny ourselves and our own humours so far as to walk in it. Thus multitudes are ruined for ever by downright wilfulness.

2. By way of admonition concerning their danger. Because they would not be ruled by fair reasoning, God takes another method with them; by lesser judgments he threatens greater, and sends his prophets to give them this explication of them, and to frighten them with an apprehension of the danger they were in; ver. 17, "Also I set watchmen over you." God's ministers are watchmen, and it is a great mercy to have them set over us in the Lord. Now observe here, 1st. The fair warning given by these watchmen. This was the burden of their song, they cried again and again, "Hearken to the sound of the trumpet." God in his providence sounds the trumpet, Zec. viii. 14. The watchmen hear it themselves, and are affected with it, ch. iv. 19; and they are to call upon others to hearken to it too, to hear the Lord's controversy, to observe the voice of providence, to improve it, and answer the intentions of it. 2nd. This fair warning slighted. "But they said, We will not hearken;" we will not hear, we will not heed, we will not believe; the prophets may as well save themselves and us the trouble. The reason why sinners perish is because they "do not hearken to the sound of the trumpet;" and the reason why they do not is because they will not; and they have no reason to give why they will not but because they will not, that is, they are herein most unreasonable. One may easier deal with ten men's reasons than one man's will.

18 Therefore hear, ye nations, and know, O congregation,
What is among them.
19 Hear, O earth:
Behold, I will bring evil upon this people,
Even the fruit of their thoughts,
Because they have not hearkened unto my words,
Nor to my law, but rejected it.
20 To what purpose cometh there to me incense from Sheba,
And the sweet cane from a far country?
Your burnt offerings are not acceptable,
Nor your sacrifices sweet unto me.
21 Therefore thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I will lay stumblingblocks before this people,
And the fathers and the sons together shall fall upon them;
The neighbour and his friend shall perish.
22 Thus saith the LORD,
Behold, a people cometh from the north country,
And a great nation shall be raised from the sides of the earth.
23 They shall lay hold on bow and spear;
They are cruel, and have no mercy;
Their voice roareth like the sea;
And they ride upon horses,
Set in array as men for war
Against thee, O daughter of Zion.
24 We have heard the fame thereof:
Our hands wax feeble:
Anguish hath taken hold of us,
And pain, as of a woman in travail.
25 Go not forth into the field, nor walk by the way;
For the sword of the enemy and fear is on every side.
26 O daughter of my people, gird thee with sackcloth,
And wallow thyself in ashes:
Make thee mourning, as for an only son,

Most bitter lamentation:
For the spoiler shall suddenly come upon us.
27 I have set thee for a tower and a fortress among my people,
That thou mayest know and try their way.
28 They are all grievous revolters, walking with slanders:
They are brass and iron; they are all corrupters.
29 The bellows are burned,
The lead is consumed of the fire;
The founder melteth in vain:
For the wicked are not plucked away.
30 Reprobate silver shall men call them,
Because the LORD hath rejected them.

Here, First. God appeals to all the neighbours, nay, to the whole world, concerning the equity of his proceedings against Judah and Jerusalem; ver. 18, 19, "Hear, ye nations, and know," particularly, "O congregation" of the mighty, the great men of the nations, that take cognizance of the affairs of the states about you, and make remarks upon them. Observe now what is doing among them of Judah and Jerusalem; you hear of the desolations brought upon them, the earth rings of it, trembles under it; you all wonder that I should "bring evil upon this people," that are in covenant with me, that profess relation to me, that have worshipped me, and been highly favoured by me; you are ready to ask, "Wherefore has the Lord done thus to this land?" Deu. xxix. 24. Know then, 1. That it is the natural product of their devices. The evil brought upon them is the fruit of their thoughts. They thought to strengthen themselves by their alliance with foreigners, and by that very thing they weakened and diminished themselves; they betrayed and exposed themselves. 2. That it is the just punishment of their disobedience and rebellion. God doth but execute upon them the curse of the law for their violation of the commands of it. It is because "they have not hearkened to my words, nor to my law," nor regarded a word I have said to them, but rejected it all. They should never have been ruined thus by the judgments of God's hand, but that they refused to be ruled by the judgments of his mouth. Therefore you cannot say they have any wrong done them.

Secondly. God rejects their plea, by which they insisted upon their external services as sufficient to atone for all their sins. Alas, it is a frivolous plea; ver. 20, "To what purpose comes there to me incense, and sweet cane," to be burnt for a perfume on the golden altar, though it was the best of the kind, and far-fetched? What care I for your burnt offerings and your sacrifices? They not only cannot profit God, so no sacrifice doth, Ps. l. 9, but they do not please him, for so none doth but the sacrifice of the upright; that of the wicked is an abomination to him. Sacrifice and incense were appointed to excite their repentance, and to direct them to a Mediator, and assist their faith in him; and where this good use was made of them they were acceptable, God had respect to them, and to those that offered them. But when they were offered with an opinion that thereby they made God their debtor, and purchased a license to go on in sin, they were so far from being pleasing to God, that they were a provocation to him.

Thirdly. He foretells the desolation that was now coming upon them. 1. God designs their ruin, because they hate to be reformed; ver. 21, "I will lay stumblingblocks before this people;" occasions of falling, not into sin, but into trouble. Those whom God has marked for destruction he perplexeth and embarrasseth their counsels, and obstructs and retards all the methods they take for their own safety. The parties of the enemy which they met with, wherever they went, were stumblingblocks to them, in every corner they stumbled upon them, and were dashed to pieces by them. "The fathers and the sons together shall fall upon them;" neither the fathers with their wisdom, nor the sons with their strength and courage, shall escape them, or get over them. The sons that sinned with their fathers fall with them. Even "the neighbour and his friend shall perish," and not be able to help either themselves or one another. 2. He will make use of the Chaldeans as instruments of it; for whatever work God has to do he will find out proper instruments for the doing of it. This is a people fetched "from the north, from the sides of the earth." Babylon itself lay a great way off, northwards; and some of the countries that were subject to the king of Babylon, out of which his army was levied, lay much farther. These must be employed in this service, ver. 22, 23. For, 1st. It is a people very numerous, a great nation, which will make their invasion the more formidable. 2nd. It is a warlike people. "They lay hold on bow and spear;" and at this time know how to use them, for they are used to them; "they ride upon horses," and therefore they march the more swiftly, and in battle press the harder. No nation had yet brought into the field a better cavalry than the Chaldeans. 3rd. It is a barbarous people. They "are cruel, and have no mercy," being greedy of prey and flushed with victory. They take a pride in frightening all about them, "their voice roars like the sea." And lastly, they have a particular design upon Judah and Jerusalem, in hopes greatly to enrich themselves with the spoil of that famous country. They are "set in array against thee, O daughter of Zion." The sins of God's professing people make them an easy prey to those that are God's enemies as well as theirs.

Fourthly. He describes the very great consternation which Judah and Jerusalem should be in upon the approach of this formidable enemy, ver. 24—26. 1. They own themselves in a fright upon the first intelligence brought them of the approach of the enemy. When "we have but heard the fame thereof, our hands wax feeble," and we have no heart to make any resistance; "anguish has taken hold of us," and we are in an extremity of pain presently, like that of "a woman in travail." Note, Sense of guilt quite dispirits men upon the approach of any threatening trouble. What can they hope to do for themselves that have made God their enemy? 2. They confine themselves by consent to their houses, not daring to shew their heads abroad; for, though they could not but expect that the sword of the enemy would at last find them out there, yet they would rather die tamely and sneakingly there than run any venture either by fight or flight to help themselves. Thus they say one to another, "Go not forth into the field," no, not to fetch in your provision thence; "nor walk by the way," dare not to go to church or market, it is at your peril if you do, for the sword of the enemy and the fear of it is on every side; the highways are unoccupied, as in Jael's time, Jud. v. 7. Let this mind us when we travel the roads in safety, and there is none to make us afraid, to bless God for our share in the public tranquillity. 3. The prophet calls upon them sadly to lament the desolations that were coming upon them. He was himself the lamenting prophet, and calls upon his people to join with him in his lamentations. "O daughter of my people," hear thy God calling thee to weeping and mourning, and answer his call. Do not only put on sackcloth for a day, but gird it on for thy constant wear. Do not only put ashes on thy head, but "wallow thyself in ashes." Put thyself into close mourning, and use all the tokens of bitter lamentation, not forced, and for show only, but with the greatest sincerity, as parents mourn for an only son, and think themselves comfortless because they are childless. Thus do thou lament for "the spoiler that shall suddenly come upon us." Though he is not come yet, he is coming; the decree is gone forth, let us therefore meet the execution of it with an agreeable sadness. As saints may rejoice in hope of God's mercies, though they see them only in the promise, so sinners must mourn for fear of God's judgments, though they see them only in the threatenings.

Fifthly. He constitutes the prophet a judge over this people that now stand upon their trial; as ch. i. 10, "I have set thee over the nations," so here, "I have set thee for a tower," or as a sentinel or a watchman upon a tower, among my people, as an inspector of their actions, "that thou mayest know and try their way," ver. 27. Not that God needed any to inform him concerning them; on the contrary, the prophet knew little of them in comparison, but by the spirit of prophecy. But thus God appeals to the prophet himself, and his own observation concerning their character, that he might be fully satisfied in the equity of God's proceedings against them, and with the more assurance give them warning of the judgments coming. God set him for a tower conspicuous to all, and attacked by many, but made him a fortress, a strong tower, gave him courage to stem the tide, and bear the shock of their displeasure. They that will be faithful reprovers have need to be firm as fortresses. Now in trying their way he will find two things:

1. That they are wretchedly debauched; ver. 28, "They are all grievous revolters," 'revolters of revolters,' so the word is, the worst of revolters, as a servant of servants is the meanest servant. They have a revolting heart, have deeply revolted, and revolt more and more. They have seemed to start fair, but they revolt and start back. They walk with slanders, they make nothing of belying and backbiting one another; nay, they make a perfect trade of it, it is their constant course. And they govern themselves by the slanders they hear, hating those that they hear ill spoken of, though never so unjustly. They are brass and iron, base metals, and there is nothing in them that is valuable. They were as silver and gold, but they are degenerated. Nay, as they are all revolters, so "they are all corrupters," not only debauched themselves, but industrious to debauch others; to corrupt them as they themselves are corrupt; nay, to make them seven times more the children of hell than themselves. It is often so, sinners soon become tempters.

2. That they would never be reclaimed and reformed. It was in vain to think of reducing them, for various methods had been tried with them, and all to no purpose, ver. 29, 30. He compares them to ore that was supposed to have some good metal in it, and was therefore put into the furnace by the refiner, who used all his art, and took abundance of pains about it, but it proved all dross, nothing of any value could be extracted out of it. God by his prophets and by his providences had used the most proper means to refine this people, and to purify them from their wickedness; but it was all in vain. By the continual preaching of the word, and a series of afflictions, they had been kept in a constant fire, but all to no purpose. "The bellows" have been still kept so near the fire to blow it, that they "are burnt" with the heat of it, or they are quite worn out with long use, and thrown into the fire as good for nothing. The prophets have preached their throats sore with crying aloud against the sins of Israel, and yet they are not convinced and humbled. "The lead," which was then used in refining silver, as quicksilver is now, "is consumed of the fire," and has not done its work; for "the founder melteth in vain," his labour is lost, for "the wicked are not plucked away." No care is taken to separate between the precious and the vile, to purge out the old leaven, to cast out of communion those who, being corrupt themselves, are in danger of infecting others. Or, 'their wickednesses are removed,' so some read it; they are still as bad as ever, and nothing will prevail to part between them and their sins; they will not be brought off from their idolatries and immoralities by all they have heard, and all they have felt, of the wrath of God against them. And therefore that doom is passed upon them; ver. 30, "Reprobate silver shall they be called," useless and worthless. They glitter as if they had some silver in them, but there is nothing of real virtue or goodness to be found among them; and for this reason "the Lord has rejected them." He will no more own them as his people, nor look for any good from them; he will "take them away like dross," Ps. cxix. 119, and prepare a consuming fire for those that would not be purified by a refining fire. By this it appears, 1st. That God hath no pleasure in the death and ruin of sinners, for he tries all ways and methods with them to prevent their destruction, and qualify them for salvation. Both his ordinances and his providences have a tendency this way, to part between them and their sins, and yet with many it is all lost labour: "We have piped unto you, and you have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and you have not wept." Therefore, 2nd. God will be justified in the death of sinners, and all the blame will lie upon themselves. He did not reject them till he had used all proper means to reduce them; did not cast them off so long as there was any hopes of them, nor abandon them as dross till it appeared they were reprobate silver.

CHAPTER VII.

The prophet having in God's name reproved the people for their sins, and given them warning of the judgments of God that were coming upon them, in this chapter prosecutes the same intention for their humiliation and awakening. I. He shews them the invalidity of the plea they so much relied on, that they had the temple of God among them, and constantly attended the service of it, and endeavours to take them off from their confidence in their external privileges and performances, ver. 1—11. II. He minds them of the desolations of Shiloh; and foretells that such should be the desolations of Jerusalem, ver. 12—16. III. He represents to the prophet their abominable idolatries, for which he was thus incensed against them, ver. 17—20. IV. He sets before the people that fundamental maxim of religion, that to obey is better than sacrifice, 1 Sam. xv. 22, and that God would not accept the sacrifices of those that obstinately persisted in disobedience, ver. 21—28. V. He threatens to lay the land utterly waste for their idolatry and impiety, and to multiply their slain as they had multiplied their sin, ver. 29—34.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Stand in the gate of the LORD's house, and proclaim there this word, and say,
Hear the word of the LORD, all ye of Judah,
That enter in at these gates to worship the LORD.

And I will cause you to dwell in this place.
4 Trust ye not in lying words, saying,

The temple of the LORD, are these.

As I have cast out all your brethren,
Even the whole seed of Ephraim.

These verses begin another sermon, which is continued in this and the two following chapters, much to the same effect with those before,—to reason them to repentance. Observe,

First. The orders given to the prophet to preach this sermon; for he had not only a general commission, but particular directions and instructions for every message he delivered. This was "a word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord," ver. 1. We are not told when this sermon was to be preached, but we are told, 1. Where it must be preached, "in the gate of the Lord's house," through which they entered into the outer court, or the court of the people. It would affront the priests, and expose the prophet to their rage, to have such a message as this delivered under their noses, and within their precincts, but the prophet must not fear the face of man, he cannot be faithful to his God if he do. 2. To whom it must be preached, to the men "of Judah that enter in at these gates to worship the Lord." Probably it was at one of the three feasts, when all the males from all parts of the country were to appear before the Lord in the courts of his house, and not to appear empty; then he had many together to preach to, and that was the most seasonable time to admonish them not to trust to their privileges. Note, 1st. Even those that do profess religion have need to be preached to, as well as those that are without. 2nd. It is desirable to have opportunity of preaching to many together. Wisdom chooseth to cry in the chief place of concourse, and, as Jeremiah here, in the opening of the gates, the temple gates. 3rd. When we are going to worship God, we have need to be admonished to worship him in the spirit, and to have no confidence in the flesh, Phil. iii. 3.

Secondly. The contents and scope of the sermon itself. It is delivered in the name of "the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel," who commands the world, but covenants with his people. As creatures, we are bound to regard the Lord of hosts; as Christians, the God of Israel. What he said to them he saith to us, and it is much the same with that which John Baptist said to those whom he baptized, Mat. iii. 8, 9, "Bring forth fruits meet for repentance; and think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father." The prophet here tells them,

1. What were the true words of God which they might trust to. In short, they might depend upon it, that if they would repent and reform their lives, and return to God in a way of duty, he would restore and confirm their peace, would redress their grievances, and return to them in a way of mercy; ver. 3, "Amend your ways and your doings." This implies that there had been much amiss in their ways and doings, many faults and errors. But it is a great instance of the favour of God to them, that he gives them liberty to amend, shews them where and how they must mend, and promiseth to accept them upon their amendment; "I will cause you to dwell" quietly and peaceably "in this place," and a stop shall be put to that which threatens your expulsion. Reformation is the only way, and a sure way, to prevent ruin. He explains himself, ver. 5—7, and tells them particularly,

1st. What the amendment was which he expected from them. They must thoroughly amend; in making good they must make good their ways and doings; they must reform with resolution, and it must be a universal, constant, persevering reformation, not partial but entire, not hypocritical but sincere, not wavering but constant. They must make the tree good, and so make the fruit good; must amend their hearts and thoughts, and so amend their ways and doings. In particular, First. They must be honest and just in all their dealings. They that had power in their hands must "throughly execute judgment between a man and his neighbour," without partiality, and according as the merits of the cause appeared. They must not either in judgment or in contract oppress the stranger, the fatherless, or the widow, nor countenance or protect those that did oppress, nor refuse to do them right when they sought for it. They must not shed innocent blood, and with it defile this place, and the land wherein they dwelt. Secondly. They must keep close to the worship of the true God only; "Neither walk after other gods." Do not hanker after them, nor hearken to those that would draw you into communion with idolaters, for it is and will be to your own hurt. Be not only so just to your God, but so wise for yourselves, as not to throw away your adorations upon those that are not able to help you, and thereby provoke him who is able to destroy you. Well, this is all that God insists upon.

2nd. He tells them what the establishment is which upon this amendment they may expect from him, ver. 7. Set about such a work of reformation as this with all speed, go through with it, and abide by it, "and I will cause you to dwell in this place," this temple; it shall continue your place of resort and refuge, the place of your comfortable meeting with God and one another, and you shall dwell "in the land that I gave to your fathers for ever and ever," and shall never be turned out either from God's house or your own. It is promised that they shall still enjoy their civil and sacred privileges, that they shall have a comfortable enjoyment of them; "I will cause you to dwell here," and those dwell at ease whom God gives a settlement to; they shall enjoy it by covenant, by virtue of the grant made of it to their fathers, not by providence but promise. They shall continue in the enjoyment of it without eviction or molestation; they shall not be disturbed, much less dispossessed for ever and ever. Nothing but sin could throw them out. An everlasting inheritance in the heavenly Canaan is hereby secured to all that live in godliness and honesty. And the vulgar Latin reads a farther privilege here, ver. 3, 7; Habitabo vobiscum, —'I will dwell with you in this place;' and we should find Canaan itself but an uncomfortable place to dwell in, if God did not dwell with us there.

2. What were the lying words of their own hearts which they must not trust to. He cautions them against this self-deceit, ver. 4, "Trust ye not in lying words;" you are told in what way, and upon what terms, you may be easy, safe, and happy; now do not flatter yourselves with an opinion that you may be so on any other terms, or in any other way. Yet he chargeth them with this self-deceit, arising from a self-conceit, ver. 8; Behold, it is plain you do trust in lying words, notwithstanding what is said to you; you trust in words that cannot profit, you rely upon a plea that will stand you in no stead. They that slight the words of truth which would profit them take shelter in words of falsehood that cannot profit them. Now these lying words were, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these." These buildings, the courts, the holy place, and the holy of holies, are the temple of the Lord, built by his appointment, to his glory; here he resides, here he is worshipped, here we meet three times a year to pay our homage to him as our King, in his palace. This they thought was security enough to them to keep God and his favours from leaving them, God and his judgments from breaking in upon them. When the prophets told them how sinful they were, and how miserable they were likely to be still, they appealed to the temple; How can we be either so or so, as long as we have that holy, happy place among us? The prophet repeats it because they repeated it upon all occasions. It was the cant of the times, it was in their mouths upon all occasions. If they heard any awakening sermon, if any startling piece of news was brought upon them, they lulled themselves asleep again with this, We cannot but do well, for we have the temple of the Lord among us. Note, The privileges of a form of godliness are oftentimes the pride and confidence of those that are strangers and enemies to the power of it. It is common for those that are farthest from God to boast themselves most of their being near to the church. They are "haughty because of the holy mountain," Zep. iii. 11, as if God's mercy were so tied to them that they might defy his justice. Now, to convince them what a frivolous plea this was, and what little stead it would stand them in,

1st. He shews them the gross absurdity of it in itself. If they knew anything either of the temple of the Lord or of the Lord of the temple, they must think that to plead that, either in excuse of their sin against God, or in arrest of God's judgment against them, was the most ridiculous, unreasonable thing that could be.

First. God is a holy God, but this plea made him the patron of sin, of the worst of sins, which even the light of nature condemns, ver. 9, 10. What, saith he, "will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery," be guilty of the vilest immoralities, and which the common interest, as well as the common sense of mankind witness against? "will you swear falsely," a crime which all nations who, with the belief of a God, have had a veneration for an oath, have always had a horror of? Will "you burn incense to Baal," a dunghill deity, that sets up as rival with the great Jehovah, and, not content with that, "will you walk after other gods" too, "whom ye know not," and by all these crimes put a daring affront upon God, both as the Lord of hosts, and the God of Israel? will you exchange a God, whose power and goodness you have had such a long experience of for gods whose ability and willingness to help you you know nothing of? And when you have thus done the worst you can against God, will you brazen your faces so far as to come and "stand before him in this house which is called by his name," and in which his name is called upon; stand before him as servants waiting his commands, as supplicants expecting his favour; will you act in open rebellion against him, and yet herd yourself among his subjects, among the best of them? By this it should seem, you think, that either he doth not discover or doth not dislike your wicked practices, either of which to imagine is to put the highest indignity possible upon him. It is as if you should say, "We are delivered to do all these abominations." If they had not the front to say this, totidem verbis,—'in so many words,' yet their actions spoke it aloud. They could not but own that God, even their own God, had many a time delivered them, and been a present help to them, when otherwise they must have perished. He, in delivering them, designed to reduce them to himself, and by his goodness to lead them to repentance, but they resolved to persist in their abominations notwithstanding; as soon as they were delivered, (as of old in the days of the judges,) "they did evil again in the sight of the Lord," which was in effect to say, in direct contradiction to the true intent and meaning of the providences which had been concerning them, that God had delivered them to put them again into a capacity of rebelling against him, by sacrificing the more profusely to their idols. Note, Those who continue in sin, because grace has abounded, or that grace may abound, do in effect make Christ the minister of sin. Some take it thus: You present yourselves before God with your sacrifices and sin offerings, and then say, "We are delivered," that is, we are discharged from our guilt, now it shall do us no hurt; when all this is but to blind the world, and stop the mouth of conscience, that you may the more easily to yourselves, and the more plausibly before others, "do all these abominations."

Secondly. His temple was a holy place, but this plea made it a protection to the most unholy persons. "Is this house which is called by my name," and is a standing sign of God's kingdom, set up among men in opposition to the kingdom of sin and Satan,—is this "become a den of robbers in your eyes?" Do you think it was built to be not only a rendezvous of, but a refuge and shelter to, the vilest of malefactors? No, though the horns of the altar were a sanctuary to him that slew a man at unawares, yet not to a wilful murderer, not to one that doth aught presumptuously, Ex. xxi. 14; 1 Kin. ii. 29. Those that think to excuse themselves in unchristian practices with the Christian name, and sin the more boldly and securely because there is a sin offering provided, do, in effect, make God's house of prayer a den of thieves; as the priests in Christ's time, Mat. xxi. 13. But could they thus impose upon God? No, "Behold, I have seen it, saith the Lord," have seen the real iniquity through the counterfeit and dissembled piety. Note, Though men may deceive one another with the shows of devotion, yet they cannot deceive God.

2nd. He shews them the insufficiency of this plea, adjudged long since in the case of Shiloh.

First. It is certain Shiloh was ruined, though it had God's sanctuary in it, when by its wickedness it profaned that sanctuary; ver. 12, "Go ye now to my place which was in Shiloh." It is probable the ruins of that once flourishing city were yet remaining; however, they might read the history of it, which ought to affect them as if they saw the place. There God set his name at the first; there the tabernacle was set up when Israel first took possession of Canaan, Jos. xviii. 1, and thither the tribes went up. But those that attended the service of the tabernacle there corrupted both themselves and others, and from them arose the wickedness of his people Israel. That fountain was poisoned, and sent forth malignant streams. And what came of it? Go, "see what God did to it." Was it protected by its having the tabernacle in it? No, God forsook it, Ps. lxxviii. 60, sent his ark into captivity, cut off the house of Eli that presided there; and it is very probable the city was quite destroyed, for we never read any more of it but as a monument of Divine vengeance upon holy places, when they harbour wicked people. Note, God's judgments upon others that have really revolted from God, while they have kept up a profession of nearness to him, should be a warning to us not to trust in lying words. It is good to consult precedents, and make use of them: Remember Lot's wife; remember Shiloh and the seven churches of Asia, and know that the ark and candlestick are movable things, Rev. ii. 5; Mat. xxi. 43.

Secondly. It is as certain that Shiloh's fate will be Jerusalem's doom if a speedy and sincere repentance prevent it not. 1*st.* Jerusalem was now as sinful as ever Shiloh was; that is proved by the unerring testimony of God himself against them, ver. 13, "Ye have done all these works," you cannot deny it. And they continued obstinate in their sin; that is proved by the testimony of God's messengers, by whom he spake unto them to return and repent, "rising up early and speaking," as one in care, as one in earnest, as one that would lose no time in dealing with them, nay, that should take the fittest opportunity for speaking to them early in the morning, when, if ever, they were sober, and had their thoughts free and clear. But it was all in vain: God spake, but they heard not, that is, they heeded not, they never minded; he called them, but they answered not; they would not come at his call. Note, What God hath spoken to us greatly aggravates what we have done against him. 2*nd.* Jerusalem shall shortly be as miserable as ever Shiloh was; "Therefore I will do unto this house as I did to Shiloh," ruin it and lay it waste, ver. 14. Those that tread in the steps of the wickedness of those that went before them must expect to fall by the like judgments, for all these things "happened to them for ensamples." The temple at Jerusalem, though never so strongly built, if wickedness was found in it, would be as unable to keep its ground, and as easily conquered as even the tabernacle in Shiloh was, when God's day of vengeance was come. This house, saith God, is called by my name, and therefore you may think I should protect it; it is the house in which you trust, and you think it will protect you. This land is the place, this city the place, which I gave to you and your fathers, and therefore you are secure of the continuance of it, and think nothing can turn you out of it. But the men of Shiloh thus flattered themselves, and did but deceive themselves. He quotes another precedent, ver. 15, namely, the ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes, who were the seed of Abraham, and had the covenant of circumcision, and possessed the land which God gave to them and their fathers, and yet their idolatries threw them out, and extirpated them; and can you think but that the same evil courses should be as fatal to you? Doubtless they will be so, for God is uniform, and of a piece with himself in his judicial proceedings. It is a rule of justice, ut parium par sit ratio,—'in similar cases the same judgment should proceed.' 'You have corrupted yourselves as your brethren the seed of Ephraim did, and are become their brethren in iniquity, and therefore I will cast you out of my sight, as I have cast them.' The interpretation here given of the judgment makes it a terrible one indeed; the casting of them out of their land signified God's casting them out of his sight, as if he would never look upon them, never look after them, more. Wherever we are cast, it is well enough if we be kept in the love of God; but if we are thrown out of his favour our case is miserable, though we dwell in our own land. This threatening that God would make this house like Shiloh we shall meet with again, and find Jeremiah indicted for it, ch. xxvi. 6.

16 Therefore pray not thou for this people,
Neither lift up cry nor prayer for them,
Neither make intercession to me:
For I will not hear thee.
17 Seest thou not what they do in the cities of Judah
And in the streets of Jerusalem?
18 The children gather wood,
And the fathers kindle the fire,
And the women knead their dough,
To make cakes to the queen of heaven,
And to pour out drink offerings unto other gods,
That they may provoke me to anger.
19 Do they provoke me to anger? saith the LORD:
Do they not provoke themselves to the confusion of their own faces?
20 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place,
Upon man, and upon beast,
And upon the trees of the field,
And upon the fruit of the ground;
And it shall burn, and shall not be quenched.

God had shewed them in the foregoing verses, that the temple, and the service of it, of which they boasted, and in which they trusted, should not avail to prevent the judgment threatened. But there was another thing which might stand them in some stead, and which yet they had no value for, and that was the prophet's intercession for them. His prayers would do them more good than their own pleas. Now here that support is taken from them; and their case is sad indeed that have lost their interest in the prayers of God's ministers and people.

First. God here forbids the prophet to pray for them, ver. 16. The decree is gone forth, their ruin is resolved on, therefore, "pray not thou for this people," that is, pray not for the preventing of this judgment threatened; they have sinned unto death, and therefore pray not for their life, but for the life of their souls, 1 Jno. v. 16. See here, 1. That God's prophets are praying men. Jeremiah foretold the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, and yet prayed for their preservation; not knowing that the decree was absolute, and it is the will of God that we "pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Even when we threaten sinners with damnation, we must pray for their salvation, that they may turn and live. Jeremiah was hated, and persecuted, and reproached by the children of his people, and yet he prayed for them; for it becomes us to render good for evil. 2. That God's praying prophets have a great interest in heaven, how little soever they have on earth. When God was determined to destroy this people, he bespeaks the prophet not to pray for them, because he would not have his prayers to lie, as prophet's prayers seldom did, unanswered. God said to Moses, "Let me alone," Ex. xxxii. 10. 3. It is an ill omen to a people when God restrains the spirits of his ministers and people from praying for them, and gives them to see their case so desperate, that they have no heart to speak a good word for them. 4. Those that will not regard good ministers' preaching cannot expect any benefit by their praying. If you will not hear us when we speak from God to you, God will not hear us when we speak to him for you.

Secondly. He gives him a reason for this prohibition. Praying breath is too precious a thing to be lost and thrown away upon a people hardened in sin, and marked for ruin.

1. They are resolved to persist in their rebellion against God, and will not be turned back by the prophet's preaching. For this he appeals to the prophet himself, and his own inspection and observation; ver. 17, "Seest thou not what they do" openly and publicly, without either shame or fear, "in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem?" This intimates, both that the sin was evident, and could not be denied, and that the sinners were impudent, and would not be reclaimed. They committed their wickedness even in the prophet's presence, and under his eye; he saw what they did, and yet they did it, which was an affront to his office, and to him whose officer he was, and bade defiance to both. Now observe,

1st. What the sin is with which they are here charged. It is idolatry, ver. 18. Their idolatrous respects are paid to the queen of heaven, the moon, either in an image, or in the original, or both. They worshipped it probably under the name of Ashtaroth, or some other of their goddesses; being in love with the brightness in which they saw the moon walk, and thinking themselves indebted to her for her benign influences, or fearing her malignant ones, Job xxxi. 26. The worshipping of the moon was much in use among the heathen nations, ch. xliv. 17, 19. Some read it, the frame or workmanship of heaven; the whole celestial globe, with all its ornaments and powers, was the object of their adoration. They worshipped the host of heaven, Acts vii. 42. The homage they should have paid to their Prince, they paid to the statues that beautified the frontispiece of his palace; worshipped the creatures instead of him that made them, the servants instead of him that commands them, and the gifts instead of him that gave them. With the queen of heaven they worshipped other gods, images of things not only in heaven above, but in earth beneath, and in the waters under the earth; for those that forsake the true God wander endlessly after false ones. To these deities of their own making they offer cakes for meat-offerings, and pour out drink-offerings, as if they had their meat and drink from them, and were obliged to make to them their acknowledgments. And see how busy they are, and how every hand is employed in the service of these idols, according as they used to be employed in their domestic services. "The children" were sent to "gather wood, the fathers kindled the fire" to heat the oven, being of the poorer sort, that could not afford to keep servants to do it, yet they would rather do it themselves than it should be undone; "the women kneaded the dough" with their own hands, for perhaps, though they had servants to do it, yet they took a pride in shewing their zeal for their idols by doing it themselves. Let us be instructed, even by this bad example, in the service of our God. First. Let us honour him with our substance, as those that have our subsistence from him, and eat and drink to the glory of him from whom we have our meat and drink. Secondly. Let us not decline the hardest services, nor disdain to stoop to the meanest, by which God may be honoured; for none shall kindle a fire on God's altar for nought. Let us think it an honour to be employed in any work for God. Thirdly. Let us bring up our children in the acts of devotion; let them, as they are capable, be employed in doing something towards the keeping up of religious exercises.

2nd. What is the direct tendency of this sin: it is "that they may provoke me to anger;" they cannot design any thing else in it. But, (ver. 19,) "Do they provoke me to anger?" Is it because I am hard to be pleased, or easily provoked? or am I to bear the blame of the resentment? No; it is their own doing; they may thank themselves, and they alone shall bear it. 'Is it against God that they provoke him to wrath?' Is he the worse for it? Doth it do him any real damage? No; "Is it not against themselves, to the confusion of their own faces?" It is malice against God, but it is impotent malice, it cannot hurt him; nay, it is foolish malice, it will hurt themselves. They shew their spite against God, but they do the spite to themselves. Now, canst thou think any other but that such a people should be abandoned as are thus desperately set upon their own ruin?

2. God is resolved to proceed in his judgments against them, and will not be turned back by the prophet's prayer; ver. 20, "Thus saith the Lord God," and what he saith he will not unsay, nor can all the world gainsay; hear it therefore, and tremble; "Behold, my anger and fury shall be poured out upon this place," as the flood of waters was upon the old world, or the shower of fire and brimstone upon Sodom; since they will anger me, let them see what comes of it. They shall soon find, 1st. That there is no escaping this deluge of fire, either by flying from it or fencing against it; it should be poured out on this place, though it be a holy place, the Lord's house. It shall reach both man and beast, like the plagues of Egypt; and, like some of them, shall destroy "the trees of the field, and the fruit of the ground," which they had designed and prepared for Baal, and of which they had made cakes to the queen of heaven. 2nd. There is no extinguishing it; "It shall burn, and shall not be quenched." Prayers and tears shall then avail nothing, "when his wrath is kindled but a little;" much more when it is kindled to such a degree that there shall be no quenching of it. God's wrath is that fire unquenchable which eternity itself will not see the period of; "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire!"

21 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Put your burnt offerings unto your sacrifices,
And eat flesh.
22 For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them
In the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt,
Concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices:
23 But this thing commanded I them, saying,
Obey my voice,
And I will be your God,
And ye shall be my people:
And walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you,
That it may be well unto you.
24 But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear,
But walked in the counsels and in the imagination of their evil heart,
And went backward, and not forward.
25 Since the day that your fathers came forth out of the land of Egypt
Unto this day
I have even sent unto you all my servants the prophets,
Daily rising up early and sending them:
26 Yet they hearkened not unto me, nor inclined their ear,
But hardened their neck:
They did worse than their fathers.
27 Therefore thou shalt speak all these words unto them;
But they will not hearken to thee:
Thou shalt also call unto them;
But they will not answer thee.
28 But thou shalt say unto them,
This is a nation that obeyeth not the voice of the LORD their God,
Nor receiveth correction:
Truth is perished, and is cut off from their mouth.

God, having shewed the people that the temple would not protect them while they polluted it with their wickedness, here shews them that their sacrifices would not atone for them, nor be accepted, while they went on in disobedience. See with what contempt he here speaks of their ceremonial services; ver. 21, "Put your burnt offerings to your sacrifices;" go on in them as long as you please; add one sort of sacrifice to another; turn your burnt offerings, which were to be wholly burnt, to the honour of God, into peace offerings, which the offerer himself had a considerable share of, that you may eat flesh, for that is all the good you are likely to have from your sacrifices,—a good meal's meat or two,—but expect not any other benefit by them while you live at this loose rate. 'Keep your sacrifices to yourselves,' so some understand it; let them be served up at your own tables, for they are no way acceptable at God's altars. For the opening of this,

First. He shews them that obedience was the only thing he required of them, ver. 22, 23. He appeals to the original contract, by which they were first formed into a people, when they were brought out of Egypt. God made them a kingdom of priests to himself, not that he might be regaled with their sacrifices, as the devils, whom the heathen worshipped, which are represented as eating with pleasure the fat of their sacrifices, and drinking the wine of their drink offerings, Deu. xxxii. 38. No, "Will God eat the flesh of bulls?" Ps. l. 13. "I spake not to your fathers concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices," not of them at first. The precepts of the moral law were given before the ceremonial institutions; and those came afterwards as trials of their obedience, and assistances to their repentance and faith. The Levitical law begins thus, "If any man of you will bring an offering," he must do so and so, Lev. i. 2; ii. 1, as if it were intended rather to regulate sacrifice than to require it. But that which God commanded, which he bound them to by his supreme authority, and which he insisted upon as the condition of the covenant, was, "Obey my voice:" see Ex. xv. 26, where this was the statute and the ordinance by which God proved them; "Hearken diligently to the voice of the Lord thy God." And upon these terms they shall be God's peculiar people; Ex. xiv. 5, "If ye will obey my voice indeed." Make conscience of the duties of natural religion, observe positive institutions from a principle of obedience. And then, "I will be your God, and ye shall be my people," which speaks the greatest honour, happiness, and satisfaction that any of the children of men are capable of. Let your conversation be regular, and in every thing study to comply with the will and word of God; walk within the bounds that I have set you, and "in all the ways that I have commanded you," and then you may assure yourselves "it shall be well with you." The demand here is very reasonable, that we should be directed by Infinite Wisdom to that which is fit; that he that made us should command us, and that he should give us law who gives us our being, and all the supports of it. And the promise is very encouraging; let God's will be your rule, and his favour shall be your felicity.

Secondly. He shews them that disobedience was the only thing for which he had a quarrel with them. "He would not reprove them for their sacrifices," for the omission of them, they had been continually before him, Ps. l. 8; with them they hoped to bribe God, and purchase a license to go on in sin. That, therefore, which God had all along laid to their charge was, breaking his commandments in the course of their conversation, while they observed them in some instances in the course of their devotion, ver. 24, 25, &c.

1. They set up their own will in competition with the will of God. "They hearkened not" to God, and to his law, they never heeded that; it was to them as if it had never been given, or were of no force; they "inclined not their ear" to attend to it, much less their hearts to comply with it. But they would have their own way,—would do as they had a mind, and not as they were bidden. Their own counsels were their guide, and not the dictates of Divine wisdom. That shall be lawful and good with them which they think so, though the word of God saith quite contrary. "The imagination of their evil heart," the appetites and passions of it, shall be a law to them, and they will walk in the way of it, and in the sight of their eyes.

2. If they began well, yet they did not proceed, but soon flew off. "They went backward," when they talked of making a captain, and returning to Egypt again, and would not go forward under God's conduct. They promised fair; "All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do;" and if they would but have kept in that good mind all had been well; but, instead of going on in the way of duty, they drew back into the way of sin, and were worse than ever.

3. When God sent to them, by word of mouth, to put them in mind of the written word, which was the business of the prophets, it was all one; still they were disobedient. God had servants of his among them in every age, since they came out of Egypt unto this day,—some or other to tell them of their faults, and put them in mind of their duty, whom he rose up early to send, as before, ver. 13, as men rise up early to call their servants to their work; but they were as deaf to the prophets as they were to the law; ver. 26, "Yet they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear." This had been their way and manner all along; they were of the same stubborn, refractory disposition with those that went before them. It had all along been the genius of the nation (and an evil genius it was) that continually haunted them till it ruined them at last.

4. Their practice and character was still the same; they are worse, and no better than their fathers. 1st. Jeremiah can himself witness against them, that they were disobedient, or he shall soon find it so; ver. 27, "Thou shalt speak all these words to them," shalt particularly charge them with disobedience and obstinacy. But even that will not work upon them; "They will not hearken to thee," nor heed thee; thou shalt go and "call to them" with all the plainness and earnestness imaginable, "but they will not answer thee;" they will either give thee no answer at all or not an obedient answer; they will not come at thy call. 2nd. He must therefore own that they deserved the character of a disobedient people, that were ripe for destruction, and must go to them and tell them so to their faces; ver. 28, "Say unto them, This is a nation that obeys not the voice of the Lord their God." They are notorious for their obstinacy; they sacrifice to the Lord as their God, but they will not be ruled by him as their God. They will not receive either the instruction of his word or the correction of his rod; they will not be reclaimed or reformed by either. Truth is perished among them; they cannot receive it; they will not submit to it, nor be governed by it; they will not speak truth; there is no believing a word they say, for it is cut off from their mouth, and lying comes in the room of it; they are false both to God and man.

29 Cut off thine hair, O Jerusalem, and cast it away,
And take up a lamentation on high places;
For the LORD hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath.
30 For the children of Judah have done evil in my sight, saith the LORD:
They have set their abominations in the house
Which is called by my name, to pollute it.
31 And they have built the high places of Tophet,
Which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom,
To burn their sons and their daughters in the fire;
Which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart.

32 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That it shall no more be called Tophet,
Nor the valley of the son of Hinnom,
But the valley of slaughter:
For they shall bury in Tophet, till there be no place.
33 And the carcases of this people shall be meat
For the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth;
And none shall fray them away.
34 Then will I cause to cease from the cities of Judah,
And from the streets of Jerusalem,
The voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride:
For the land shall be desolate.

Here is, First. A loud call to weeping and mourning. Jerusalem, that had been a joyous city, the joy of the whole earth, must now take up a lamentation on high places, ver. 29, the high places where they had served their idols, there must they now bemoan their misery. In token both of sorrow and slavery Jerusalem must now cut off her hair, and cast it away; the word is peculiar to the hair of the Nazarites, which was the badge and token of their dedication to God, and is called their crown. Jerusalem had been a city that was a Nazarite to God, but now must cut off her hair, must be profaned, degraded, and separated from God, as she had been separated to him. And it is time for those that have lost their holiness to lay aside their joy.

Secondly. Just cause given for this great lamentation.

1. The sin of Jerusalem appears here very heinous, nowhere worse, or more exceeding sinful. "The children of Judah," God's professing people, that "came forth out of the waters of Judah," Isa. xlviii. 1, have "done evil in my sight," under my eye, in my presence, they have affronted me to my face, which very much aggravates the affront. Or, they have done that which they know to be "evil in my sight," and in the highest degree offensive to me. Idolatry was the sin which was above all other sins evil in God's sight. Now here are two things charged upon them in their idolatry, which were very provoking:

1st. That they were very impudent in it towards God, and set him at defiance; ver. 30, "They have set their abominations," that is, their abominable idols, and the altars erected to them, in the house that is called by my name, in the very courts of the temple, to pollute it. Manasseh did so, 2 Kin. xxi. 1; xxiii. 12, as if they thought God would connive at it, or cared not though he was never so much displeased with it; or as if they would reconcile heaven and hell, God and Baal. The heart is the place which God has chosen to put his name there; if sin have the innermost and uppermost place there, we pollute the temple of the Lord, and therefore he resents nothing more than "setting up idols in the heart," Eze. xiv. 4.

2nd. That they were very barbarous in it towards their own children, ver. 31. They have particularly "built the high places of Tophet," where the image of Moloch was set up, "in the valley of the son of Hinnom," near adjoining to Jerusalem, and there "they burned their sons and their daughters in the fire," burned them alive, killed them, and killed them in the most cruel manner imaginable, to honour or appease those idols that were devils and not gods. This was sure the greatest instance that ever was of the power of Satan in the children of disobedience, and of the degeneracy and corruption of the human nature. One would willingly hope there were not many instances of such a barbarous idolatry, but it is amazing there should be any. That men could be so perfectly void of natural affection as to do a thing so inhuman as to burn little innocent children, and their own too; that they should be so perfectly void of natural religion as to think it lawful to do this; nay, to think it acceptable; surely it was in a way of righteous judgment, because they had changed the glory of God into the similitude of a beast, that God gave them up to such vile affections as changed them into worse than beasts. God saith of this it was "what he commanded them not, neither came it into his heart," which is not meant of his not commanding them thus to worship Moloch, (this he had expressly forbidden them,) but he had never commanded that his worshippers should be at such an expense, nor put such a force upon their natural affection, in honouring him. It never came into his heart to have children offered to him, yet they had forsaken his service for the service of such gods as; by commanding this, shewed themselves to be indeed enemies to mankind.

2. The destruction of Jerusalem appears here very terrible. That speaks misery enough in general, ver. 29, "The Lord hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath." Sin makes those the generation of God's wrath that had been the generation of his love. And God will reject and quite forsake them who have thus by their impenitency made themselves "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction." He will disown them for his; Verily, I say unto you, I know you not; and he will give them up to the terrors of their own guilt, and leave them in those hands.

1st. Death shall triumph over them, ver. 32, 33. Sin reigns unto death, for that is the wages of it, the end of those things. Tophet, the valley adjoining to Jerusalem, "shall be called the valley of slaughter," for there multitudes shall be slain when, in their sallies out of the city, and their attempts to escape, they fall into the hands of the besiegers. Or, the valley of slaughtered ones, because thither the corpses of those that are slain shall be brought to be buried, all other places being full; and there they shall bury till there be no more place to make a grave. This speaks the multitude of those that shall die by the sword, pestilence, and famine. Death shall ride on prosperously with a dreadful pomp and power, conquering and to conquer. "The slain of the Lord shall be many." This valley of Tophet was a place where the citizens of Jerusalem walked to take the air; but it shall now be spoiled for that use, for it shall be so full of graves that there shall be no walking there, because of the danger of contracting a ceremonial pollution by the touch of a grave. There it was that they sacrificed some of their children, and dedicated others to Moloch, and there they should fall as victims to Divine justice. Tophet had formerly been the burying-place, or burning-place, of the dead bodies of the besiegers, when the Assyrian army was routed by an angel; and for this it was ordained of old, Isa. xxx. 33. But they having forgot this mercy, and made it the place of their sin, God will now turn it into a burying-place for the besieged. In allusion to this valley, hell is in the New Testament called Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom, for there were buried both the invading Assyrians and the revolting Jews; so hell is a receptacle after death both for infidels and hypocrites, the open enemies of God's church, and its treacherous friends. It is "the congregation of the dead;" it is prepared for the "generation of God's wrath." But so great shall that slaughter be that even the spacious valley of Tophet shall not be able to contain the slain; and at length there shall not be enough left alive to bury the dead, so that "the carcases of this people shall be meat" for the birds and beasts of prey, that shall feed upon them like carrion, and none shall have the concern or courage to frighten them away, as Rizpah did from the dead bodies of Saul's sons, 2 Sam. xxi. 10. This was according to the threatening in the law, and a branch of the curse, Deu. xxviii. 26, "Thy carcase shall be meat to the fowls and beasts, and no man shall fray them away." Thus do the law and the prophets agree, and the execution with both. The decent burying of the dead is a piece of humanity, in remembrance of what the dead body hath been, the tabernacle of a reasonable soul. Nay, it is a piece of divinity, in expectation of what the dead body shall be at the resurrection. The want of it has sometimes been an instance of the rage of men against God's witnesses, Rev. xi. 9. Here it is threatened as an instance of the wrath of God against his enemies, and it is an intimation that evil pursues sinners even after death.

2nd. Joy shall depart from them; ver. 34, "Then will I cause to cease the voice of mirth." God had called by his prophets, and by lesser judgments, to weeping and mourning, but they walked contrary to him, and would hear of nothing but joy and gladness, Isa. xxii. 12, 13. And what came of it? Now God called to lamentation, ver. 29, and he made his call effectual, leaving them neither cause nor heart for joy and gladness. They that will not weep shall weep; that will not, by the grace of God, be cured of their vain mirth shall, by the justice of God, be deprived of all mirth; for "when God judgeth, he will overcome." It is threatened here that there shall be nothing to rejoice in; there shall be none of the joy of weddings; no mirth, for there shall be no marriages. The comforts of life shall be abandoned, and all care to keep up mankind upon earth cast off; there shall be none of the voice of the bridegroom and the bride; no music, no nuptial songs; nor shall there be any more of the joy of harvest, for "the land shall be desolate," uncultivated, and unimproved. Both the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem shall look thus melancholy; and when they thus look about them and see no cause to rejoice, no marvel if they retire into themselves, and find no heart to rejoice. Note, God can soon mar the mirth of the most jovial, and make it to cease, which is a reason why we should always rejoice with trembling; be merry and wise.

CHAPTER VIII.

The prophet proceeds in this chapter both to magnify and to justify the destruction that God was bringing upon this people; to shew how grievous it would be, and yet how righteous. I. He represents the judgments coming so very terrible, that death should appear so as most to be dreaded, and yet should be desired, ver. 1—3. II. He aggravates the wretched stupidity and wilfulness of this people, as that which brought this ruin upon them, ver. 4—12. III. He describes the great confusion and consternation that the whole land should be in upon the alarm of it, ver. 13—17. IV. The prophet is himself deeply affected with it, and lays it very much to heart, ver. 18—22.

AT that time, saith the LORD, they shall bring out
The bones of the kings of Judah, and the bones of his princes,
And the bones of the priests, and the bones of the prophets,
And the bones of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, out of their graves:
2 And they shall spread them before the sun, and the moon,
And all the host of heaven, whom they have loved,
And whom they have served, and after whom they have walked,
And whom they have sought, and whom they have worshipped:
They shall not be gathered, nor be buried;
They shall be for dung upon the face of the earth.
3 And death shall be chosen rather than life
By all the residue of them that remain of this evil family,
Which remain in all the places whither I have driven them,
Saith the LORD of hosts.

These verses might fitly have been joined to the close of the foregoing chapter, as giving a farther description of the dreadful desolation which the army of the Chaldeans should make in the land. It shall strangely alter the property of death itself, and for the worse too.

First. Death shall not now be, as it always used to be, the repose of the dead. When Job makes his court to the grave it is in hope of this, that "there he shall rest with kings and counsellors of the earth;" but now the ashes of the dead, even of kings and princes, shall be disturbed, and their bones scattered at the grave's mouth, Ps. cxli. 7. It was threatened in the close of the former chapter, that the slain should be unburied. That might be through neglect, and was not so strange; but here we find the graves of those that were buried industriously and maliciously opened by the victorious enemy; who, either for covetousness, in hopes to find treasure in the graves, or for spite to the nation, and in a rage against it, "brought out the bones of the kings of Judah, and the princes." The dignity of their sepulchres could not secure them; nay, did the more expose them to be rifled; but it was base and barbarous thus to trample upon royal dust. We will hope the bones of good Josiah were not disturbed, because he piously protected the bones of the man of God, when he burnt the bones of the idolatrous priests, 2 Kin. xxiii. 18. The bones of the priests and prophets too were digged up, and thrown about. Some think the false prophets, and the idol priests, God put this mark of ignominy upon them. But if they were God's prophets and his priests it is what the psalmist complains of, as the fruit of the outrage of the enemies, Ps. lxxix. 1, 2. Nay, those of the spiteful Chaldeans, that could not reach to violate the sepulchres of princes and priests, would rather play at small game than sit out; and therefore pulled the bones of the ordinary inhabitants of Jerusalem out of their graves. The barbarous nations were sometimes guilty of these absurd and inhuman triumphs over those they had conquered, and God permitted it here for a mark of his displeasure against the generation of his wrath, and for terror to those that survived. The bones being digged out of the graves were spread abroad upon the face of the earth in contempt, and to make the reproach the more spreading and lasting. They spread them to be dried, that they might carry them about in triumph, or might make fuel of them, or make some superstitious use of them. They shall be spread before the sun; for they shall not be ashamed openly to avow the fact at noon-day; and before the moon and stars, even all the host of heaven, whom they have made idols of, ver. 2. From the mention of the sun, moon, and stars, which should be the unconcerned spectators of this tragedy, the prophet takes occasion to shew how they had idolised them, and paid those respects to them which they should have paid to God only; that it might be observed how little they got by worshipping the creature, for the creatures they worshipped, when they were in distress saw it but regarded it not, nor gave them any relief, but were rather pleased to see those abused in being vilified by whom tney had been abused in being deified.

See how their respects to their idols are instanced in and enumerated, to shew how we ought to carry it towards our God. 1. They loved them; as amiable beings and bountiful benefactors they esteemed them, and delighted in them, and therefore did all that follows to them. 2. They served them, did all they could in honour of them, and thought nothing too much they could do; they conformed to all the laws of their superstition without disputing. 3. They walked after them, strove to imitate and resemble them, according to the characters and accounts of them they had received, which gave rise and countenance to much of the abominable wickedness of the heathen. 4. They sought them, and consulted them as oracles, appealed to them as judges, implored their favour, and prayed to them as their benefactors. 5. They worshipped them, gave them Divine honour, as having a sovereign dominion over them. Before these lights of heaven, whom they had courted, shall their dead bodies be cast, and left to putrefy, and to be as dung upon the face of the earth; and the sun's shining upon them will but make them the more noisome and offensive. Whatever we make a god of but the true God only it will stand us in no stead on the other side death and the grave, not for the body, much less for the soul.

Secondly. Death shall now be what it never used to be, the choice of the living. Not because there appears in it anything delightsome; on the contrary, death never appeared in more horrid frightful shapes than now, when they cannot promise themselves either a comfortable death or a human burial; and yet every thing in this world shall become so irksome, and all the prospects so black and dismal, that "death shall be chosen rather than life," ver. 3, not in a believing hope of happiness in the other life, but in an utter despair of any ease in this life. The nation is now reduced to a family, so small is the residue of those that remain in it; and it is an evil family, still as bad as ever, their hearts unhumbled, and their lusts unmortified. These remain alive, and that is all, in the many places whither they were driven by the judgments of God; some prisoners in the country of their enemies, others beggars in their neighbour's country, and others fugitives and vagabonds there, and in their own country. And though those that died died very miserably, yet those that survived, and were thus driven out, should live yet more miserably; so that they should choose death rather than life, and wish a thousand times they had fallen with them that fell by the sword. Let this cure us of the inordinate love of life, that the case may be such that it may become a burthen and terror, and we may be strongly tempted to choose strangling and death rather.

4 Moreover thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD;
Shall they fall, and not arise?
Shall he turn away, and not return?
5 Why then is this people of Jerusalem slidden back
By a perpetual backsliding?
They hold fast deceit,
They refuse to return.
6 I hearkened and heard,
But they spake not aright:
No man repented him of his wickedness,
Saying, What have I done?
Every one turned to his course,
As the horse rusheth into the battle. [times;
7 Yea, the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed
And the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming;
But my people know not the judgment of the LORD.
8 How do ye say, We are wise,
And the law of the LORD is with us?
Lo, certainly in vain made he it;
The pen of the scribes is in vain.
9 The wise men are ashamed,
They are dismayed and taken:
Lo, they have rejected the word of the LORD;
And what wisdom is in them?
10 Therefore will I give their wives unto others,
And their fields to them that shall inherit them:
For every one from the least even unto the greatest
Is given to covetousness,
From the prophet even unto the priest
Every one dealeth falsely.
11 For they have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly,
Saying, Peace, peace;
When there is no peace. [nation?
12 Were they ashamed when they had committed abomi-
Nay, they were not at all ashamed,
Neither could they blush:
Therefore shall they fall among them that fall:
In the time of their visitation they shall be cast down,
Saith the LORD.

The prophet here is instructed to set before this people the folly of their impenitency, which was it that brought this ruin upon them. They are here represented as the most stupid, senseless people in the world, that would not be made wise by all the methods that Infinite Wisdom took to bring them to themselves and their right mind, and so to prevent the ruin that was coming upon them.

First. They would not attend to the dictates of reason; they would not act in the affairs of their souls with the same common prudence with which they acted in other things. Sinners would become saints if they would but shew themselves men; and religion would soon rule them, if right reason might. Observe it here; "Come, and let us reason together," saith the Lord; ver. 4, 5, "Shall men fall, and not arise?" If men happen to fall to the ground, to fall into the dirt, will they not get up again as fast as they can? They are not such fools as to lie still when they are down. Shall a man turn aside out of the right way? Yes, it is possible the most careful traveller may miss his way; but then as soon as he is aware of it will he not return? Yes, certainly, he will with all speed, and will thank him that shewed him his mistake. Thus men do in other things; "Why then is this people of Jerusalem slidden back by a perpetual backsliding?" Why do not they, when they are fallen into sin, hasten to get up again by repentance? Why do not they, when they see they have missed their way, correct their error and reform? No man in his wits will go on in a way that he knows will never bring him to his journey's end; "Why then is this people slidden back by a perpetual backsliding?" See the nature of sin: it is a backsliding, it is going back from the right way; not only into a bypath, but into a contrary path; back from the way that leads to life, to that which leads to utter destruction. And this backsliding, if Almighty grace do not interpose to prevent it, will be a perpetual backsliding; the sinner not only wanders endlessly, but proceeds endways towards ruin. The same subtlety of the tempter that brings men to sin holds them fast in it; and they contribute to their own captivity, "they hold fast deceit." Sin is a great cheat, and they hold it fast, they love it dearly, and resolve to stick to it, and baffle all the methods God takes to part between them and their sins. The excuses they make for their sins are deceits, and so are all their hopes of impunity, yet they hold fast these, and will not be undeceived, and therefore they refuse to return. Note, There is some deceit or other which those hold fast that go on wilfully in sinful ways; some lie in their right hand, by which they keep hold of their sins.

Secondly. They would not attend to the dictates of conscience, which is our reason reflecting upon ourselves and our own actions, ver. 6. Observe, 1. What expectations there were from them that they would bethink themselves; "I hearkened and heard." The prophet listened to see what effect his preaching had upon them; God himself listened, as one that desires not the death of sinners, that would have been glad to hear any thing that promised repentance, that would certainly have heard it, if there had been any thing said of that tendency, and would soon have answered it with comfort, as he did David when he said, "I will confess," Ps. xxxii. 5. God looks upon men, when they have done amiss, Job xxxiii. 27, to see what they will do next; he hearkens and hears. 2. How these expectations were disappointed; "They spake not aright," as I thought they would have done. They did not only not do right, but not so much as speak right; God could not get a good word from them, nothing on which to ground any favour to them, or hopes concerning them. There was none of them that spake aright, none that "repented him of his wickedness." Those that have sinned, then, and then only, speak aright when they speak of repenting, and it is sad when those that have made so much work for repentance do not say a word of repenting. God did not only not find any repenting of the national wickedness, and so helping to empty the measure of public guilt; but none repented of that particular wickedness which he knew himself guilty of. 1st. They did not so much as take the first step towards repentance; they did not so much as say, "What have I done?" There was no motion towards it, not the least sign or token of it. Note, True repentance begins in a serious and impartial inquiry into ourselves; what we have done, arising from a conviction that we have done amiss. 2nd. They were so far from repenting of their sins that they went on resolutely in their sins; "every one turned to his course," his wicked course, that course of sin which he had chosen and accustomed himself to, "as the horse rusheth into the battle," eager upon action, and scorning to be curbed. How the horse rusheth into the battle is elegantly described, Job xxxix. 21, &c., "He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted." Thus the daring sinner laughs at the threatenings of the word as bugbears, and runs violently upon the instruments of death and slaughter, and nothing will be restrained from him.

Thirdly. They would not attend to the dictates of providence, nor understand the voice of God in them, ver. 7. 1. It is an instance of their sottishness, that though they are God's people, and therefore should readily understand his mind upon every intimation of it, yet they "know not the judgment of the Lord," they apprehend not the meaning either of a mercy or of an affliction, not how to accommodate themselves to either, or answer God's intention in either. They know not how to improve the seasons of grace that God affords them when he sends them his prophets, nor how to make use of the rebukes they are under when his voice cries in the city. They discern not the signs of the times, Mat. xvi. 3, nor are aware how God is dealing with them. They know not that way of duty which God hath prescribed them, though it be written both in their hearts and in their books. 2. It is an aggravation of their sottishness, that there is so much sagacity in the inferior creatures. "The stork in the heaven knows her appointed times" of coming and continuing; so do other season-birds, the turtle and the swallow. These, by a natural instinct, change their quarters as the temper of the air alters; they come when the spring comes, and are gone we know not whither when the winter approacheth; probably into warmer climates, as some birds come with winter, and are gone when that is over.

Fourthly. They would not attend to the dictates of the written word. They say, "We are wise," but how can they say so? With what face can they pretend to any thing of wisdom, when they do not understand themselves so well as the brute creatures? Why, truly, they think they are wise, because the law of the Lord is with them, the book of the law, and the interpreters of it; and their neighbours, for the same reason, conclude they are wise, Deu. iv. 6. But their pretensions are groundless for all this; "Lo, certainly in vain made he it." Sure never any people had Bibles to so little purpose as they have. They had as good have been without the law, unless they had made a better use of it. God has indeed made it able to make men wise to salvation, but as to them it is made so in vain, for they are never the wiser for it; "The pen of the scribes," of those that first wrote the law, and of those that now write expositions of it, they are in vain. Both the favour of their God and the labour of their scribes is lost upon them; they receive the grace of God therein in vain. Note, There are many that enjoy abundance of the means of grace, that have great plenty of Bibles and ministers, but they have them in vain; they do not answer the end of their having them. But it might be said, They have some wise men among them, to whom the law and the pen of the scribes is not in vain. To this it is answered; ver. 9, "The wise men are ashamed," that is, they have reason to be so, that these have not made a better use of their wisdom, and lived more up to it. They are confounded and taken; all their wisdom has not served to keep them from those courses that tend to their ruin; they are taken in the same snares that others of their neighbours, who have not pretended to so much wisdom, are taken in, and filled with the same confusion. Those that have more knowledge than others, and yet do no better than others for their own souls, have reason to be ashamed. They talk of their wisdom, but "Lo, they have rejected the word of the Lord;" they would not be governed by it, would not follow the conduct of it, would not do what they knew, and then "what wisdom is in them?" None to any purpose; none that will be found to their praise at the great day, how much soever it is found to their pride now. The pretenders to wisdom, that said, "We are wise, and the law of the Lord is with us," were the priests and the false prophets; with them the prophet here deals plainly.

1. He threatens the judgments of God against them. Their families and estates shall be ruined, ver. 10. Their wives shall be given to others, when they are taken captives, and their fields shall be taken from them by the victorious enemy, and shall be given to those that shall inherit them; not only strip them for once, but take possession of them as their own, and acquire a property in them, which they shall transmit to their posterity. And, ver. 12, notwithstanding all their pretensions to wisdom and sanctity, "they shall fall among them that fall;" for if the blind lead the blind both shall fall together into the ditch. "In the time of their visitation," when the wickedness of the land comes to be inquired into, it will be found that they have contributed to it more than any, and therefore they shall be sure to be cast down, and cast out.

2. He gives a reason for these judgments, ver. 10—12, even the same account of their badness which we met with before, ch. vi. 13—15, where it was opened at large. 1st. They were greedy of the wealth of this world; which is bad enough in any, but worst in prophets and priests, who should be best acquainted with another world, and therefore should be most dead to this. But these, from the least to the greatest, were given to covetousness; the priests teach for hire, and the prophets divine for money, Mic. iii. 11. 2nd. They made no conscience of speaking truth, no, not when they spake as priests and prophets. Every one deals falsely, looks one way and rows another. There is no such thing as sincerity among them. 3rd. They flattered people in their sins, and so flattered them into destruction. They pretended to be the physicians of the state, but knew not how to apply proper remedies to its growing maladies; they healed them slightly, killed the patients with palliative cures; silencing their fears and complaints with, Peace, peace, all is well, and there is no danger, when the God of heaven was proceeding in his controversy with them, so that there could be no peace to them. 4th. When it was made to appear how basely they prevaricated, they were not at all ashamed of it, but rather gloried in it, ver. 12. They could not blush, so perfectly lost were they to all sense of virtue and honour; when they were convicted of the grossest forgeries, they would justify what they had done, and laugh at those whom they had imposed upon. Such as these were ripe for ruin.

13 I will surely consume them, saith the LORD:
There shall be no grapes on the vine,
Nor figs on the fig tree,
And the leaf shall fade; [from them.
And the things that I have given them shall pass away
14 Why do we sit still? [cities,
Assemble yourselves, and let us enter into the defenced
And let us be silent there:
For the LORD our God hath put us to silence,
And given us water of gall to drink,
Because we have sinned against the LORD.
15 We looked for peace, but no good came;
And for a time of health, and behold trouble!
16 The snorting of his horses was heard from Dan:
The whole land trembled at the sound of the neighing of his strong ones;
For they are come, and have devoured the land, and all that is in it;
The city, and those that dwell therein.
17 For, behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you,
Which will not be charmed,
And they shall bite you, saith the LORD.
18 When I would comfort myself against sorrow,
My heart is faint in me.
19 Behold the voice of the cry of the daughter of my people
Because of them that dwell in a far country:
Is not the LORD in Zion?
Is not her king in her?
Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven
And with strange vanities? [images,
20 The harvest is past, the summer is ended,
And we are not saved.
21 For the hurt of the daughter of my people am I hurt;
I am black; astonishment hath taken hold on me.
22 Is there no balm in Gilead;
Is there no physician there?
Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?

BALM OF GILEAD.

In these verses we have,

First. God threatening the destruction of a sinful people. He hath borne long with them, but they are still more and more provoking, and therefore now their ruin is resolved on; "I will surely consume them," ver. 13. Consuming I will consume them, not only surely, but utterly consume them; will follow them with one judgment after another, till they are quite consumed. It is a consumption determined, Isa. x. 23.

1. They shall be quite stripped of all their comforts; ver. 13, "There shall be no grapes on the vine." Some understand it as speaking their sin. God came looking for grapes from this vineyard, seeking fruit upon this fig-tree, but he found none, as Isa. v. 2; Lu. xiii. 6; nay, they had not so much as leaves, Mat. xxi. 19. But it is rather to be understood of God's judgments upon them, and may be meant literally; the enemy shall seize the fruits of the earth, shall pluck the grapes and figs for themselves, and beat down the very leaves with them. Or, rather, figuratively; they shall be deprived of all their comforts, and shall have nothing left them wherewith to make glad their hearts. It is expounded in the last clause; "The things that I have given them shall pass away from them." Note, God's gifts are upon condition, and revokable upon the nonperformance of the condition. Mercies abused are forfeited, and it is just with God to take the forfeiture.

2. They shall be set upon by all manner of grievances, and surrounded with calamities; ver. 17, "I will send serpents among you," the Chaldean army, fiery serpents, flying serpents, cockatrices; these shall bite them with their venomous teeth, give them wounds that shall be mortal; and they shall not be charmed, as some serpents used to be, with music. These are serpents of another nature, that are not so wrought upon; or they are as the deaf adder, that stops her ear, and will not hear the voice of the charmer. The enemies are so intent upon making slaughter, that it will be to no purpose to speak them fair, or offer any thing to pacify them, or mollify them, or bring them to a better temper. No peace with God, therefore none with them.

Secondly. The people sinking into despair under the pressure of those calamities. They that were void of fear, when the trouble was at a distance, and set it at defiance, are void of hope now it breaks in upon them; and have no heart either to make head against it or bear up under it, ver. 14. They cannot think themselves safe in the open villages; "Why do we sit still" here? Let us assemble, and go in a body "into the defenced cities." Though they could expect no other but to be surely cut off there at last, yet not so soon as in the country, and therefore let us go "and be silent there;" let us attempt nothing, nor so much as make a complaint, for to what purpose? It is not a submissive, but a sullen silence that they here condemn themselves to. Those that are most jovial in their prosperity, commonly despond most and are most melancholy in trouble. Now observe what it is that sinks them.

1. They are sensible that God is angry with them. "The Lord our God has put us to silence," hath struck us with astonishment, and given us water of gall to drink, which is both bitter and stupifying, or intoxicating; Ps. lx. 3, "Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment." We had better sit still than rise up and fall; better say nothing than say nothing to the purpose. To what purpose is it to contend with our fate, when God himself is become our enemy, and fights against us? Because we have sinned against the Lord, therefore we are brought to this plunge. This may be taken as the language, 1st. Of their indignation. They seem to quarrel with God, as if he had dealt hardly with them, in putting them to silence, not permitting them to speak for themselves, and then telling them it was because they had sinned against him. Thus men's foolishness perverts their way, and then their hearts fret against the Lord. Or, rather, 2nd. Of their convictions. At length they begin to see the hand of God lifted up against them, and stretched out in the calamities under which they are now groaning, and to own that they have provoked him to contend with them. Note, Sooner or later God will bring the most obstinate to acknowledge both his providence and his justice in all the troubles they are brought into; to see and say, both that it is his hand and that he is righteous.

2. They are sensible that the enemy is likely to be too hard for them, ver. 16. They are soon apprehensive that it is to no purpose to make head against such a mighty force; they and their people are quite dispirited; and when the courage of a nation is gone, their numbers will stand them in little stead. "The snorting of his horses was heard from Dan;" that is, the report of the formidable strength of their cavalry was soon carried all the nation over, and everybody trembled at the sound of the neighing of his steeds: "for they are come," and there is no opposing them; they "have devoured the land, and all that is in the city;" both town and country is laid waste before them; not only the wealth, but the inhabitants of both, "those that dwell therein." Note, When God appears against us, every thing else that is against us appears very formidable; whereas, if he be for us, every thing appears very despicable, Rom. viii. 31.

3. They are disappointed in their expectations of deliverance out of their troubles, as well as when their troubles came they were a surprise to them; and this double disappointment very much aggravated their calamity. 1st. The trouble came when they little expected it; ver. 15, "We looked for peace," the continuance of our peace, "but no good came," no good news from abroad; we looked for a time of health and prosperity to our nation, but behold trouble, the alarms of war; for, as it follows, ver. 16, the noise of the enemies' horses was heard from Dan. Their false prophets had cried, Peace, peace, to them, which made it the more terrible when the scene of war opened on a sudden. This complaint will occur again, ch. xiv. 19. 2nd. The deliverance did not come when they had long expected it; ver. 20, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended;" that is, there is a great deal of time gone. Harvest and summer are parts of the year, and when they are gone the year draws towards a conclusion, so the meaning is. One year passeth after another, one campaign after another, and yet our affairs are in as ill a posture as ever they were; no relief comes, nor is any thing done towards it; "We are not saved." Nay, there is a great deal of opportunity lost; the season of action is over and slipped, the summer and harvest are gone, and a cold and melancholy winter succeeds. Note, The salvation of God's church and people oftentimes goes on very slowly, and God keeps his people long in the expectation of it, for wise and holy ends. Nay, they stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door, and are not saved, because they are not ready for salvation.

4. They are deceived in those things that were their confidence, and which they thought would have secured their peace to them; ver. 19, "The daughter of my people" cries, cries aloud, "because of them that dwell in a far country," because of the foreign enemy that invades them, that comes from a far country to take possession of ours; this occasions the cry. And what is the cry? It is this; "Is not the Lord in Zion? Is not her king in her?" These were the two things that they had all along buoyed up themselves with, and depended upon. 1st. That they had among them the temple of God, and the tokens of his special presence with them. The common cant was, "Is not the Lord in Zion?" What danger then need we fear? And they held by this when the trouble was breaking in upon them, Surely we shall do well enough, for have we not God among us? But when it grew to an extremity, it was an aggravation of their misery that they had thus flattered themselves. 2nd. That they had the throne of the house of David. As they had a temple, so they had a monarchy jure divino,—'by Divine right.' Is not Zion's king in her? And will not Zion's God protect Zion's king and his kingdom? Surely he will; but why does he not? What, say they, hath Zion neither a god nor a king to stand by her, and help her, that she is thus run down, and likely to be ruined? This outcry of theirs reflects upon God, as if his power and promise were broken or weakened; and therefore he returns an answer to it immediately; "Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven images?" They quarrel with God, as if he had dealt unkindly by them in forsaking them, whereas they, by their idolatry, had driven him from them; they have withdrawn from their allegiance to him, and so have thrown themselves out of his protection. They "fret themselves, and curse their king and their God," Isa. viii. 21, when it is their own sin that separates between them and God, Isa. lix. 2. They feared not the Lord, and then what can a king do for them? Hos. x. 3.

Thirdly. We have here the prophet himself bewailing the calamity and ruin of his people; for there were more of the lamentations of Jeremiah than those we find in the book that bears that title. Observe here,

1. How great his griefs were. He was an eyewitness of the desolations of his country, and saw those things which by the spirit of prophecy he had foreseen. In the foresight, much more in the sight of them, he cries out, "My heart is faint in me," I sink, I die away at the consideration of it; ver. 18, "When I would comfort myself against my sorrow," I do but labour in vain; nay, every attempt to alleviate the grief doth but aggravate it. It is our wisdom and duty, under mournful events, to do what we can to comfort ourselves against our sorrow, by suggesting to ourselves such considerations as are proper to allay the grief, and balance the grievance. But sometimes the sorrow is such, that the more it is repressed the more strongly it recoils. It may sometimes be the case of very good men, as of the prophet here, whose soul refused to be comforted, and fainted at the cordial, Ps. lxxvii. 2, 3. He tells, ver. 21, what was the matter; it is "for the hurt of the daughter of my people," that I am thus hurt; it is for their sin, and the miseries they have brought upon themselves by it; it is for this that "I am black," that I look black, that I go in black as mourners do, and that "astonishment hath taken hold on me," so that I know not what to do, nor which way to turn. Note, The miseries of our country ought to be very much the grief of our souls. A gracious spirit will be a public spirit, a tender spirit, a mourning spirit. It becomes us to lament the miseries of our fellow-creatures, much more to lay to heart the calamities of our country, and especially of the church of God, to grieve for the affliction of Joseph. Jeremiah had prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem, and though the truth of his prophecy was questioned, yet he did not rejoice in the proof of the truth of it, by the accomplishment of it, preferring the welfare of his country before his own reputation. If Jerusalem had repented and been spared, he would have been far from fretting as Jonah did. Jeremiah had many enemies in Judah and Jerusalem, that hated, and reproached, and persecuted him,—and in the judgments brought upon them, God reckoned with them for it, and pleaded his prophet's cause,—yet he was far from rejoicing in it; so truly did he forgive his enemies, and desire that God would forgive them.

2. How small his hopes were; ver. 22, "Is there no balm in Gilead?" No medicine proper for a sick and dying kingdom? "Is there no physician there?" No skilful, faithful hand to apply the medicine? He looks upon the case to be deplorable, and past relief. There is no balm in Gilead that can cure the disease of sin; no physician there that can restore the health of a nation quite overrun by such a foreign army as that of the Chaldeans. The desolations made are irreparable, and the disease is presently come to such a height, that there is no checking it. Or this verse may be understood as laying all the blame of the incurableness of their disease upon themselves; and so the question must be answered affirmatively; "Is there no balm in Gilead?" "No physician there?" Yes, certainly there is, God is able to help and heal them; there is a sufficiency in him to redress all their grievances. Gilead was a place in their own land, not far off. They had among themselves God's law and his prophets, with the help of which they might have been brought to repentance, and their ruin might have been prevented; they have princes and priests, whose business it was to reform the nation, and redress their grievances. What could have been done more than has been done for their recovery? Why then is not their health restored? Certainly it was not long of God, but of themselves; it was not for want of balm and a physician, but because they would not admit the application, nor submit to the methods of cure. The physician and physic were both ready, but the patient was wilful and irregular, would not be tied to rules, but must be humoured. Note, If sinners die of their wounds, their blood is upon their own heads. The blood of Christ is balm in Gilead, his Spirit is the physician there, both sufficient, all-sufficient, so that they might have been healed, but would not.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter the prophet goes on faithfully to reprove sin, and to threaten God's judgments for it, and yet bitterly to lament both, as one that neither rejoiced at iniquity, nor was glad at calamities. I. He here expresseth his great grief for the miseries of Judah and Jerusalem, and his detestation of their sins, which brought those miseries upon them, ver. 1—11. II. He justifies God in the greatness of the destruction brought upon them, ver. 9, 12—16. III. He calls upon others to bewail the woful case of Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 17—22. He shews them the folly and vanity of trusting in their own strength, or wisdom, or the privileges of their circumcision, or any thing but God only, ver. 23—26.

OH that my head were waters,
And mine eyes a fountain of tears,
That I might weep day and night
For the slain of the daughter of my people!
2 Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging place of wayfaring men;
That I might leave my people, and go from them!
For they be all adulterers,
An assembly of treacherous men.
3 And they bend their tongues like their bow for lies:
But they are not valiant for the truth upon the earth;
For they proceed from evil to evil,
And they know not me, saith the LORD.
4 Take ye heed every one of his neighbour,
And trust ye not in any brother:
For every brother will utterly supplant,
And every neighbour will walk with slanders.
5 And they will deceive every one his neighbour,
And will not speak the truth:
They have taught their tongue to speak lies,
And weary themselves to commit iniquity.
6 Thine habitation is in the midst of deceit;
Through deceit they refuse to know me, saith the LORD.
7 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts,
Behold, I will melt them, and try them;
For how shall I do for the daughter of my people?
8 Their tongue is as an arrow shot out;
It speaketh deceit:
One speaketh peaceably to his neighbour with his mouth,
But in heart he layeth his wait.
9 Shall I not visit them for these things? saith the LORD:
Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?
10 For the mountains will I take up a weeping and wailing,
And for the habitations of the wilderness a lamentation,
Because they are burned up, so that none can pass through them;
Neither can men hear the voice of the cattle;
Both the fowl of the heavens and the beast are fled;
They are gone.
11 And I will make Jerusalem heaps, and a den of dragons;
And I will make the cities of Judah desolate, without an inhabitant.

The prophet, being commissioned both to foretell the destruction coming upon Judah and Jerusalem and to point out the sin for which that destruction was brought upon them, here, as elsewhere, speaks of both very feelingly. What he said of both came from the heart, and therefore one would have thought it should have reached to the heart.

First. He abandons himself to sorrow, in consideration of the calamitous condition of his people, which he sadly laments, as one that preferred Jerusalem before his chief joy, and her grievances before his chief sorrows.

1. He laments the slaughter of the persons; the blood shed, and the lives lost; ver. 1, "Oh that my head were waters," quite melted and dissolved with grief, that so mine eyes might be "a fountain of tears," weeping abundance continually, and without intermission, still sending forth fresh floods of tears, as there still occur fresh occasions for them. The same word in Hebrew signifies both the eye and a fountain; as if in this land of sorrows our eyes were designed rather for weeping than seeing. Jeremiah wept much, and yet wished he could weep more, that he might affect a stupid people, and rouse them to a due sense of the hand of God gone out against them. Note, It becomes us, while we are here in this vale of tears, to conform to the temper of the climate, and to sow in tears; "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted" hereafter; but let them expect that, while they are here, the clouds will still return after the rain. While we find our hearts such fountains of sin, it is fit our eyes should be fountains of tears. But Jeremiah's grief here is upon the public account. He would "weep day and night," not so much for the death of his own near relations, but for "the slain of the daughter of his people;" the multitudes of his countrymen that fell by the sword of war. Note, When we hear of the numbers of the slain in great battles and sieges, we ought to be much affected with it, and not to make a light matter of it; yea, though they be not of the daughter of our people; for, whatever people they are of, they are of the same human nature with us; and there are so many precious lives lost, as dear to them as ours to us, and so many precious souls gone into eternity.

2. He laments the desolations of the country. This he brings in, ver. 10, (for passionate mourners do not use to be very methodical in their discourses,) Not only for the towns and cities, but "for the mountains will I take up a weeping and wailing;" not barren mountains, but the fruitful hills with which Judea abounded; "and for the habitations of the wilderness," or, rather the pastures of the plain, that used to be clothed with flocks, or covered over with corn; and a goodly sight it was. But now they are burnt up by the Chaldean army, which, according to the custom of war, destroyed the forage, and carried off all the cattle; so that none dares to pass through them, for fear of meeting with some parties of the enemy; none cares to pass through them, every thing looks so melancholy and frightful. None have any business to pass through them, for they hear not "the voice of the cattle" there as usual, the bleating of the sheep, and the lowing of the oxen, that grateful music to the owners. Nay, "both the fowl of the heavens and the beasts are fled;" either frightened away by the rude noises and terrible fires which the enemies make, or forced away because there is no subsistence for them. Note, God has many ways of turning a fruitful land into barrenness for the wickedness of them that dwell therein; and the havoc war makes in a country cannot but be for a lamentation to all tender spirits; for it is a tragedy which destroys the stage it is acted on.

Secondly. He abandons himself to solitude, in consideration of the scandalous character and carriage of his people. Though he dwells in Judah, where God is known, in Salem, where his tabernacle is, yet he is ready to cry out, "Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech," Ps. cxx. 5. While all his neighbours are fleeing to the defenced cities, and Jerusalem especially, in dread of the enemies' rage, ch. iv. 5, 6, he is contriving to retire into some desert, in detestation of his people's sin; ver. 2, "Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men;" such a lonely cottage to dwell in as they have in the deserts of Arabia, which are uninhabited, for travellers to repose themselves in, "that I might leave my people, and go from them;" not only because of the ill usage they gave him, he would rather venture himself among the wild beasts of the desert than among such treacherous people; but rather because his righteous soul was vexed from day to day, as Lot's was in Sodom, with the wickedness of their conversation, 2 Pet. ii. 7, 8. This doth not speak any intention or resolution he had thus to retire. God had cut him out work among them, which he must not quit for his own ease; we must not go out of the world, as bad as it is, before our time. If he could not reform them, he could bear a testimony against them; if he could not do good to many, yet he might to some; but it speaks a temptation he was in to leave them, and a threatening that they should be deprived of his ministry, and especially the holy indignation he had against their abominable wickedness, notwithstanding all the pains he had taken with them to reclaim them. It made him even weary of his life to see them dishonouring God as they did, and destroying themselves. Time was, when the place which God had chosen to put his name there was the desire and delight of good men. David in a wilderness longed to be again in the courts of God's house; but now Jeremiah, in the courts of God's house, (for there he was when he said this,) wisheth himself in a wilderness. Those have made themselves very miserable that have made God's people and ministers weary of them, and willing to get from them. Now, to justify his willingness to leave them, he shews,

1. What he himself had observed among them. He would not think of leaving them because they were poor and in distress, but because they were wicked.

1st. They were filthy; "They be all adulterers," that is, the generality of them, ch. v. 8. They all either practised this sin or connived at those that did. Lewdness and uncleanness was that crying sin of Sodom, at which righteous Lot was vexed in soul; and it is a sin that renders men loathsome in the eyes of God and all good men; it makes men an abomination.

2nd. They were false. This is the sin that is most enlarged upon here; they that had been unfaithful to their God were so to one another, and it was a part of their punishment, as well as their sin; for even those that love to cheat yet hate to be cheated. First. Go into their solemn meetings, either for the exercises of religion or the administration of justice, or for commerce, either to church, court, or exchange, and they are an "assembly of treacherous men;" they are so by consent, they strengthen one another's hands in doing any thing that is perfidious. There they will cheat deliberately and industriously, with design, with a malicious design, for "they bend their tongues like their bow for lies," with a great deal of craft; their tongues are fitted for lying, as a bow that is bent is for shooting, and are as constantly used for that purpose. Their tongue turns as naturally to a lie as the bow to the string; "but they are not valiant for the truth upon the earth." Their tongues are like a bow strung, with which they might do good service, if they would use that art and resolution which they are so much masters of in the cause of truth; but they will not do so. They appear not in defence of the truth of God, which were delivered to them by the prophets; but even those that could not deny them to be truths yet were content to see them run down. In the administration of justice they have not courage to stand by an honest cause, that has truth on its side, if greatness and power be on the other side. Those that will be faithful to the truth must be valiant for it, and not be daunted by the opposition given to it, nor fear the face of man. "They are not valiant for the truth in the land," the land which has truth for the glory of it. Truth is fallen in the land, and they dare not lend a hand to help it up, Isa. lix. 14, 15. We must answer another day not only for our enmity in opposing truth, but our cowardice in defending it. Secondly. Go into their families, and you will find they will cheat their own brethren; "every brother will utterly supplant," they will trip up one another's heels if they can, for they lie at catch to seek all advantages against those they hope to make a hand of. Jacob had his name from supplanting; it is the word here used, they followed him in his name, but not in his true character, without guile. So very false are they, that you cannot trust in a brother, but must stand as much upon your guard as if you were dealing with a stranger, with a Canaanite, that has balances of deceit in his hand. Things are come to an ill pass indeed, when a man cannot put confidence in his own brother. Thirdly. Go into company, and observe both their commerce and their conversation, and you will find there is nothing of sincerity or common honesty among them; Nec hospes ab hospite tutus,—'The host and the guest are in danger from each other.' The best advice a wise man can give you is, "to take heed every one of his neighbour;" nay, of his friend, so some read it, of him whom he has befriended, and who pretends friendship to him. No man thinks himself bound either to be grateful or to be sincere. Take them in their converse, "and every neighbour will walk with slanders," they care not what ill they say one of another, though never so false. That way that the slander goes they will go; they will walk with it. They will walk about from house to house, carrying slanders along with them, all the ill-natured stories they can pick up or invent to make mischief. Take them in their trading and bargaining, "and they will deceive every one his neighbour," will say any thing, though they know it to be false, for their own advantage. Nay, they will lie for lying sake, to keep their tongues in use to it, for they "will not speak the truth," but will tell a deliberate lie, and laugh at it when they have done.

And that which aggravates the sin of this false and lying generation is, 1*st.* That they are ingenious to sin. "They have taught their tongues to speak lies;" implying that, through the reluctancies of natural conscience, they found it difficult to bring themselves to it. Their tongues would have spoken truth, but they taught them to speak lies, and by degrees have made themselves masters of the art of lying, and have got such a habit of it, that use has made it a second nature to them. They learned it when they were young, for "the wicked are estranged from the womb, speaking lies," Ps. lviii. 3; and now they are grown dexterous at it. 2*nd.* That they are industrious to sin; they "weary themselves to commit iniquity." They put a force upon their conscience to bring themselves to it, and tire out their convictions by offering them a continual violence; and they take a great deal of pains till they have even spent themselves in bringing about their malicious designs; they are wearied with their sinful pursuits, and yet not weary of them. The service of sin is a perfect drudgery; men run themselves out of breath in it, and put themselves to a great deal of toil to damn their own souls. 3*rd.* That they grow worse and worse; ver. 3, "They proceed from evil to evil," from one sin to another, from one degree of sin to another. They began with lesser sins, nemo repente fit turpissimus,—'no one reaches the height of vice at once;' they began with equivocating and bantering, but at last come to downright lying; and they are now proceeding to greater sins yet, for "they know not me, saith the Lord." And where men have no knowledge of God, or no consideration of what they have known of him, what good can be expected from them? Men's ignorance of God is the cause of all their ill carriage one towards another.

2. The prophet shews what God had informed him of their wickedness, and what he had determined against them.

1st. God had marked their sin. He could tell the prophet, (and he speaks of it with compassion,) what sort of people they were that he had to deal with; "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest," Rev. ii. 13. So here, ver. 6, "Thine habitation is in the midst of deceit," that is, All about thee are addicted to it, therefore stand upon thy guard. If all men are liars, it concerns us to beware of men, and be wise as serpents. They are deceitful men, therefore there is little hopes of thy doing any good among them; for, make things never so plain, they have some trick or other wherewith to shuffle off their convictions. This charge is enlarged upon, ver. 8: their tongue was a bow bent, ver. 3, plotting and preparing mischief; here it is "an arrow shot out," putting in execution what they had projected. It is as 'a slaying arrow,' so some readings of the original have it. Their tongue has been to many an instrument of death. They speak peaceably to their neighbours, against whom they are at the same time lying in wait; as Joab kissed Abner when he was about to kill him; and Cain, that he might not be suspected of any ill design, talked with his brother freely and familiarly. Note, Fair words, when they are not attended with good intentions, are despicable; but when they are intended as a cloak and cover for wicked intentions they are abominable; and while they did all this injury to one another they put a great contempt upon God; Not only they know not me, but, ver. 6, through deceit, through the delusions of the false prophets, they refuse to know me; they are so cheated into a good opinion of their own ways, the ways of their own heart, that they desire not the knowledge of God's ways. Or, they are so wedded to this sinful course they are in, and so betwitched with that, and the gains of that, that they will by no means admit the knowledge of God, because that would be a check upon them in their sins. This is the ruin of sinners, they might be taught the good knowledge of the Lord, and they will not learn it; and where no knowledge of God is what good can be expected? Hos. iv. 1.

2nd. He had marked them for ruin, ver. 7, 9, 11. Those that will not know God as their lawgiver, shall be made to know him as their judge. God determines here to bring his judgments upon them, for the refining of some, and the ruining of the rest. First. Some shall be refined, ver. 7, because they are thus corrupt; "Behold, I will melt them, and try them," will bring them into trouble, and see what that will do to bring them to repentance; whether the furnace of affliction will purify them from their dross, and whether when they are melted, they will be new cast into a better mould. He will make trial of lesser afflictions, before he brings upon them utter destruction, for he desires not the death of sinners. They shall not be rejected as reprobate silver, till the founder has melted in vain, ch. vi. 29, 30. "For how shall I do for the daughter of my people?" He speaks as one consulting with himself what to do with them that might be for the best; and as one that could not find in his heart to cast them off, and give them up to ruin, till he had first tried all means likely to bring them to repentance. Or, how else shall I do for them? They are grown so very corrupt, that there is no other way with them but to put them into the furnace; what other course can I take with them? Isa. v. 4, 5. It is "the daughter of my people," and I must do something to vindicate my own honour, which will be reflected upon if I connive at their wickedness. I must do something to reduce and reform them. A parent corrects his own children because they are his own. Note, When God afflicts his people, it is with a gracious design to mollify and reduce them; it is but when need is, and when he knows it is the best method he can use. Secondly. The rest shall be ruined; ver. 9, "Shall I not visit for these things?" Fraud and falsehood are sins which God hates, and which he will reckon for; "Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this," that is so universally corrupt, and by their impudence in sin even dares and defies Divine vengeance? The sentence is passed, the decree is gone forth; ver. 11, "I will make Jerusalem heaps" of rubbish, and lay it in such ruins that it shall be fit for nothing but to be "a den of dragons;" and the cities of Judah shall be a desolation. God makes them so, for he gives the enemy warrant and power to do it; but why is the holy city made a heap? The answer is ready, because it was become an unholy one.

12 Who is the wise man, that may understand this?
And who is he to whom the mouth of the LORD hath spoken, that he may declare it,
For what the land perisheth
And is burned up like a wilderness, that none passeth through?

13 And the LORD saith,
Because they have forsaken my law
Which I set before them,
And have not obeyed my voice,
Neither walked therein;
14 But have walked after the imagination of their own heart,
And after Baalim, which their fathers taught them:
15 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Behold, I will feed them, even this people, with worm-
And give them water of gall to drink. [wood,
16 I will scatter them also among the heathen,
Whom neither they nor their fathers have known:
And I will send a sword after them,
Till I have consumed them.
17 Thus saith the LORD of hosts,
Consider ye, and call for the mourning women, that they may come;
And send for cunning women, that they may come:

MOURNING WOMEN.

18 And let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us,
That our eyes may run down with tears,
And our eyelids gush out with waters.
19 For a voice of wailing is heard out of Zion,
How are we spoiled! we are greatly confounded,
Because we have forsaken the land,
Because our dwellings have cast us out.
20 Yet hear the word of the LORD, O ye women,
And let your ear receive the word of his mouth,
And teach your daughters wailing,
And every one her neighbour lamentation.
21 For death is come up into our windows,
And is entered into our palaces,
To cut off the children from without,
And the young men from the streets.
22 Speak, Thus saith the LORD, [open field,
Even the carcases of men shall fall as dung upon the
And as the handful after the harvestman, and none shall gather them.

Two things the prophet designs in these verses, with reference to the approaching destruction of Judah and Jerusalem: 1. To convince people of the justice of God in it; that they had by sin brought it upon themselves, and that therefore they had no reason to quarrel with God, who did them no wrong at all, but a great deal of reason to fall out with their sins, which did them all this mischief. 2. To affect people with the greatness of the desolation that was coming, and the miserable effects of it; that by a terrible prospect of it they might be awakened to repentance and reformation, which was the only way to prevent it, or at least mitigate their own share in it. This being designed,

First. He calls for the thinking men, by them to shew people the equity of God's proceedings, though they seemed harsh and severe; ver. 12, Who, where is the wise man or the prophet, "to whom the mouth of the Lord hath spoken?" You boast of your wisdom, and of the prophets you have among you; produce me any one that has but the free use of human reason, or any acquaintance with Divine revelation, and he will soon understand this himself, and it will be so clear to him that he will be ready to declare it to others, that there is a just ground of God's controversy with this people. Do these wise men inquire "for what the land perisheth?" What is the matter, that such a change is made with this land? It used to be a land that God cared for, and he had his eyes upon it for good, Deu. xi. 12. But it is now a land that he has forsaken, and that his face is against. It used to flourish as the garden of the Lord, and to be replenished with inhabitants, but now it is burnt up like a wilderness, that none passeth through it, much less cares to settle in it. It was supposed long ago that it would be asked, when it came to this, "Wherefore has the Lord done thus unto this land? What means the heat of this great anger?" Deu. xxix. 24. To which question God here gives a full answer, before which all flesh must be silent. He produceth out of the record,

1. The indictment preferred and proved against them, upon which they had been found guilty, ver. 13, 14. It is charged upon them, and it cannot be denied, 1st. That they have revolted from their allegiance to their rightful Sovereign; therefore God has forsaken their land, and justly, because they have forsaken his law, which he had so plainly, so fully, so frequently, set before them, and had not observed his orders, nor obeyed his voice, nor walked in the ways that he had appointed. Here their wickedness began, in the omission of their duty to their God and a contempt of his authority. But it did not end there. It is farther charged upon them, 2nd. That they have entered themselves into the service of pretenders and usurpers; have not only withdrawn themselves from their obedience to their prince, but have taken up arms against him. For, First. They have acted according to the dictates of their own lusts; have set up their own will, the wills of the flesh, and the carnal mind, in competition with, and contradiction to, the will of God; they "have walked after the imagination of their own heart;" they would do as they pleased, whatever God and conscience said to the contrary. Secondly. They have worshipped the creatures of their own fancy, the work of their own hands, according to the tradition received from their fathers. "They have walked after Baalim;" the word is plural. They had many Baals, Baal-peor, and Baal-berith, the Baal of this place, and the Baal of the other place; for they had lords many, "which their fathers taught them" to worship, but which the God of their fathers had again and again forbidden. This was it for which the land perished. The King of kings never makes war thus upon his own subjects but when they treacherously depart from him, and rebel against him, and it is become necessary, by this means, to chastise their rebellion and reduce them to their allegiance; and they themselves shall at length acknowledge that he is just in all that is brought upon them.

2. The judgment given upon this indictment, the sentence upon the convicted rebels, which must now be executed; for it was righteous, and nothing could be moved in arrest of it. The Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, hath said it, ver. 15, 16, and who can reverse it? 1st. That all their comforts at home shall be poisoned and embittered to them; "I will feed this people with wormwood," or, rather, with wolf's-bane, for it signifies an herb that is not wholesome, as wormwood is, though it be bitter; but some herb that is both nauseous and noxious. And I will give them water of gall, or juice of hemlock, or some other herb that is poisonous, to drink. Every thing about them, till it comes to their very meat and drink, shall be a terror and torment to them; God will curse their blessings, Mal. ii. 2. 2nd. That their dispersion abroad shall be their destruction; ver. 16, "I will scatter them among the heathen." They were corrupted and debauched by their intimacy with the heathen, with whom they mingled themselves, and learned their works; and now they shall lose themselves there where they lost their virtue, among the heathen; that is, they had violated the laws of that truth which is the bond and cement of society and commerce, and addicted themselves to deceit and lying, and therefore are justly crumbled to dust, and scattered "among the heathen." They set up gods which "neither they nor their fathers had known," strange gods, new gods, Deu. xxxii. 17, and now God will put them among neighbours which "neither they nor their fathers have known," that they can claim no acquaintance with, and therefore can expect no favour from. And yet, though they are scattered so as that they will not know where to find one another, God will know where to find them all out, Ps. xxi. 8, with that evil which still pursues impenitent sinners; "I will send a sword after them," some killing judgment or other, "till I have consumed them;" for when God judgeth he will overcome, when he pursues he will overtake. And now we see for what the land perisheth; all this desolation is the desert of their deeds, and the performance of God's words.

Secondly. He calls for the mourning women, and engageth them, with the arts they have to affect people, and move their passion, to lament these sad calamities, that were come or coming upon them, that the nation might be alarmed to prepare for them. The Lords of hosts himself saith, "Call for the mourning women, that they may come," ver. 17. The scope of this is to shew how very woful and lamentable the condition of this people was likely to be.

1. Here is work for the counterfeit mourners; "Send for cunning women," that know how to compose mournful ditties, or at least to sing them in mournful tunes and accents, and therefore are made use of at funerals, to supply the want of true mourners. Let these "take up a wailing for us," ver. 18. The deaths and funerals were so many, that people have wept for them till they have no more power to weep; as those, 1 Sam. xxx. 4. Let them, therefore, do it now whose trade it is; or, rather, it intimates the extreme sottishness and stupidity of the people, that laid not to heart the judgments they were under, nor, even when there was so much blood shed, could find in their hearts to shed a tear; "They cry not when God bindeth them," Job xxxvi. 13. God sent in his mourning prophets to them to call them to weeping and mourning, but his word in their mouths did not work upon their faith; rather, therefore, than they shall go laughing to their ruin, let the mourning women come, and by humouring the thing try to work upon their fancy, that their eyes may at length run down with tears, and their eyelids gush out with waters. First or last, sinners must be weepers.

2. Here is work for the real mourners.

1st. There is that which is a lamentation. The present scene is very tragical; ver. 19, "A voice of wailing is heard out of Zion." Some make this to be the song of the mourning women; it is rather an echo to it, returned by those whose affections were moved by their wailings. In Zion the voice of joy and praise used to be heard, while the people kept close to God; but sin has altered the note, it is now the voice of lamentation. It should seem to be the voice of those who fled from all parts of the country to the castle of Zion for protection. Instead of rejoicing that they were got safe thither, they lamented that they were forced to seek for shelter there; "How are we spoiled!" How are we stripped of all our possessions. "We are greatly confounded," ashamed of ourselves and our poverty; for that is it they complain of; that is it they blush at the thoughts of, rather than of their sin; "We are confounded, because we have forsaken the land," forced so to do by the enemy; not because we have forsaken the Lord, drawn aside of our own lust and enticed; "because our dwellings have cast us out," not because our God hath cast us off. Thus unhumbled hearts lament their calamity, but not their iniquity, the procuring cause of it.

2nd. There is more still to come that shall be for a lamentation. Things are bad, but they are likely to be worse. They whose land had spewed them out, as it did their predecessors, the Canaanites, and justly, because they trod in their steps, Lev. xviii. 28, complain that they are driven into the city, but after a while those of the city, and they with them, shall be forced thence too. "Yet hear the word of the Lord," he hath something more to say to you, ver. 20; et the women hear it, whose tender spirits are apt to receive the impressions of grief and fear, for the men will not heed it, will not give it a patient hearing. The prophets will be glad to preach to a congregation of women that tremble at God's word. Let your ear receive the word of God's mouth, and bid it welcome, though it be a word of terror. Let the women teach their daughters wailing, which intimates that the trouble shall last long. Grief shall be entailed upon the generation to come. Young people are apt to love mirth, and expect mirth, and are disposed to be gay and airy, but let the elder women teach the younger to be serious; tell them what a vale of tears they must expect to find this world, and train them up among the mourners in Zion, Tit. ii. 4, 5. Let every one teach her neighbour lamentation, which intimates that the trouble shall spread far, shall go from house to house. People shall not need to sympathize with their friends, they shall all have cause enough to mourn for themselves. Note, Those that are themselves affected with the terrors of the Lord should endeavour to affect others with them. The judgment here threatened is made to look terrible.

First. Multitudes shall be slain, ver. 21. Death shall ride in triumph, and there shall be no escaping his arrests, when he comes with commission, neither within doors nor without. Not within doors, for let the doors be shut never so fast, let them be never so firmly locked and bolted, "Death comes up into our windows," like a thief in the night; it steals upon us ere we are aware. Nor doth it thus boldly attack the cottages only, but it is entered into our palaces, the palaces of our princes and great men, though never so stately, never so strongly built and guarded. Note, No palaces can keep out death. Nor are those more safe that are abroad; death "cuts off even the children from without, and the young men from the streets." The children who might have been spared by the enemy in pity, because they had never been hurtful to them, and the young men, who might have been spared in policy, because capable of being serviceable to them, yet shall fall together by the sword. It is usual now, even in the severest military executions, to put none to the sword but those that are found in arms; but then even the boys and girls playing in the streets were sacrificed to the fury of the conqueror.

Secondly. Those that are slain shall be left unburied; ver. 22, "Speak, Thus saith the Lord," for the confirmation and aggravation of what was before said, "Even the carcases of men shall fall as dung," neglected, and left to be offensive to the smell, as dung is. Common humanity obligeth the survivors to bury the dead, even for their own sake; but here such numbers shall be slain, and those so dispersed all the country over, that it shall be an endless thing to bury them at all; nor shall there be hands enough to do it, nor shall the conquerors permit it; and those that should do it shall be overwhelmed with grief, so that they shall have no heart to do it. The dead bodies even of the fairest and strongest, when they have lain awhile, become as dung, such vile bodies have we. And here such multitudes shall fall that their bodies shall lie as thick as heaps of dung in the furrows of the field, and no more notice taken of them than of the handfuls which the harvestman drops for the gleaners, for none shall gather them, but they shall remain in sight, monuments of Divine vengeance, that the eye of the impenitent survivors may affect their heart. "Slay them not," bury them not, "lest my people forget," Ps. lix. 11.

23 Thus saith the LORD,
Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom,
Neither let the mighty man glory in his might,
Let not the rich man glory in his riches:
24 But let him that glorieth glory in this,
That he understandeth and knoweth me,
That I am the LORD which exercise lovingkindness,
Judgment, and righteousness, in the earth:
For in these things I delight, saith the LORD.
25 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will punish all them which are circumcised with the uncircumcised;
26 Egypt, and Judah, and Edom,
And the children of Ammon, and Moab,
And all that are in the utmost corners,
That dwell in the wilderness:
For all these nations are uncircumcised,
And all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart.

The prophet had been endeavouring to possess this people with a holy fear of God and his judgments, to convince them both of sin and wrath, but still they had recourse to some sorry subterfuge or other, under which to shelter themselves from the conviction, and with which to excuse themselves in their obstinacy and carelessness; he therefore sets himself here to drive them from these refuges of lies, and to shew them the insufficiency of them.

First. When they were told how inevitable the judgment would be, they pleaded the defence of their politics and powers, which, with the help of their wealth and treasure, they thought made their city impregnable. In answer to this he shews them the folly of trusting to, and boasting of, all these stays, while they have not a God in covenant to stay themselves upon, ver. 23, 24. Here he shews,

1. What we may not depend upon in a day of distress; "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom," as if with the help of that he could outwit or countermine the enemy, or in the greatest extremity find out some evasion or other, for a man's wisdom may fail him then when he needs it most, and he may be taken in his own craftiness. Ahithophel was befooled, and counsellors are oft led away spoiled. But if a man's policies fail him, yet sure he may gain his point by might and dint of courage. No, "Let not the strong man glory in his strength," for the battle is not always to the strong; David the stripling proves too hard for Goliath the giant. All human force is nothing without God, worse than nothing against him. But may not the rich man's wealth be his strong city? money answers all things. No, "Let not the rich man glory in his riches;" for they may prove so far from sheltering him, that they may expose him and make him the fairer mark. Let not the people boast of the wise men, and mighty men, and rich men that they have among them, as if they could make their part good against the Chaldeans, because they have wise men to advise concerning the war, mighty men to fight their battles, and rich men to bear the charges of the war. Let not particular persons think to escape the common calamity by their wisdom, might, or money, for all these will prove but vain things for safety.

2. He shews what we may depend upon in a day of distress. 1st. Our only comfort in trouble will be that we have done our duty. They that refused to know God, ver. 6, will boast in vain of their wisdom and wealth, but they that know God intelligently, that understand aright that he is the Lord, that have not only right apprehensions concerning his nature, and attributes, and relations to man, but receive and retain the impressions of them, may glory in this, it will be their rejoicing in the day of evil. 2nd. Our only confidence in trouble will be, that having through grace, in some measure, done our duty, we shall find God a God all-sufficient to us. We may glory in this, that, wherever we are, we have an acquaintance with, and an interest in, a God that "exerciseth lovingkindness, and judgment, and righteousness in the earth;" that is not only just to all his creatures, and will do no wrong to any of them, but kind to all his children, and will protect them and provide for them. "For in these things I delight;" God delights to shew kindness and to execute judgment himself, and is pleased with those who herein are "followers of him as dear children." Those that have such knowledge of the glory of God as to be changed into the same image, and to partake of his holiness, it is their perfection and glory; and the God they thus faithfully conform to they may cheerfully confide in in their greatest straits. But the prophet intimates that the generality of this people took no care about this. Their wisdom, and might, and riches, were their joy and hope, which would end in grief and despair. But those few among them that had the knowledge of God might please themselves with it, and boast themselves of it; it would stand them in better stead than thousands of gold and silver.

Secondly. When they were told how provoking their sins were to God, they vainly pleaded the covenant of their circumcision. No doubt but they were the people of God; as they had the temple of the Lord in their city, so they had the mark of his children in their flesh. It is true the Chaldean army has laid such and such nations waste because they were uncircumcised, and therefore not under the protection of the Divine providence, as we are. To this the prophet answers, that the days of visitation were now at hand, in which God would punish all wicked people, without making any distinction between the circumcised and the uncircumcised, ver. 25, 26. They had by sin profaned the crown of their peculiarity, and lived in common with the uncircumcised nations, and so had forfeited the benefit of it, and must expect to fare never the better for it. God will punish the circumcised with the uncircumcised. As the ignorance of the uncircumcised shall not excuse their wickedness, so neither shall the privileges of the circumcised excuse theirs, but they shall be punished together. Note, The Judge of all the earth is impartial, and none shall fare the better at his bar for any external advantages, but he will render to every man, circumcised or uncircumcised, according to his works. The condemnation of impenitent sinners, that are baptized, will be as sure, nay, and more severe, than that of impenitent sinners that are unbaptized. It would affect one to find here Judah industriously put between Egypt and Edom, as standing upon a level with them, and under the same doom, ver. 26. These nations were forbidden a share in the Jews' privileges, Deu. xxiii. 3; but the Jews are here told that they shall share in their punishments. Those "in the utmost corners, that dwell in the wilderness," are supposed to be the Kedarens, and those of the kingdoms of Hazor, as appears, by comparing ch. xlix. 28, 32. Some think they are so called because they dwelt, as it were, in a corner of the world; others, because they had the hair of their head polled into corners. However that was, they were of those nations that were uncircumcised in flesh, and the Jews are ranked with them, and are as near to ruin for their sins as they; for "all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart." They have the sign, but not the thing signified, ch. iv. 4. They are heathens in their heart, strangers to God, and enemies in their minds by wicked words. Their hearts are disposed to idols, as the hearts of the uncircumcised Gentiles are. Note, The seals of the covenant, though they dignify and oblige us, yet they will not save us, unless the temper of our minds, and the tenor of our lives, agree with the covenant. That only is circumcision, and that baptism, which is of the heart, Rom. ii. 28, 29.

CHAPTER X.

We may conjecture that the prophecy of this chapter was delivered after the first captivity, in the time of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, when many were carried away to Babylon; for it has a double reference. I. To those that were carried away into the land of the Chaldeans, a country notorious above any other for idolatry and superstition; and they are here cautioned against the infection of the place, not to learn the way of the heathen, ver. 1,.2, for their astrology and idolatry are both foolish things, ver. 3—5, the worshippers of idols brutish, ver. 8, 9, and so it will appear in the day of their visitation, ver. 14, 15. They are likewise exhorted to adhere firmly to the God of Israel, for there is none like him, ver. 6, 7; he is the true God, lives for ever, and has the government of the world, ver. 10—13; and his people are happy in him, ver. 16. II. To those that yet remained in their own land; and they are cautioned against security, and bidden to expect distress, ver. 17, 18; and that by a foreign enemy which God would bring upon them for their sin, ver. 20—22. This calamity the prophet laments, ver. 19, and prays for the mitigation of it, ver. 23—25.

HEAR ye the word which the LORD speaketh unto you, O house of Israel: 2 Thus saith the LORD,
Learn not the way of the heathen,
And be not dismayed at the signs of heaven;
For the heathen are dismayed at them.
3 For the customs of the people are vain:

For one cutteth a tree out of the forest,
The work of the hands of the workman, with the ax.

GODS OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

4 They deck it with silver and with gold;
They fasten it with nails and with hammers,
That it move not.
5 They are upright as the palm tree,
But speak not:
They must needs be borne,
Because they cannot go.
Be not afraid of them; for they cannot do evil,
Neither also is it in them to do good.
6 Forasmuch as there is none like unto thee, O LORD;
Thou art great, and thy name is great in might.
7 Who would not fear thee, O King of nations?
For to thee doth it appertain:
Forasmuch as among all the wise men of the nations,
And in all their kingdoms, there is none like unto thee.
8 But they are altogether brutish and foolish:
The stock is a doctrine of vanities.
9 Silver spread into plates is brought from Tarshish,
And gold from Uphaz,
The work of the workman,
And of the hands of the founder:
Blue and purple is their clothing:
They are all the work of cunning men

DRESSED IMAGES.

10 But the LORD is the true God,
He is the living God, and an everlasting king:
At his wrath the earth shall tremble,
And the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation.
11 Thus shall ye say unto them,
The gods that have not made the heavens and the earth,
Even they shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens.
12 He hath made the earth by his power,
He hath established the world by his wisdom,
And hath stretched out the heavens by his discretion.
13 When he uttereth his voice, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens, [of the earth;
And he causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends
He maketh lightnings with rain,
And bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures.
14 Every man is brutish in his knowledge:
Every founder is confounded by the graven image:
For his molten image is falsehood,
And there is no breath in them.
15 They are vanity, and the work of errors:
In the time of their visitation they shall perish.
16 The portion of Jacob is not like them:
For he is the former of all things;
And Israel is the rod of his inheritance:
The LORD of hosts is his name.

The prophet Isaiah, when he prophesied of the captivity in Babylon, added warnings against idolatry, and largely exposed the sottishness of idolaters; not only because the temptations in Babylon would be in danger of drawing the Jews there to idolatry, but because the afflictions in Babylon were designed to cure them of their idolatry. Thus the prophet Jeremiah here arms people against the idolatrous usages and customs of the heathen; not only for the use of those that were gone to Babylon, but of those also that stayed behind; that, being convinced and reclaimed by the word of God, the rod might be prevented, and it is written for our learning. Observe here,

First. A solemn charge given to the people of God not to conform themselves to the ways and customs of the heathen. Let the house of Israel hear and receive this word from the God of Israel, "Learn not the way of the heathen;" do not approve of it, no, nor think indifferently concerning it, much less imitate it, or accustom yourselves to it. Let not any of their customs steal in among you, as they are apt to do insensibly, nor mingle themselves with your religion. Note, It ill becomes those that are taught of God, to learn the way of the heathen, and to think of worshipping the true God with such rites and ceremonies as they used in the worship of their false gods: see Deu. xii. 29—31. It was the way of the heathen to worship the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; to whom they gave Divine honours, and from them they expected Divine favours, and therefore according as the signs of heaven were, whether they were auspicious or ominous, they thought themselves countenanced or discountenanced by their deities; which made them observe those signs, the eclipses of the sun and moon, the conjunctions and oppositions of the planets, and all the unusual phenomena of the celestial globe, with a great deal of anxiety and trembling. Business was stopped, if any thing occurred that was thought to bode ill; if it did but thunder on their left hand they were almost as if they had been thunderstruck. Now God would not have his people to be "dismayed at the signs of heaven;" to reverence the stars as deities, or to frighten themselves with any prognostications grounded upon them. Let them fear the God of heaven, and keep up a reverence of his providence, and then they need not be dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the stars in their courses fight not against any that are at peace with God. The heathen are dismayed at these signs, for they know no better; but let not the house of Israel, that are taught of God, be so.

Secondly. Divers good reasons given to enforce this charge.

1. The way of the heathen is very ridiculous and absurd, and is condemned even by the dictates of right reason, ver. 3. The statutes and ordinances of the heathen are vanity itself, they cannot stand the test of a rational disquisition. This is again and again insisted upon here, as it was by Isaiah. The Chaldeans valued themselves by their wisdom, in which they thought they excelled all their neighbours; but the prophet here shews that they and all others that worshipped idols, and expected help and relief from them, were brutish and sottish, and had not common sense.

1st. Consider what the idol is that is worshipped. It was a tree cut out of the forest originally, it was fitted up by the hands of the workman, squared and sawed, and worked into shape: see Isa. xliv. 12, &c. But after all it was but the stock of a tree, fitter to make a gate-post of than any thing else. But to hide the wood they deck it with silver and gold, they gild or lacker it, or they deck it with gold and silver lace, or cloth of tissue. They fasten it to its place, which they themselves have assigned it, with nails and hammers, that it fall not, or be thrown down, or stolen away, ver. 14. The image is made straight enough, and it cannot be denied but that the workman did his part, for it is upright as the palm-tree, ver. 5. It looks stately, and stands up as if it were going to speak to you, but it cannot speak, it is a poor dumb creature; nor can it take one step towards your relief. If there be any occasion for it to shift its place, it must be carried in procession, for it cannot go. Very fitly doth it come in here, "Be not afraid of them," no more than of the signs of heaven. "Be not afraid" of incurring their displeasure, "for they can do no evil;" be not afraid of forfeiting their favour, for "neither is it in them to do good." If you think to mend the matter by mending the materials of which the idol is made, you deceive yourselves. Idols of gold and silver are as unworthy to be worshipped as wooden gods, "The stock is a doctrine of vanities," ver. 8; it teacheth lies, teacheth lies concerning God. It is an instruction of vanities; wood it is. It is likely the idols of gold and silver had wood underneath for the substratum; and then "silver spread into plates is brought from Tarshish," imported from beyond sea, "and gold from Uphaz," or Phaz, which is sometimes rendered, the fine gold, Ps. xxi. 3. A great deal of art is used, and pains taken about it. They are not such ordinary mechanics that are employed about these as about the wooden gods, ver. 3. These are cunning men; it is "the work of the workman," the graver must do his part when it has past through "the hands of the founder." Those were but decked here and there with silver and gold, these are gold and silver all over. And that these gods might be reverenced as kings, "blue and purple is their clothing," the colour of royal robes, ver. 9, which amuseth ignorant worshippers, but makes the matter no better. For what is the idol when it is made, and when they have made the best they can of it? He tells us, ver. 14, "They are falsehood," they are not what they pretend to be, but a great cheat put upon the world. They are worshipped as the gods that give us breath, and life, and sense, whereas they are lifeless, senseless things themselves, "and there is no breath in them;" 'no spirit in them,' so the word is; they are not animated or inhabited, as they are supposed to be, by any Divine spirit, or Numen; they are so far from being gods, that they have not so much as "the spirit of a beast that goes downward." "They are vanity, and the work of errors," ver. 15. Inquire into the use of them, and you will find they are vanity; they are good for nothing, no help is to be expected from them, nor any confidence put in them. They are a deceitful work, works of illusions, or mere mockeries; so some read the following clause. They delude those that put their trust in them, make fools of them, or rather, they make fools of themselves. Inquire into the rise of them, and they are the work of errors, grounded upon the grossest mistakes that ever men that pretended to reason were guilty of. They are the creatures of a deluded fancy; and the errors by which they were produced they propagate among their worshippers.

2nd. Infer from hence what the idolaters are that worship these idols; ver. 8, "They are altogether brutish and foolish;" they that make them are like unto them, senseless and stupid, and there is no spirit in them; no use of reason, else they would never believe in such gods; no sense of honour, else they would never stoop to them; ver. 14, "Every man" that makes or worships idols, is become "brutish in his knowledge;" that is, brutish for want of knowledge; or brutish in that very thing which one would think they should be fully acquainted with: compare Jude 10, "What they know naturally," what they cannot but know by the light of nature, "in those things as brute beasts they corrupt themselves." Though in the works of creation they cannot but see the eternal power and godhead of the Creator, yet they "are become vain in their imaginations, not liking to retain God in their knowledge:" see Rom. i. 21, 28. Nay, whereas they thought it a piece of wisdom thus to multiply gods, it really was the greatest folly they could be guilty of. "The world by wisdom knew not God," 1 Cor. i. 21; Rom. i. 22. "Every founder is" himself "confounded by the graven image;" when he has made it by a mistake, he is more and more confirmed in his mistake by it; he is bewildered, bewitched, and cannot disentangle himself from the snare. Or, it is what he will one time or other be ashamed of.

2. The God of Israel is the one only living and true God, and those that have him for their God need not make their application to any other; nay, to set up any other in competition with him is the greatest affront and injury that can be done him. Let the house of Israel cleave to the God of Israel, and serve and worship him only; for,

1st. He is a nonsuch. Whatever men may set in competition with him, there is none to be compared with him. The prophet turns from speaking with the utmost disdain of the idols of the heathen, as well he might, to speak with the most profound and awful reverence of the God of Israel, ver. 6, 7, "Forasmuch as there is none like unto thee, O Lord," none of all the heroes which the heathen have deified, and make such ado about; the dead men of whom they made dead images, and worshipped them. Some were deified and adored for their wisdom; but among all the wise men of the nations, the greatest philosophers, or statesmen, as Apollo or Hermes, there is none like thee. Others were deified and adored for their dominion; but in all their royalty, so it may be read, among all their kings, as Saturn and Jupiter, there is none like unto thee. What is the glory of a man that invented a useful art, or founded a flourishing kingdom, (and these were grounds sufficient among the heathen to entitle men to an apotheosis,) compared with the glory of Him that is the Creator of the world, and that "formeth the spirit of man within him?" What is the glory of the greatest prince or potentate compared with the glory of Him whose "kingdom ruleth over all?" He acknowledgeth, ver. 6, "O Lord, thou art great," infinite and immense, and "thy name is great in might," thou hast all power, and art known to have it. Men's name is often beyond their might; they are thought to be greater than they are; but God's name is great, and no greater than he really is. And, therefore, "Who would not fear thee, O King of nations?" Who would not choose to worship such a God as this, that can do every thing, rather than such dead idols as the heathen worship, that can do nothing? Who would not be afraid of offending or forsaking a God whose name is so great in might? Which of all the nations, if they understand themselves aright, would not fear him who is the King of nations? Note, It is not only the house of Israel that is bound to worship the great Jehovah as the God of Israel, the King of saints, Rev. xv. 4. 5, but all the families of the earth are bound to worship him as King of nations; for to him it doth appertain, to him it suits and agrees. Note, There is an admirable decency and congruity in the worshipping of God only. It is fit that he that is God alone should alone be served; that he that is Lord of all should be served by all; that he that is great should be greatly feared and greatly praised.

2nd. His verity is as evident as the idols' vanity, ver. 10. They are the work of men's hands; and therefore nothing is more plain than that it is a jest to worship them, if that may be called a jest which is so great an indignity to him that made us. "But the Lord is the true God," the God of truth, he is God in truth; God Jehovah is truth; he is not a counterfeit and pretender as they are, but is really what he has revealed himself to be; he is one we may depend upon, in whom and by whom we cannot be deceived. First. Look upon him as he is in himself, and he is the living God; he is life itself, has life in himself, and is the Fountain of life to all the creatures. The gods of the heathen are dead things, worthless and useless; but ours is a living God, and hath immortality. Secondly. Look upon him with relation to his creatures, and he is a king, and absolute monarch over them all; is their owner and ruler, has an incontestable right both to command them and dispose of them. As a king he protects the creatures, provides for their welfare, and preserves peace among them. He is an everlasting king. The counsels of his kingdom were from everlasting, and the continuance of it will be to everlasting. He is a king of eternity. The idols whom they call their kings are but of yesterday, and will soon be abolished; and the kings of the earth that set them up to be worshipped will themselves be in the dust shortly; but "the Lord shall reign for ever, thy God, O Zion, unto all generations."

3rd. None knows the power of his anger. Let us stand in awe, and not dare to provoke him by giving that glory to another which is due to him alone; for at his wrath the earth shall tremble, even the strongest and stoutest of the kings of the earth; nay, the earth, as firmly as it is fixed, when he pleaseth, is made to quake, and the rocks to tremble, Ps. civ. 32; Hab. iii. 6, 10. Though the nations should join together to contend with him, and unite their force, yet they would be found utterly unable not only to resist, but even to abide his indignation. They cannot only not make head against it, for it would overcome them, but they cannot bear up under it, for it would overload them, Ps. lxxvi, 7, 8; Nah. i. 6.

4th. He is the God of nature, the Fountain of all being; and all the powers of nature are at his command and dispose, ver. 12, 13. The God we worship is he that made the heavens and the earth, and has a sovereign dominion over both. So that his invisible things are manifested and proved in the things that are seen.

First. If we look back we find that the whole world owed its original to him, as its first cause. It was a common saying, even among the Greeks, 'He that sets up to be another god ought first to make another world.' While the heathen worship gods that they made, we worship the God that made us and all things. 1st. The earth is a body of vast bulk, has valuable treasures in its bowels, and more valuable fruit on its surface. It and them he hath made by his power; and it is by no less than an infinite power that it hangs upon nothing, as it doth, Job xxvi. 7; ponderibus librata suis,—'poised by its own weight.' 2nd. The world, the habitable part of the earth, is admirably fitted for the use and service of man, and he hath established it so by his wisdom, so that it continues serviceable in constant changes and yet a continual stability from one generation to another. Therefore both the earth and the world are his, Ps. xxiv. 1. 3rd. The heavens are wonderfully stretched out to an incredible extent, and it is by his discretion that they are so, and that the motions of the heavenly bodies are directed for the benefit of this lower world. These declare his glory, Ps. xix. 1, and oblige us to declare it; and not give that glory to the heavens which is due to him that made them.

Secondly. If we look up, we see his providence to be a continued creation; ver. 13, "When he uttereth his voice," gives the word of command, "there is a multitude of waters in the heavens," which are poured out on the earth, whether for judgment or mercy, as he intends them. When he uttereth his voice in the thunder, presently there follow thunder showers, in which there are a multitude of waters; and those come with a noise, as the margin reads it; and we read of the noise of abundance of rain, 1 Kin. xviii. 41. Nay, there are wonders done daily in the kingdom of nature without noise; "He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth," from all parts of the earth, even the most remote, and chiefly those that lie next the sea. All the earth pays the tribute of vapours, because all the earth receives the blessing of rain. And thus the moisture in the universe, like the money in a kingdom, and the blood in the body, is continually circulating for the good of the whole. Those vapours produce wonders, for of them are formed lightnings for the rain, and the winds, which God from time to time brings forth out of his treasures, as there is occasion for them, directing them all in such measure, and for such use, as he thinks fit, as payments are made out of the treasury. All the meteors are so ready to serve God's purposes, that he seems to have treasures of them that cannot be exhausted, and may at any time be drawn from, Ps. cxxxv. 7. God glories in the treasures he has of these, Job xxxviii. 22, 23. This God can do; but which of the idols of the heathen can do the like? Note, There is no sort of weather but furnisheth us with a proof and instance of the wisdom and power of the great Creator.

5th. This God is Israel's God in covenant, and the felicity of every Israelite indeed. Therefore let the house of Israel cleave to him, and not forsake him to embrace idols; for if they do they certainly change for the worse; for, ver. 16, "The portion of Jacob is not like them." Their rock is not as our rock, Deu. xxxii. 31, nor ours like their mole-hills. Note, First. They that have the Lord for their God have a full and complete happiness in him. The God of Jacob is the portion of Jacob; he is his all, and in him he hath enough, and needs no more in this world or the other. In him we have a worthy portion, Ps. xvi. 5. Secondly. If we have an entire satisfaction and complacency in God as our portion, he will have a gracious delight in us as his people, whom he owns as the rod of his inheritance, his possession and treasure, with whom he dwells, and by whom he is served and honoured. Thirdly. It is the unspeakable comfort of all the Lord's people, that he that is their God is the former of all things, and therefore is able to do all that for them, and give all that to them, which they stand in need of. Their help stands in his name who made heaven and earth; and he is the Lord of hosts, of all the hosts in heaven and earth; hath them all at his command, and will command them into the service of his people, when there is occasion. This is the name by which they know him, which they first give him the glory of, and then take to themselves the comfort of. Fourthly. Herein God's people are happy above all other people,—happy indeed, bona si sua norint,—'did they but know their blessedness.' The gods which the heathen pride, and please, and so portion themselves in, are vanity and a lie; but "the portion of Jacob is not like them."

Thirdly. The prophet having thus compared the gods of the heathen with the God of Israel, (between whom there is no comparison,) reads the doom, the certain doom, of all those pretenders, and directs the Jews in God's name to read it to the worshippers of idols, though they were their lords and masters; ver. 11. "Thus shall ye say unto them," and the God ye serve will bear you out in saying it, "The gods which have not made the heavens and the earth," and therefore are no gods, but usurpers of the honour due to him only who did make heaven and earth, "those shall perish," perish of course, because they are vanity; perish by his righteous sentence, because they are rivals with him. As gods they shall perish "from off the earth," even all those things on earth beneath which they make gods of, "and from under these heavens," even all those things in the firmament of heaven, under the highest heavens, which are deified, according to the distribution in the second commandment. These words in the original are not in the Hebrew, like all the rest, but in the Chaldee dialect, that the Jews in captivity might have this ready to say to the Chaldeans in their own language, when they tempted them to idolatry, Do you press us to worship your gods? We will never do that; for, 1st. They are counterfeit deities. They are no gods; for they "have not made the heavens and the earth," and therefore are not entitled to our homage, nor are we indebted to them either for the products of the earth or the influences of heaven, as we are to the God of Israel. The primitive Christians would say, when they were urged to worship such a god, 'Let him make me a world, and he shall be my god.' While we have him to worship who made heaven and earth, it is very absurd to worship any other. 2nd. They are condemned deities. They shall perish; the time shall come when they shall be no more respected as they are now, but shall be buried in oblivion, and they and their worshippers shall sink together; the earth shall no longer bear them, the heavens shall no longer cover them, but both shall abandon them. It is repeated, ver. 15, "In the time of their visitation," when God comes to reckon with idolaters, he shall make them sick of their idols, and glad to be rid of them; they shall "cast them to the moles and to the bats," Isa. ii. 20. Whatever runs against God and religion will be run down at last.

17 Gather up thy wares out of the land,
O inhabitant of the fortress.
18 For thus saith the LORD, [this once,
Behold, I will sling out the inhabitants of the land at

And will distress them, that they may find it so.
19 Woe is me for my hurt!
My wound is grievous; but I said,
Truly this is a grief, and I must bear it.
20 My tabernacle is spoiled, and all my cords are broken:
My children are gone forth of me, and they are not:
There is none to stretch forth my tent any more,
And to set up my curtains.
21 For the pastors are become brutish,
And have not sought the LORD:
Therefore they shall not prosper,
And all their flocks shall be scattered.
22 Behold, the noise of the bruit is come,
And a great commotion out of the north country,
To make the cities of Judah desolate,
And a den of dragons.
23 O LORD, I know that the way of man is not in himself:
It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.
24 O LORD, correct me, but with judgment;
Not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing.
25 Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not,
And upon the families that call not on thy name:
For they have eaten up Jacob,
And devoured him, and consumed him,
And have made his habitation desolate.

In these verses,

First. The prophet threatens in God's name the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 17, 18. The Jews that continued in their own land, after some were carried into captivity, were very secure. They thought themselves inhabitants of a fortress, their country was their stronghold, and in their own conceit impregnable, but they are here bidden to think of leaving it; they must prepare to go after their brethren, and pack up their effects in expectation of it. "Gather up thy wares out of the land," contract your affairs, and bring them into as little a compass as you can. "Arise, depart, this is not your rest," Mic. ii. 10. Let not what you have lie scattered, for the Chaldeans will be upon you again, to be the executioners of the sentence God has passed upon you; ver. 18, "Behold, I will sling out the inhabitants of the land at this once." They have hitherto dropped out, by a few at a time, but one captivity more shall make a thorough riddance, and they shall be slung out as a stone out of a sling, so easily, so thoroughly, shall they be cast out; nothing of them shall remain; they shall be thrown out with violence, and driven to a place at a great distance off in a little time: see this comparison used to signify an utter destruction, 1 Sam. xxv. 29. Yet once more God will shake their land, and shake the wicked out of it, Heb. xii. 26. He adds, "And I will distress them, that they may find it so." He will not only throw them out hence, (that he may do, and yet they may be easy elsewhere,) but wherever they shall go trouble shall follow them; they shall be perplexed and straitened, and at a loss within themselves; and who or what can make those easy whom God will distress? Whom he will distress, that they may find it so; that is, that they may feel that which they would not believe. They were told many a time of the weight of God's wrath, and their utter inability to make head against it, or bear up under it; were told that their sin would be their ruin, and they would not regard or credit what was told them, but now they shall find it so; and therefore God will pursue them with his judgments, that they may find it so, and be forced to acknowledge it. Note, Sooner or later sinners will find it just so as the word of God has represented things to them, and no better, and that the threatenings were not bugbears.

Secondly. He brings in the people sadly lamenting their calamities; ver. 19, "Woe is me for my hurt!" Some make this the prophet's own lamentation, not for himself, but for the calamities and desolations of his country. He mourned for those that would not be persuaded to mourn for themselves; and since there were none that had so much sense as to join with him, he weeps in secret, and cries out, "Woe is me!" In mournful times it becomes us to be of a mournful spirit. But it may be taken as the language of the people, considered as a body, and therefore speaking as a single person. It is what they should say. The prophet puts these words into their mouths; whether they would say them or no, they should have cause to say them. Some among them would thus bemoan themselves, and all of them at last would be forced to do it. They lament it,

1. That the affliction is very great, and it is very hard to them to bear it; the more hard, because they had not been used to trouble, and now did not expect it. "Woe is me for my hurt!" not for what I fear, but for what I feel; for they are not, as some are, worse frightened than hurt. Nor is it a slight hurt, but a wound, a wound that is grievous, very painful, and very threatening.

2. That there is no remedy but patience. They cannot help themselves, but must sit still, and abide it. "But I said," when I was about to complain of my wound, To what purpose is it to complain? "This is a grief, and I must bear it" as well as I can. This is the language rather of a sullen than of a gracious submission; of a patience perforce, not a patience by principle. When I am in affliction, I should say, This is an evil, and I will bear it, because it is the will of God I should; because his wisdom has appointed this for me, and his grace will make it work for good to me. This is receiving evil at the hand of God, Job ii. 10; but to say, This is an evil, and I must bear it, because I cannot help it, is but a brutal patience, and argues a want of those good thoughts of God which we should always have, even under our afflictions, saying, not only, God can and will do what he pleaseth, but, Let him do what he pleaseth.

3. That the country was quite ruined and wasted; ver. 10, "My tabernacle is spoiled." Jerusalem, though a strong city, now proves as weak and movable as a tabernacle. Their government is dissolved, and their state fallen to pieces, like a tabernacle or tent, when it is taken down, and all its cords, that should keep it together, are broken. Or, by the tabernacle here may be meant the temple, the sanctuary, which at first was but a tabernacle, and is now called so, as then it was sometimes called a temple. Their church is ruined, and all the supports of it fail. It was a general destruction of church and state, city and country; and there were none to repair these desolations; "My children are gone forth of me," some are fled, others slain, others carried into captivity, so that as to me they are not. I am like to be an outcast, and to perish for want of shelter; for "there is none to stretch forth my tent any more," none of my children that used to do it for me, "none to set up my curtains," none to do me any service. "Jerusalem has none to guide her of all her sons," ch. li. 18.

4. That the rulers took no care, nor any proper measures, for the redress of their grievances, and the re-establishing of their ruined state; ver. 21, "The pastors are become brutish." When the tents, the shepherds' tents, were spoiled, ver. 20, it concerned the shepherds to look after them, but they were foolish shepherds. Their kings and princes had no regard at all to the public welfare, seemed to have no sense of the desolations of the land, but were quite besotted and infatuated. The priests, the pastors of God's tabernacle, did a great deal towards the ruin of religion, but nothing towards the repair of it. They are brutish indeed; for "they have not sought the Lord;" they have neither made their peace with him nor their prayer to him; they had no eye to him and his providence, in their management of their affairs; they neither acknowledged the judgment nor expected the deliverance to come from his hand. Note, Those are brutish people that do not seek the Lord, that live without prayer, and live without God in the world. Every man is either a saint or a brute; but it is sad indeed with a people when their pastors, that should feed them with knowledge and understanding, are themselves thus brutish. And what comes of it? "Therefore they shall not prosper;" none of their attempts for the public safety shall succeed. Note, Those cannot expect to prosper who do not by faith and prayer take God along with them in all their ways. And when the pastors are brutish, what else can be expected but that all their flocks should be scattered; for "if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch." The ruin of a people is often owing to the brutishness of their pastors.

5. That the report of the enemy's approach was very dreadful; ver. 22, "The noise of the bruit is come," that is, of the report which at first was but whispered and bruited abroad, as wanting confirmation. It now proves too true; there is a great commotion ariseth out of the north country, which threatens to make all the cities of Judah desolate, and a den of dragons; for they must all expect to be sacrificed to the avarice and fury of the Chaldean army. And what else can that place expect but to be made a den of dragons, which has by sin made itself a den of thieves.

Thirdly. He turns to God, and addresseth himself to him, finding it to little purpose to speak to the people. It is some comfort to poor ministers, that if men will not hear them God will; and to him they have liberty of access at all times. Let them close their preaching with prayer, as the prophet, and then they shall have no reason to say they have laboured in vain.

1. The prophet here acknowledgeth the sovereignty and dominion of the Divine providence, that by it, and not by their own will and wisdom, the affairs both of nations and particular persons are directed and determined, ver. 23. This is an article of our faith, which is very proper for us to make confession of at the throne of grace, when we are complaining of an affliction, or suing for a mercy. "O Lord, I know," and believe, "that the way of man is not in himself." Nebuchadnezzar did not come of himself against our land, but by the direction of a Divine providence. We cannot of ourselves do any thing for our own relief, unless God work with us, and command deliverance for us; for, "it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps," though he seem in his walking to be perfectly at liberty, and to choose his own way. Those that had promised themselves a long enjoyment of their estates and possessions, when they were thrown out by the Chaldeans were made to know, by sad experience, that "the way of man is not in himself." The designs which men lay deep, and think well formed, are dashed to pieces in a moment. We must all apply this to ourselves, and mix faith with it, that we are not at our own dispose, but under a Divine direction; the event is often overruled quite contrary to our intention and expectation. We are not masters of our own way, nor can we think that every thing should be according to our mind; we must therefore refer ourselves to God, and acquiesce in his will. Some think the prophet mentions this here with design to make this comfortable use of it, that the way of the Chaldean army being not in themselves, they can do no more than God permits them; he can set bounds to these proud waves, and say, "Hitherto they shall come, and no farther." And a quieting consideration it is, that the most formidable enemies have no power against us, but what is given them from above.

2. He deprecates the Divine wrath, that it might not fall upon God's Israel, ver. 24. He speaks not for himself only, but on the behalf of his people; "O Lord, correct me, but with judgment," that is, in measure and with moderation, and in wisdom, no more than is necessary for the driving out of the foolishness that is bound up in our hearts. "Not in thine anger." How severe soever the correction be, let it come from thy love, and be designed for our good, and made to work for good; not to bring us to nothing, but to bring us home to thyself. Let it not be according to the desert of our sins, but according to the designs of thy grace. Note, 1st. We cannot pray in faith that we may never be corrected, while we are conscious to ourselves that we need it and deserve it, and know that as many as God loves he chastens. 2nd. The great thing we should dread in affliction is the wrath of God. Say not, Lord, do not correct me, but Lord, do not correct me in anger; for that will infuse wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery; that will "bring us to nothing." We may bear the smart of his rod, but we cannot bear the weight of his wrath.

3. He imprecates the Divine wrath against the oppressors and persecutors of Israel; ver. 25, "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not." This prayer doth not come from a spirit of malice or revenge, nor is it intended to prescribe to God whom he should execute his judgments upon, or in what order; but, 1st. It is an appeal to his justice; as if he had said, 'Lord, we are a provoking people, but are there not other nations that are more so? And shall we only be punished? We are thy children, and may expect a fatherly correction; but they are thine enemies, and against them we have reason to think thine indignation should be, not against us.' This is God's usual method. The cup put into the hands of God's people is full of mixture, mixture of mercy; but the dregs of the cup are reserved for the wicked of the earth; let them wring them out, Ps. lxxv. 8. 2nd. It is a prediction of God's judgments upon all the impenitent enemies of his church and kingdom. If judgment begin thus at the house of God, what shall be the end of those that obey not his Gospel? 1 Pet. iv. 17. See how the heathen are described, on whom God's fury shall be poured out. First. They are strangers to God, and are content to be so. They know him not, nor desire to know him. They are families that live without prayer, that have nothing of religion among them; they call not on God's name. And those that restrain prayer, it is an evidence they know not God; for they that know him will seek to him, and intreat his favour. Secondly. They are persecutors of the people of God, and are resolved to be so. They have eaten up Jacob, with as much greediness as those that are hungry eat their necessary food; nay, with more, for they never know when they have enough. They have devoured him, and consumed him, and made his habitation desolate, that is, the land in which he lives; or the temple of God which is his habitation among them. Note, What the heathen, in their rage and malice, do against the people of God, though therein he makes use of them as the instruments of his correction, yet he will for that make them the objects of his indignation. This prayer is taken from Ps. lxxix. 6, 7.

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter, I. God by the prophet puts the people in mind of the covenant he had made with their fathers; and how much he had insisted upon it, as the condition of the covenant, that they should be obedient to him, ver. 1—7. II. He chargeth it upon them, that they in succession to their fathers, and in confederacy among themselves, had obstinately refused to obey him, ver. 8—10. III. He threatens to punish them with utter ruin for their disobedience, especially for their idolatry, ver. 11, 13, and tells them, that their idols should not save them, ver. 12, that their prophets should not pray for them, ver. 14, and justifies his proceedings herein. they having brought all this mischief upon themselves by their own folly and wilfulness, ver. 15—17. IV. Here is an account of a conspiracy formed against Jeremiah by his fellow-citizens, the men of Anathoth; God's discovery of it to him, ver. 18, 19; his prayer against them, ver. 20; and a prediction of God's judgments upon them for it, ver. 21—23.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Hear ye the words of this covenant, and speak unto the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem; 3 And say thou unto them, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel; Cursed be the man that obeyeth not the words of this covenant, 4 Which I commanded your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, from the iron furnace, saying, Obey my voice, and do them, according to all which I command you: so shall ye be my people, and I will be your God: 5 That I may perform the oath which I have sworn unto your fathers, to give them a land flowing with milk and honey, as it is this day. Then answered I, and said, So be it, O LORD. 6 Then the LORD said unto me, Proclaim all these words in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, saying, Hear ye the words of this covenant, and do them. 7 For I earnestly protested unto your fathers in the day that I brought them up out of the land of Egypt, even unto this day, rising early and protesting, saying, Obey my voice. 8 Yet they obeyed not, nor inclined their ear, but walked every one in the imagination of their evil heart: therefore I will bring upon them all the words of this covenant, which I commanded them to do; but they did them not. 9 And the LORD said unto me, A conspiracy is found among the men of Judah, and among the inhabitants of Jerusalem. 10 They are turned back to the iniquities of their forefathers, which refused to hear my words; and they went after other gods to serve them: the house of Israel and the house of Judah have broken my covenant which I made with their fathers.

The prophet here, as prosecutor in God's name, draws up an indictment against the Jews, for wilful disobedience to the commands of their rightful sovereign. And for the more solemn management of this charge,

First. He produceth the commission he had to draw up the charge against them. He did not take pleasure in accusing the children of his people, but God commanded him to speak it to the men of Judah, ver. 1, 2. In the original it is plural, 'Speak ye this,' for what he said to Jeremiah was the same that he gave in charge to all his servants the prophets. They none of them said any other but what Moses in the law had said; to that therefore they must refer themselves, and direct the people, "Hear the words of this covenant;" turn to your Bibles, be judged by them. Jeremiah must now proclaim this "in the cities of Judah, and the streets of Jerusalem," that all may hear, for all are concerned. All the words of reproof and conviction which the prophets spake were grounded upon the words of the covenant, and agreed with that; and therefore hear these words, and understand by them upon what terms you stood with God at first, and then, by comparing yourselves with the covenant, you will soon be aware upon what terms you now stand with him.

Secondly. He opens the charter upon which their state was founded, and by which they held their privileges. They had forgotten the tenor of it, and lived as if they thought the grant was absolute, and that they might do what they pleased, and yet have what God had promised; or, as if they thought the keeping up the ceremonial observances was all that God required of them. He therefore shews them, with all possible plainness, that the thing God insisted upon was obedience, that was better than sacrifice. He said, "Obey my voice," ver. 4, and again, ver. 7, "Obey my voice." Own God for your master, give up yourselves to him as his subjects and servants; attend to all the declarations of his mind and will, and make conscience of complying with them. "Do my commandments, not only in some things, but "according to all which I command you;" make conscience of moral duties especially, and rest not in those that are merely ritual. "Hear the words of the covenant, and do them."

1. This was the original contract between God and them, when he first formed them into a people. It was what he commanded their fathers, when he first brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, ver. 4, and again, ver. 7. He never intended to take them under his conduct and protection upon any other terms. This was it that he required from them, in gratitude for the great things he did for them, when he brought them from the iron furnace. Therefore he redeemed them out of the service of the Egyptians, which was perfect slavery, that he might take them into his own service, which is perfect freedom, Lu. i. 74, 75.

2. This was not only laid before them then, but it was with the greatest importunity imaginable pressed upon them, ver. 7. God not only commanded, but earnestly protested, it to their fathers, when he brought them into covenant with himself. Moses inculcated it again and again, by precept upon precept, and line upon line.

3. This was made the condition of the relation between them and God which was so much their honour and privilege; "So shall ye be my people, and I will be your God;" I will own you for mine, and you may call upon me as yours; which intimates, that if they refused to obey they could no longer claim the benefit of the relation.

4. It was upon these terms that the land of Canaan was given them for a possession; "Obey my voice, that I may perform the oath sworn to your fathers, to give them a land flowing with milk and honey," ver. 5. God was ready to fulfil the promise, but then they must fulfil the condition; if not, the promise is void, and it is just with God to turn them out of possession. Being brought in upon their good behaviour, they had no wrong done them if they were turned out upon their ill behaviour. Obedience was the rent reserved by the lease, with a power to re-enter for nonpayment.

5. This obedience was not only made a condition of the blessing, but was required under the penalty of a curse. This is mentioned first here, ver. 3, that they might if possible be awakened by the terrors of the Lord; "Cursed be the man," though it were but a single person, "that obeys not the words of this covenant," much more when it is the body of the nation that rebels. There are curses of the covenant as well as blessings; and Moses set before them not only life and good, but death and evil, Deut. xxx. 15; so that they had fair warning given them of the fatal consequences of disobedience.

6. Lest this covenant should be forgotten, and, because out of mind, should be thought out of date, God had from time to time called to them to remember it, and by his servants the prophets had made a continual claim of this rent, so that they could not plead in excuse of their nonpayment, that it had never been demanded. From the day he brought them out of Egypt to this day, and that was near a thousand years, he had been, in one way or other, at sundry times, and in divers manners, protesting to them the necessity of obedience. God keeps an account how long we have enjoyed the means of grace, and how powerful those means have been; how often we have been not only spoken to, but protested to, concerning our duty.

7. This covenant was consented to; ver. 5, "Then answered I, and said, Amen, so be it, O Lord." These are the words of the prophet, expressing either, 1st. His own consent to the covenant for himself, and his desire to have the benefit of it. God promised Canaan to the obedient; Lord, saith he, I take thee at thy word, I will be obedient; let me have mine inheritance in the land of promise, of which Canaan is a type. Or, 2nd. His good will and good wish that his people might have the benefit of it; Amen. Lord, let them still be kept in possession of this good land, and not turned out of it; make good the promise to them. Or, 3rd. His people's consent to the covenant; "Then answered I," in the name of the people, "So be it." Taking it in this sense, it refers to the declared consent which the people gave to the covenant, not only to the precepts of it, when they said, "All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do, and will be obedient," but to the penalties, when they said Amen to all the curses upon mount Ebal. The more solemnly we have engaged ourselves to God, the more reason we have to hope that it will be perpetual, and yet here it did not prove so.

Thirdly. He chargeth them with breach of covenant, such a breach as amounted to a forfeiture of their charter, ver. 8. God had said again and again, by his law and by his prophets, "Obey my voice," do as you are bidden, and all shall be well; "yet they obeyed not;" and because they were resolved not to submit their souls to God's commandments they would not so much as incline their ears to them, but got as far as they could out of call. "They walked every one in the imagination of their evil heart," followed their own inventions; every man did as his fancy and humour led him, right or wrong, lawful or unlawful, both in their devotions and in their conversations: see ch. vii. 24. And what then can they expect, but to fall under the curse of the covenant, since they would not comply with the commands and conditions of it? "Therefore I will bring upon them all the words of this covenant," that is, all the threatenings contained in it, because they did not what they were commanded. Note, The words of the covenant shall not fall to the ground. If we do not by our obedience qualify ourselves for the blessings of it, we shall by our disobedience bring ourselves under the curses of it.

And that which aggravated their defection from God, and their rebellion against him, was, that it was general, and, as it were, by consent, ver. 9, 10. Jeremiah himself saw that many lived in open disobedience to God, but the Lord told him the matter was worse than he thought of: "A conspiracy is found among them," by him whose eye is upon the hidden works of darkness. There is a combination against God and religion, a dangerous design formed to overthrow God's government, and bring in the pretenders, the counterfeit deities. This intimates, that they were wilful and deliberate in wickedness: they rebelled against God, not through incogitancy, but presumptuously, and with a high hand; that they were subtle and ingenious in wickedness, and carried on their plot against religion with a great deal of art and management; that they were linked together in the designs, and, as is usual among conspirators, engaged to stand by one another in it, and to live and die together; they were resolved to go through with it. A cursed conspiracy! O that there were not the like in our day! Observe, 1. What the conspiracy was. They designed to overthrow Divine revelation, and set that aside, and persuade people not to hear, not to heed the words of God. They did all they could to derogate from the authority of the Scriptures, and to lessen the value of them. They designed to draw people after other gods, to serve them, to consult them as their oracles, and make court to them as their benefactors. Human reason shall be their god; a light within their god; an infallible judge their god; saints and angels their gods; the god of this or the other nation shall be theirs: thus under several disguises they are in the same confederacy "against the Lord and against his anointed." 2. Who were in the conspiracy. One would have expected to find some foreigners ringleaders in it. No; 1st. The inhabitants of Jerusalem are in conspiracy with the men of Judah. City and country agree in this, however they may differ in other things. 2nd. Those of this generation seem to be in conspiracy with those of the foregoing generation, to carry on the war from age to age against religion. "They are turned back to the iniquities of their forefathers," and are risen up in their stead, a seed of evil doers, an increase of sinful men, Num. xxxii. 14. In Josiah's time there had been a reformation, but after his death they returned to the idolatries which then they had renounced. 3rd. Judah and Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes and the two, that were often at daggers' drawing one with another, yet were in a conspiracy to break the covenant God had made with their fathers, even with the heads of all the twelve tribes. The house of Israel began the revolt, but the house of Judah soon came into the conspiracy. Now what else could be expected, but that God should take severe methods, both for the chastising of these conspirators and the crushing of this conspiracy? for none ever hardened his heart thus against God and prospered. He that rolleth this stone, it will return upon him.

11 Therefore thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I will bring evil upon them,
Which they shall not be able to escape;
And though they shall cry unto me,
I will not hearken unto them. [salem go,
12 Then shall the cities of Judah and inhabitants of Jeru-
And cry unto the gods unto whom they offer incense:
But they shall not save them at all
In the time of their trouble.
13 For according to the number of thy cities
Were thy gods, O Judah;
And according to the number of the streets of Jerusalem
Have ye set up altars to that shameful thing,
Even altars to burn incense unto Baal.
14 Therefore pray not thou for this people,
Neither lift up a cry or prayer for them:
For I will not hear them in the time that they cry unto me
For their trouble.
15 What hath my beloved to do in mine house,
Seeing she hath wrought lewdness with many,
And the holy flesh is passed from thee?
When thou doest evil, then thou rejoicest.
16 The LORD called thy name,
A green olive tree, fair, and of goodly fruit:
With the noise of a great tumult he hath kindled fire
And the branches of it are broken. [upon it,
17 For the LORD of hosts, that planted thee,
Hath pronounced evil against thee,
For the evil of the house of Israel and of the house of
Which they have done against themselves [Judah,
To provoke me to anger in offering incense unto Baal.

This paragraph, which contains so much of God's wrath, might very well be expected to follow upon that which goes next before, which contained so much of his people's sin. When God found so much evil among them, we cannot think it strange if it follows, "Therefore I will bring evil upon them," ver. 11; the evil of punishment for the evil of sin, and there is no remedy, no relief; the decree is gone forth, and the sentence will be executed.

First. They cannot help themselves, but will be found too weak to contest with God's judgments. It is evil "which they shall not be able to escape," or to go forth out of, by any evasion whatsoever. Note, Those that will not submit to God's government shall not be able to escape his wrath; there is no fleeing from his justice, no avoiding his cognizance. Evil pursues sinners, and entangles them in snares, out of which they cannot extricate themselves.

Secondly. Their God will not help them. His providence shall no way favour them; "Though they shall cry unto me, I will not hearken unto them." In their affliction they will seek the God whom before they slighted, and cry to him whom before they would not vouchsafe to speak to. But how can they expect to speed? For he has plainly told us, that he that "turns away his ears from hearing the law," as they did, ver. 8, for they inclined not their ear, even their prayer shall be an abomination to him, as the word of the Lord was now to them a reproach.

Thirdly. Their idols shall not help them, ver. 12. They shall "go and cry to the gods to whom they" now "offer incense, and put them in mind of the costly services wherewith they had honoured them, expecting they should now have relief from them, but in vain. They shall be sent to the gods whom they served, Jud. x. 4; Deu. xxxii. 37, 38; and what the better? "They shall not save them at all;" shall do nothing towards their salvation, nor give them any prospect of it; they shall not afford them the least comfort, or relief, or mitigation of their trouble. It is God only that is a friend at need, a present powerful help in time of trouble. The idols cannot help themselves, how then should they help their worshippers? Those that make idols of the world and the flesh will in vain have recourse to them in a day of distress. If the idols could have done any real kindness to their worshippers, they would have done it for this people, who had renounced the true God to embrace them, had multiplied them "according to the number of their cities," ver. 13, nay, in Jerusalem, "according to the number of their streets;" suspecting both their sufficiency and their readiness to help them, they must have many, lest a few would not serve; they must have them dispersed in every corner, lest they should be out of the way when they had occasion for them. In Jerusalem, the city which God had chosen to put his name there, publicly in the streets of Jerusalem, in every street, they had "altars to that shameful thing," that shame, even to Baal, which they ought to have been ashamed of, with which they did reproach the Lord, and bring confusion upon themselves. But now in their distress their many gods, and many altars, should stand them in no stead. Note, Those that will not be ashamed of their commission of sin as a wicked thing will be ashamed of their expectations from sin as a fruitless thing.

Fourthly. Jeremiah's prayers shall not help them, ver. 14. What God had said to him before, ch. vii. 16, he here saith again, "Pray not thou for this people." This is not designed for a command to the prophet so much as for a threatening to the people, that they should have no benefit by the prayers of their friends for them. God would give no encouragement to the prophets to pray for them, would not stir up the spirit of prayer, but cast a damp upon it; would put into their hearts to pray, not for the body of the people, but for the remnant among them; to pray for their eternal salvation, not for their deliverance from the temporal judgments that were coming upon them; and what other prayers were put up for them should not be heard. Those are in a sad case indeed that are cut off from the benefit of prayer. "I will not hear them when they cry," and therefore do not thou pray for them. Note, Those that have so far thrown themselves out of God's favour that he will not hear their prayers, cannot expect benefit by the prayers of others for them.

Fifthly. The profession they make of religion shall stand them in no stead, ver. 15. They were originally God's beloved, his spouse, he was married to them by the covenant of peculiarity; even the unbelieving Jews are said to be "beloved for the fathers' sakes," Rom. xi. 28. As such they had a place in God's house, they were admitted to worship in the courts of his temple, they did partake of God's altar, did eat of the flesh of their peace offerings, here called the holy flesh, which God had the honour of, and they had the comfort of. This they gloried in, and trusted to. What harm could come to those who were God's beloved, who were under the protection of his house! Even when they did evil, yet they rejoiced and gloried in this, made a mighty noise of this. And when their evil was, so the margin reads it, when trouble came upon them, they rejoiced in this, and made this their confidence. But their confidence would deceive them, for God has rejected it, they themselves having forfeited the privileges they so much boasted of. They have "wrought lewdness with many," have been guilty of spiritual whoredom, have worshipped many idols. And therefore, 1. God's temple will yield them no protection. It is fit the adulteress, especially when she has so often repeated her whoredoms, and is grown so impudent in them, and irreclaimable, should be put away, and turned out of doors. "What has my beloved to do in my house?" She is a scandal to it, and therefore it shall be no longer a shelter to her. 2. God's altar will yield them no satisfaction, nor can they expect any comfort from that; "The holy flesh is passed from thee," that is, an end will soon be put to thy sacrifices, when the temple shall be laid in ruins; and where then will the holy flesh be thou art so proud of? A holy heart will be a comfort to us when the holy flesh is passed from us; an inward principle of grace will make up the want of the outward means of grace. But woe unto us if the departure of the holy flesh be accompanied with the departure of the Holy Spirit.

Sixthly. God's former favours to them shall stand them in no stead, ver. 16, 17. Their remembrance of them shall be no comfort to them under their troubles, and God's remembrance of them shall be no argument for their relief. 1. It is true God had done great things for them; that people had been favourites above any people under the sun, they had been the darlings of heaven. God had called Israel's name a green olive-tree, and had made them so, for he miscalls nothing; he had planted them, ver. 17, had formed them into a people, with all the advantages they could have to make them a fruitful and flourishing people, so good was their law, and so good was their land. One would think no other but that a people so planted, so watered, so cultivated, should be, as the olive-tree is, ever green, in respect both of piety and prosperity, Ps. lii. 8. God called them fair, and of goodly fruit; both good for food and pleasant to the eye; both amiable and serviceable to God and man; for with the greenness and fatness of the olive both are honoured, Jud. ix. 9. 2. It is as true that they have done ill things against God. He had planted them a green olive, a good olive, but they were degenerated into a wild olive, Rom. xi. 17. Both the house of Israel and the house of Judah had done evil, had provoked God to anger in burning incense unto Baal, setting up other mediators between them and the supreme God beside the promised Messiah; nay, setting up other gods in competition with the true and living God, for they had gods many as well as lords many. 3. When they have carried themselves so ill, they can expect no other but that, notwithstanding what good he hath both done to them and designed for them, he should now bring upon them the evil he hath pronounced against them. He that made them will not save them. He that planted this green olive-tree, and expected fruit from it, finding it barren and grown wild, hath kindled fire upon it, to burn it as it stands, for being without fruit; it is twice dead, plucked up by the roots, Jude 12; it is cut down, and cast into the fire, the fittest place for trees that cumber the ground, Mat. iii. 10; the branches of it, the high and lofty boughs, (so the word signifies,) are broken, are broken down, both princes and priests cut off. And thus it proves that the evil done against God to provoke him to anger is really done against themselves, they wrong their own souls: God is out of their reach, but they ruin themselves: see ch. vii. 19. Note, Every sin against God is a sin against ourselves, and so it will be found sooner or later.

18 And the LORD hath given me knowledge of it, and I
Then thou shewedst me their doings. [know it:
19 But I was like a lamb or an ox that is brought to the slaughter;
And I knew not that they had devised devices against me, saying,
Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof,
And let us cut him off from the land of the living,
That his name may be no more remembered.
20 But, O LORD of hosts, that judgest righteously,
That triest the reins and the heart,
Let me see thy vengeance on them: for unto thee have
I revealed my cause.
21 Therefore thus saith the LORD
Of the men of Anathoth, that seek thy life, saying,
Prophesy not in the name of the LORD,
That thou die not by our hand:

22 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts,
Behold, I will punish them:
The young men shall die by the sword;
Their sons and their daughters shall die by famine:
23 And there shall be no remnant of them:
For I will bring evil upon the men of Anathoth,
Even the year of their visitation.

The prophet Jeremiah hath much in his writings concerning himself, much more than Isaiah had, the times he lived in being very troublesome. Here we have (as it should seem) the beginning of his sorrows, which arose from those of his own city, Anathoth, a priests' city, and yet a malignant one. Observe here,

First. Their plot against him, ver. 19. They devised devices against him, laid their heads together to contrive how they might be in the most plausible and effectual manner the death of him. Malice is ingenious in its devices, as well as industrious in its prosecutions. They said concerning Jeremiah, "Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof," a proverbial expression; let us utterly destroy him, root and branch; let us destroy both the father and the family, as, when Naboth was put to death for treason, his sons were put to death with him. Or, rather, both the prophet and the prophecy; let us kill the one, and defeat the other; "Let us cut him off from the land of the living," as a false prophet, and load him with ignominy and disgrace, "that his name may no more be remembered" with respect. Let us sink his reputation, and so spoil the credit of his predictions. This was their plot; and, 1. It was a barbarous one; but so cruel have the persecutors of God's prophets been: they hunt for no less than the precious life, and very precious the lives are that they hunt for. But, 2. It was a baffled one. They thought to put an end to his days, but he survived most of his enemies; they thought to blast his memory, but it lives to this day, and will be blessed while time lasts.

Secondly. The information which God gave him of this conspiracy against him. He knew nothing of it himself, so artfully had they concealed it. He came to Anathoth, meaning no harm to them, and therefore fearing no harm from them, like a lamb or an ox, that thinks he is driven as usual to the field, when he is brought to the slaughter; so little did poor Jeremiah dream of the design his citizens that hated him had upon him. None of his friends could, and none of his enemies would, give him any notice of his danger, that he might shift for his own safety; as Paul's sister's son gave him intelligence of the Jews that were lying in wait for him. There is but a step between Jeremiah and death, but then "the Lord has given me knowledge of it," by dream, or vision, or impression upon his spirit, that he might save himself; as the king of Israel did upon the notice Elisha gave him, 2 Kin. vi. 10. Thus he came to know it: God shews him their doings; and such were their devices, that the discovering of them was the defeating of them. If God had not let him know his own danger, it would have been improved by unreasonable men against the reputation of his predictions, that he who foretold the ruin of his country could not foresee his own peril, and avoid it. See what care God takes of his prophets; he suffers no man to do them wrong; all the rage of their enemies cannot prevail to take them off, till they have finished their testimony. God knows all the secret designs of his and his people's enemies, and can, when he pleaseth, make them known; "A bird of the air shall carry the voice."

Thirdly. His appeal to God hereupon, ver. 20. His eye is to God as the Lord of hosts, that judgeth righteously. It is matter of comfort to us, when men deal unjustly with us, that we have a God to go to, who doth and will plead the cause of injured innocency, and appear against the injurious. God's justice, which is a terror to the wicked, is a comfort to the godly. His eye is to him, as the God that tries the reins and the heart; that perfectly sees what is in man, what are his thoughts and intents. He knew the integrity that was in Jeremiah's heart, and that he was not the man they represented him to be; he knew the wickedness that was in their hearts, though never so cunningly concealed and disguised. Now, 1. He prays judgment against them; "Let me see thy vengeance on them;" that is, do justice between me and them in such a way as thou pleasest. Some think there was something of human frailty in this prayer of his; at least Christ has taught us another lesson, both by his precept and pattern, which is, to pray for our persecutors. Others think it comes from a pure zeal for the glory of God, and a pious, prophetic indignation against men that were by profession priests, the Lord's ministers, and yet were so desperately wicked, as to fly out against one that did them no harm, purely for the service he did to God. This petition was a prediction that he should see God's vengeance on them. 2. He refers himself entirely to the judgment of God; "Unto thee have I revealed my cause;" that is, to thee I have committed it, not desiring or expecting to interest any other in it. Note, It is our comfort when we are wronged, that we have a God to commit our cause to; and our duty to commit it to him, with a resolution to acquiesce in his definitive sentence; to subscribe, and not prescribe, to him.

Fourthly. Judgment given against his persecutors, the men of Anathoth. It was to no purpose for him to appeal to the courts at Jerusalem, he could not have right done him there, the priests there would stand by the priests at Anathoth, and rather second them than discountenance them; but God will therefore take cognizance of the cause himself, and we are sure his judgment is according to truth. Here is,

1. Their crime recited on which the sentence is grounded, ver. 21. They sought the prophet's life, for they forbade him to prophesy upon pain of death; they were resolved either to silence him or slay him. The provocation he gave them was his prophesying in the name of the Lord, without license from them that were the governors of the city which he was a member of; and not prophesying such smooth things as they always bespoke. Their forbidding him to prophesy was in effect seeking his life; for it was seeking to defeat the end and business of his life, and to rob him of the comfort of it. It is as bad to God's faithful ministers to have their mouth stopped as to have their breath stopped. But especially when it was resolved that if he did prophesy, as certainly he would, notwithstanding their inhibition, he should die by their hand; they would be accusers, judges, executioners, and all. It used to be said that a prophet could not perish but at Jerusalem, for there the great council sat; but so bitter were the men of Anathoth against Jeremiah, that they would undertake to be the death of him themselves. A prophet then shall find not only no honour, but no favour in his own country.

2. The sentence passed upon them for this crime, ver. 22, 23. God saith, "I will punish them;" let me alone to deal with them. 'I will visit this upon them,' so the word is; God will inquire into it, and reckon for it. Two of God's four sore judgments shall serve to ruin their town; the sword shall devour their young men, though they were young priests, not men of war; their character shall not be their protection. And famine shall destroy the children, sons and daughters, that tarry at home; which is a more grievous death than that by the sword, Lam. iv. 9. The destruction shall be final; ver. 23, "There shall be no remnant of them left," none to be the seed of another generation; they sought Jeremiah's life, and therefore they shall die; they would destroy him root and branch, that his name might be no more remembered, and therefore there shall be no remnant of them; and herein the Lord is righteous. Thus evil is brought upon them, even the year of their visitation; and that is evil enough, a recompence according to their deserts. Then shall Jeremiah see his desire upon his enemies. Note, Their condition is sad, that have the prayers of good ministers and good people against them.

CHAPTER XII.

In this chapter we have, I. The prophet's humble complaint to God of the success that wicked people had in their wicked practices, ver. 1, 2. and his appeal to God concerning his own integrity, ver. 3, with a prayer that God would for the sake of the public bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end, ver. 3, 4. II. God's rebuke to the prophet for his uneasiness at his present troubles, bidding him prepare for greater, ver. 5, 6. III. A sad lamentation of the present deplorable state of the Israel of God, ver. 7—13. IV. An intimation of mercy to God's people in a denunciation of wrath against their neighbours that helped forward their affliction, that they should be plucked out; but with a promise, that if they would at last join themselves with the people of God, they should come in shares with them in their privileges, ver. 14—17.

RIGHTEOUS art thou, O LORD, when I plead with thee:
Yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments:
Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper?
Wherefore are all they happy that deal very treacherously?
2 Thou hast planted them, yea, they have taken root:
They grow, yea, they bring forth fruit:
Thou art near in their mouth,
And far from their reins.
3 But thou, O LORD, knowest me:
Thou hast seen me, and tried mine heart toward thee:
Pull them out like sheep for the slaughter,
And prepare them for the day of slaughter.
4 How long shall the land mourn,
And the herbs of every field wither,
For the wickedness of them that dwell therein?
The beasts are consumed, and the birds;
Because they said, He shall not see our last end.
5 If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee,
Then how canst thou contend with horses?

RUNNING FOOTMEN OF INDIA.

And if in the land of peace, wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee,
Then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?
6 For even thy brethren, and the house of thy father,
Even they have dealt treacherously with thee;
Yea, they have called a multitude after thee:
Believe them not, though they speak fair words unto thee.

The prophet doubts not but it would be of use to others to know what had passed between God and his soul; what temptations he had been assaulted with, and how he had got over them. And therefore he here tell us,

First. What liberty he humbly took, and was graciously allowed him, to reason with God concerning his judgments, ver. 1. He is about to plead with God, not to quarrel with him, or find fault with his proceedings, but to inquire into the meaning of them, that he might more and more see reason to be satisfied in them, and might have wherewith to answer both his own and others' objections against them. The works of the Lord, and the reasons of them, are sought out even of those that have pleasure therein, Ps. cxi. 2. We may not strive with our Maker, but we may reason with him. Now, the prophet lays down a truth of unquestionable certainty, which he resolves to abide by, in managing this argument, "Righteous art thou, O Lord, when I plead with thee." Thus he arms himself against the temptation wherewith he was assaulted, to envy the prosperity of the wicked, before he entered into a parley with it. Note, When we are most in the dark concerning the meaning of God's dispensations, yet still we must resolve to keep up right thoughts of God, and must be confident of this, that he never did, nor ever will do, the least wrong to any of his creatures; even when his judgments are unsearchable as a great deep, and altogether unaccountable, yet his righteousness is as conspicuous and immovable as the great mountains, Ps. xxxvi. 6. Though sometimes "clouds and darkness are round about him," yet "justice and judgment are" always "the habitation of his throne," Ps. xcvii. 2. When we find it hard to understand particular providences, we must have recourse to general truths as our first principles, and abide by them; however it be, "the Lord is righteous," see Ps. lxxiii. 1. And we must acknowledge it to him, as the prophet here, even when we plead with him, as those that have no thoughts of contending, but of learning; being fully assured that he will be justified when he speaks. Note, However we may see cause for our own information to plead with God, yet it becomes us to own that, whatever he saith or doth, he is in the right.

Secondly. What it was in the dispensations of Divine providence that he stumbled at, and that he thought would bear a debate. It was that which has been a temptation to many wise and good men, and such a one as they have hardly got over. 1. They see the designs and projects of wicked people successful; "The way of the wicked prospers;" they compass their malicious designs, and gain their point. 2. They see their affairs and concerns in a good posture; "They are happy," happy as the world can make them, though "they deal treacherously, very treacherously," both with God and man. They are hypocrites who are chiefly meant, as appears, ver. 2, who dissemble in their good professions, and depart from their good beginnings and good promises, and in both they deal treacherously, very treacherously. It has been said that men cannot expect to prosper who are unjust and dishonest in their dealings; but these deal treacherously, and yet they are happy. He shews, ver. 2, both their prosperity and their abuse of their prosperity. 1st. God had been very indulgent to them, and they were got beforehand in the world. They are planted in a good land, a land flowing with milk and honey, and thou hast planted them; nay, thou didst cast out the heathen to plant them, Ps. xliv. 2; lxxx. 8. Many a tree is planted that yet never grows or comes to any thing; but they have taken root, their prosperity seems to be confirmed and settled; they take root in the earth, for there they fix themselves, and thence they draw the sap of all their satisfaction. Yet many trees take root which yet never come on; but these grow, yea, they bring forth fruit; their families are built up, they live high, and spend at a great rate; and all this was owing to the benignity of the Divine providence, which smiled upon them, Ps. lxxiii. 7. 2nd. Thus God had favoured them, though they had dealt treacherously with him; "Thou art near in their mouth, and far from their reins." This was no uncharitable censure, for he spoke by the spirit of prophecy, without which it is not safe to charge men with hypocrisy, whose appearances are plausible. Observe, First. Though they cared not for thinking of God, nor had any sincere affection to him, yet they could easily persuade themselves to speak of him frequently, and with an air of seriousness. Piety from the teeth outward is no difficult thing. Many speak the language of Israel that are not Israelites indeed. Secondly. Though they had on all occasions the name of God ready in their mouth, and accustomed themselves to those forms of speech that savoured of piety, yet they could not persuade themselves to keep up the fear of God in their hearts. The form of godliness should engage us to keep up the power of it; but with them it did not do so.

Thirdly. What comfort he had in appealing to God concerning his own integrity; ver. 3, "But thou, O Lord, knowest me." Probably the wicked men he complains of were forward to reproach and censure him, ch. xviii. 18, in reference to which, this was his comfort, that God was a witness to his integrity. God knew he was not such a one as they were, who had God ever in their mouths, but far from their reins; nor such a one as they took him to be, and represented him, a deceiver and a false prophet. They that thus abused him, did not know him; 1 Cor. ii. 8, "But thou, O Lord, knowest me," though they think me not worth their notice. 1. Observe what the matter is concerning which he appeals to God; Thou knowest my heart towards thee. Note, We are as our hearts are, and our hearts are good or bad according as they are or are not towards God; and this is that therefore concerning which we should examine ourselves, that we may approve ourselves to God. 2. The cognizance to which he appeals. Thou knowest me better than I know myself; not by hearsay or report, for thou hast seen me; not with a transient glance, but thou hast tried my heart. God's knowing of us is as clear, and exact, and certain, as if he had made the most strict scrutiny. Note, The God with whom we have to do perfectly knows how our hearts are towards him. He knows both the guile of the hypocrite, and the sincerity of the upright.

Fourthly. He prays that God would turn his hand against these wicked people, and not suffer them to prosper always, though they had prospered long. Let some judgment come to pull them out of this fat pasture, as sheep for the slaughter, that it may appear their long prosperity was but like the feeding of the lambs in a large place, to "prepare them for the day of slaughter," Hos. iv. 16. God suffered them to prosper, that by their pride and luxury they might fill up the measure of their iniquity, and so be ripened for destruction. And therefore he thinks it a piece of necessary justice that they should fall into mischief themselves, because they had done so much mischief to others; that they should be pulled out of their land, because they had brought ruin upon the land; and the longer they continued in it the more hurt they did, as the plagues of their generation; ver. 4, "How long shall the land mourn," as it doth under the judgments of God inflicted upon it, "for the wickedness of them that dwell therein?" Lord, shall they prosper themselves that ruin all about them? 1. See here what the judgment was which the land was now groaning under. "The herbs of every field wither," the grass is burned up, and all the products of the earth fail; and then it follows of course, the beasts are consumed, and the birds, 1 Kin. xviii. 5. This was the effect of a long drought, or want of rain, which happened, as it should seem, at the latter end of Josiah's reign, and the beginning of Jehoiakim's; it is mentioned, ch. iii. 3; viii. 13; ix. 10, 12; and more fully afterwards, ch. xiv. If they would have been brought to repentance by this lesser judgment, the greater had been prevented. Now, why was it that this fruitful land was turned into barrenness, but for the wickedness of them that dwelt therein? Ps. cvii. 34. Therefore the prophet prays that these wicked people might die for their own sin; and that the whole nation might not suffer for it. 2. See here what was the language of their wickedness; "They said, He shall not see our last end." Either God himself shall not,—atheism is the root of hypocrisy, therefore God is far from their reins, though near in their mouth, because they say, "How doth God know?" Ps. lxxiii. 11; Job xxii. 13; he knows not what way we take, nor what it will end in,—or, 'Jeremiah shall not see our last end;' whatever he pretends when he asks us what shall be in the end hereof, he cannot himself foresee it. They look upon him as a false prophet. Or, whatever it is, he shall not live to see it, for we will be the death of him, ch. xi. 21. Note, 1st. Men's setting their latter end at a great distance, or looking upon it as uncertain, is at the bottom of all their wickedness, Lam. i. 9. 2nd. The whole creation groans under the burthen of the sin of man, Rom. viii. 22; it is for this that the earth mourns, so it may be read, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake."

Fifthly. He acquaints us with the answer God gave to those complaints of his, ver. 5, 6. We often find the prophets admonish others, as Isa. viii. 11. Ministers have lessons to learn, as well as lessons to teach, and must themselves hear God's voice, and preach to themselves. Jeremiah complained much of the wickedness of the men of Anathoth; and that, notwithstanding that, they prospered. Now this seems to be an answer to that complaint. 1. It is allowed that he had cause to complain; ver. 6, "Thy brethren," the priests of Anathoth, that are of "the house of thy father," who ought to have protected thee, and pretended to do so, "even they have dealt treacherously with thee," have been false to thee, and under colour of friendship, have designedly done thee all the mischief they could. "They have called a multitude after thee," raised the mob upon thee, and incensed the common people against thee, to whom they have endeavoured by all arts possible to render thee despicable or odious, while at the same time they pretended they had no design to persecute thee, or deprive thee of thy liberty. They are indeed such as thou canst not believe, though they speak fair words to thee. They seem to be thy friends but are really thine enemies. Note, God's faithful servants must not think it at all strange if their foes be those of their own house, Mat. x. 36; and if those they expect kindness from prove such as they can put no confidence in, Mic. vii. 5. 2. Yet he is told that he carried the matter too far. 1st. He laid the unkindness of his countrymen too much to heart. They wearied him, because it was "in a land of peace wherein he trusted," ver. 5. It was very grievous to him to be thus hated and abused by his own kindred. He was disturbed in his mind by it, his spirit was sunk and overwhelmed with it, so that he was in a mighty toss and uneasiness about it. Nay, he was discouraged in his work by it, began to be weary of prophesying, and to think of giving it up. 2nd. He did not consider that this was but the beginning of his sorrow, and he had sorer trials yet before him; and, whereas he should endeavour by a patient bearing of this trouble to prepare himself for greater, by his uneasiness under this he did but unfit himself for what farther lay before him. "If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee," and run thee quite out of breath, then "how wilt thou contend with horses?" If the injuries done him by the men of Anathoth made such an impression upon him, what would he do when the princes and chief priests at Jerusalem should set upon him with their power, as they did afterwards? ch. xx. 2; xxxii. 2. If he was so soon tired in a land of peace, where there was little noise or peril, "What would he do in the swellings of Jordan," when that overflows all its banks, and frightens even lions out of their thickets? ch. xlix. 19. Note, First. While we are in this world we must expect troubles and difficulties. Our life is a race, a warfare; we are in danger of being run down. Secondly. God's usual method being to begin with lesser trials, it is our wisdom to expect greater than any we have yet met with. We may be called out to contend with horsemen, and the sons of Anak may perhaps be reserved for the last encounter. Thirdly. It highly concerns us to prepare for such trials, and to consider what we should do in them. How shall we preserve our integrity and peace when we come to the swellings of Jordan? Fourthly. In order to our preparation for farther and greater trials, we are concerned to approve ourselves well in present lesser trials, to keep up our spirits, keep hold of the promise, keep in our way, with our eye upon the prize; so run that we may obtain it.

Some good interpreters understand this as spoken to the people, who were very secure, and fearless of the threatened judgments. If they have been so humbled and impoverished by lesser calamities, so wasted by the Assyrians; if the Ammonites and Moabites, that were their brethren, and with whom they were in league, if these proved false to them, as undoubtedly they would, then how would they be able to deal with such a powerful adversary as the Chaldeans would be? How would they bear up their head against that invasion, which should come like the swelling of Jordan?

7 I have forsaken mine house,
I have left mine heritage;
I have given the dearly beloved of my soul into the hand of her enemies.
8 Mine heritage is unto me as a lion in the forest;
It crieth out against me:
Therefore have I hated it.
9 Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird,
The birds round about are against her;
Come ye, assemble all the beasts of the field,
Come to devour.
10 Many pastors have destroyed my vineyard,
They have trodden my portion under foot,
They have made my pleasant portion a desolate wilder-
11 They have made it desolate, [ness.
And being desolate it mourneth unto me;
The whole land is made desolate,
Because no man layeth it to heart. [wilderness:
12 The spoilers are come upon all high places through the
For the sword of the LORD shall devour
From the one end of the land even to the other end of
No flesh shall have peace. [the land:
13 They have sown wheat, but shall reap thorns:
They have put themselves to pain, but shall not profit:
And they shall be ashamed of your revenues
Because of the fierce anger of the LORD.

The people of the Jews are here marked for ruin.

First. God is here brought in falling out with them, and leaving them desolate; and they could never have been undone if they had not provoked God to desert them. It is a terrible word that God here saith, ver. 7, "I have forsaken my house;" the temple, which had been his palace, they had polluted it, and so forced him out of it; "I have left mine heritage," and will look after it no more. His people, that he had taken such delight in, and care of, are now thrown out of his protection. They had been the dearly beloved of his soul, precious in his sight, and honourable above any people, which is mentioned to aggravate their sin in returning him hatred for his love, and their misery in throwing themselves out of the favour of one that had such a kindness for them, and to justify God in his dealings with them. He sought not occasion against them, but, if they would have carried themselves anything tolerably, he would have made the best of them, for they were the beloved of his soul, but they had carried themselves so that they had provoked him to give them into the hand of their enemies, to leave them unguarded, an easy prey to those that bore them ill-will. But what was the quarrel God had with a people that had been so long dear to him? Why, truly, they were degenerated. 1. They were become like beasts of prey, which nobody loves, but every body avoids and gets as far off from as they can; ver. 8, "Mine heritage is unto me as a lion in the forest." Their sins cry to heaven for vengeance as loud as a lion roars. Nay, they cry out against God in the threatenings and slaughter which they breathe against his prophets, that speak to them in his name; and what is said and done against them God takes as said and done against himself. They blaspheme his name, oppose his authority, and bid defiance to his justice, and so cry out against him, "as a lion in the forest." They that were the sheep of God's pasture are become barbarous and ravenous, and as ungovernable as lions in the forest; "Therefore I hated them;" for what delight could the God of love take in a people that had now become as roaring lions and raging beasts, fit to be taken and shot at, as a vexation and torment to all about them? 2. They were become like birds of prey, and therefore also unworthy a place in God's house, where neither beasts nor birds of prey were admitted to be offered in sacrifice; ver. 9, 'Mine heritage is unto me as a bird with talons,' so some read it, and so the margin; they are continually pulling and pecking at one another, they have, by their unnatural contentions, made their country a cockpit. Or, as a speckled bird, dyed, or sprinkled, or bedewed with the blood of her prey. The shedding of innocent blood was Jerusalem's measure-filling sin, and hastened their ruin, not only as it provoked God against them, but as it provoked their neighbours likewise; for those that have their hand against every man shall have every man's hand against them, Gen. xvi. 12; and so it follows here, the birds round about are against her. Some make her a speckled, pied, or motley bird, upon the account of their mixing the superstitious customs and usages of the heathen with Divine institutions in the worship of God; they were fond of a particoloured religion, and thought it made them fine, when really it made them odious. God's turtle-dove is no speckled bird.

Secondly. The enemies are here brought in falling upon them, and laying them desolate. And some think it is upon this account that they are compared to a speckled bird, because the fowl use to make a noise about a bird of an odd, unusual colour. God's people are among the children of this world as men wondered at, as a speckled bird. But this people had by their own folly made themselves so; and the beasts and birds are called and commissioned to prey upon them. Let all "the birds round be against her," for God has forsaken her, and with them let "all the beasts of the field come to devour." Those that have made a prey of others shall themselves be preyed upon. It did not lessen the sin of the nations, but very much greatened the misery of Judah and Jerusalem, that the desolation brought upon them was by order from heaven. The birds and beasts are perhaps called to feast upon the bodies of the slain, as in St. John's vision, Rev. xix. 17. The utter desolation of the land by the Chaldean army is here spoken of as a thing done, so sure, so near, was it. God speaks of it as a thing which he had appointed to be done, and yet which he had no pleasure in, no more than in the death of other sinners.

1. See with what a tender affection he speaks of this land, notwithstanding the sinfulness of it, in remembrance of his covenant, and the tribute of honour and glory he had formerly had from it. It is "my vineyard, my portion, my pleasant portion," ver. 10. Note, God has a kindness and concern for his church, though there be much amiss in it; and his correcting of it will very much consist with his complacency in it.

2. See with what a tender compassion he speaks of the desolations of this land. "Many pastors," the Chaldean generals that made themselves masters of the country, and ate it up with their armies, as easily as the Arabian shepherds with their flocks ate up the fruits of a piece of ground that lies common, they "have destroyed my vineyard," without any consideration had either of the value of it, or my interest in it. They have with the greatest insolence and indignation trodden it under foot; and that which was a pleasant land they have made a desolate wilderness. The destruction was universal; the whole land is made desolate, ver. 11. It is made so by the sword of war; the spoilers, the Chaldean soldiers, are come through the plain, upon all high places; they have made themselves masters of all the natural fastnesses, and artificial fortresses; ver. 12, "The sword devours from one end of the land to the other," all places lie exposed, and the numerous army of the invaders disperse themselves into every corner of that fruitful country, so that "no flesh shall have peace," none shall be exempt from the calamity, nor be able to enjoy any tranquillity. When all flesh have corrupted their way, no flesh shall have peace; those only have peace that walk after the Spirit.

3. See whence all this misery comes. 1st. It comes from the displeasure of God. It is the sword of the Lord that devours, ver. 12. While God's people keep close to him, the sword of their protectors and deliverers is the sword of the Lord, witness that of Gideon; but when they have forsaken him, so that he is become their enemy, and fights against them, then the sword of their invaders and destroyers is become the sword of the Lord, witness this of the Chaldeans. It is "because of the fierce anger of the Lord," ver. 13; that was it which kindled this fire among them, and made their enemies so furious. And "who may stand before him when he is angry?" 2nd. It is their sin that has made God their enemy, particularly their incorrigibleness under former rebukes; ver. 11, "The land mourns unto me." The country that lies desolate doth, as it were, pour out its complaint before God, and humble itself under his hand, but the inhabitants are so senseless and stupid that none of them lays it to heart. They do not mourn to God, but are unaffected with his displeasure, while the very ground they go upon shames them. Note, When God's hand is lifted up, and men will not see, it shall be laid on, and they shall be made to feel, Isa. xxvi. 11.

4. See how unable they should be to fence against it; ver. 13, "They have sown wheat," they have taken a deal of pains for their own security, and promised themselves great matters from their endeavours, but it is all in vain, "they shall reap thorns," that is, that which shall prove very grievous and vexatious to them; instead of helping themselves, they shall but make themselves more uneasy. They have "put themselves to pain," both with their labour and with their expectation, but "it shall not profit;" they shall not prevail to extricate themselves out of the difficulties into which they have plunged themselves. "They shall be ashamed of your revenues," that they have depended so much upon their preparations for war, and particularly upon their ability to bear the charges of it. Money is the sinews of war; they thought they had enough of that, but shall be ashamed of it; for their silver and gold shall not profit them in the day of the Lord's anger.

14 Thus saith the LORD
Against all mine evil neighbours,
That touch the inheritance which I have caused my people Israel to inherit;
Behold, I will pluck them out of their land,
And pluck out the house of Judah from among them.
15 And it shall come to pass, after that I have plucked them out
I will return, and have compassion on them, and will bring them again,
Every man to his heritage, and every man to his land.
16 And it shall come to pass,
If they will diligently learn the ways of my people,
To swear by my name, The LORD liveth;
As they taught my people to swear by Baal;
Then shall they be built in the midst of my people.
17 But if they will not obey,
I will utterly pluck up and destroy that nation,
Saith the LORD.

The prophets sometimes, in God's name, delivered messages both of judgment and mercy to the nations that bordered on the land of Israel; but here is a message to them all in general, who had in their turns been one way or other injurious to God's people, had either oppressed them or triumphed in their being oppressed. Observe,

First. What the quarrel was that God had with them. They were his evil neighbours, ver. 14, that is, evil neighbours to his church; and what they did against it he took as done against himself, and therefore called them his evil neighbours, that should have been neighbourly to Israel, but were quite otherwise. Note, It is often the lot of good people to live among bad neighbours, that are unkind and provoking to them; and it is bad indeed when they are all so. These evil neighbours were the Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, Edomites, Egyptians, that had been ill neighbours to Israel in helping to debauch them, and draw them from God; therefore God calls them his ill neighbours, and now they helped to make them desolate, and joined with the Chaldeans against them. It is just with God to make those the instruments of trouble to us whom we have made instruments of sin. That which God lays to their charge is, They have meddled with "the inheritance which I have caused my people Israel to inherit," they unjustly seized that which was none of their own; nay, they sacrilegiously turned that to their own use which was given to God's peculiar people. He that said, "Touch not my anointed;" said also, Touch not their inheritance; it is at your peril if you do. Not only the persons, but the estates of God's people are taken under his protection.

Secondly. What course he would take with them. 1. He would break the power they had got over his people, and force them to make restitution. I will "pluck out the house of Judah from among them," which would be a great favour to God's people, who had either been taken captive by them, or, when they fled to them for shelter, had been detained and made prisoners; but a great mortification to their enemies, who would be like a lion disappointed of his prey. The house of Judah either cannot or will not make any bold struggles towards their own liberty; but God will, with a gracious violence, pluck them out; will, by his Spirit, compel them to come out; and, by his power, compel their taskmasters to let them go, as he plucked Israel out of Egypt. 2. He would bring upon them the same calamities that they had been instrumental to bring upon his people; "I will pluck them out of their land." Judgment began at the house of God, but it did not end there. Nebuchadnezzar, when he had wasted the land of Israel, turned his hand against their evil neighbours, and was a scourge to them.

Thirdly. What mercy God had in store for such of them as would join themselves to him and become his people, ver. 15, 16. They had drawn in God's backsliding people to join with them in the service of idols. If now they would be drawn by a returning people to join with them in the service of the true and living God, they should not only have their enmity to the people of God forgiven them, but the distance which they had been kept at before should be removed, and they should be received to stand upon the same level with the Israel of God, which had its accomplishment in part when, after the return out of captivity, many of the people of the lands that had been ill neighbours to Israel became Jews, and was to have its accomplishment in the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. Let not Israel, though injured by them, be implacable towards them, for God is not. "After that I have plucked them out," in justice for their sins, and in jealousy for the honour of Israel, "I will return," will change my way, "and have compassion on them." Though, being heathen, they can lay no claim to the mercies of the covenant, yet they shall have benefit by the compassions of the Creator, who will look upon them as the work of his hands however. Note, God's controversies with his creatures, though they cannot be disputed, yet may be accommodated. Those who, as these here, have been not only strangers, but enemies in their minds by wicked works, may be reconciled, Col. i. 21. Observe here,

1. What were the terms on which God would shew favour to them. It is always provided, "that they will diligently learn the ways of my people." That is in general, the ways which they walk in when they carry it as my people, not the crooked ways into which they have turned aside; the ways which my people are directed to take. Note, 1st. There are good ways that are peculiarly the ways of God's people, which, however they may differ in the choice of their paths, they are all agreed to walk in. The ways of holiness and heavenly-mindedness, of love and peaceableness, the ways of prayer and sabbath sanctification, and diligent attendance on instituted ordinances, these and the like are the ways of God's people. 2nd. Those that would have their lot with God's people, and their last end like theirs, must learn their ways and walk in them; must observe the rule they walk by and conform to that rule, and the steps they take by that rule, and go forth by those footsteps. By an intimate conversation with God's people they must learn to do as they do. 3rd. It is impossible to learn the ways of God's people as they should be learned without a great deal of care and pains. We must diligently observe these ways, and diligently oblige ourselves to walk in them; look diligently, Heb. xii. 15, and work diligently, Lu. xiii. 25. In particular they must learn to give honour to God's name, by making all their solemn appeals to him. They must "learn to say, The Lord liveth," to own him, and to adore him, and to abide by his judgment, "as they taught my people to swear by Baal." It was bad enough that they did themselves swear by Baal, worse that they taught others, and worst of all that they taught God's own people, who had been better taught; and yet if they will at length reform they shall be accepted. Observe, First. We must not despair of the conversion of the worst; no, not of those who have been instrumental to pervert and debauch others; even they may be brought to repentance, and, if they be, shall find mercy. Secondly. Those whom we have been industrious to draw to that which is evil, when God opens their eyes and ours we should be as industrious to follow in that which is good. It will be a holy revenge upon ourselves to become pupils to those in the way of duty to whom we have been tutors in the way of sin. Thirdly. The conversion of the deceived may prove a happy occasion of the conversion even of the deceivers. Thus they who fell together into the ditch are sometimes plucked together out of it.

2. What should be the tokens and fruits of this favour when they return to God and God to them. 1st. They shall be restored to, and re-established in, their own land; ver. 15, "I will bring them again every man to his heritage." The same hand that plucked them up shall plant them again. 2nd. They shall become entitled to the spiritual privileges of God's Israel. If they will be towardly, and "learn the ways of my people," will conform themselves to the rules, and confine themselves to the restraints of God's family, "then shall they be built in the midst of my people." They shall not only be brought among them to have a name and a place in the house of the Lord, where there was a court for the Gentiles, but they shall be built among them, they shall unite with them, the former enmities shall be slain; they shall be both edified and settled among them: see Isa. lvi. 5—7. Note, They that diligently learn the ways of God s people shall enjoy the privileges and comforts of his people.

Fourthly. What should become of those that were still wedded to their own evil ways, yea, though many of those about them turned to the Lord; ver. 17, "If they will not obey," if any of them continue to stand it out, "I will utterly pluck up and destroy that nation," that family, that particular person, "saith the Lord." Those that will not be ruled by the grace of God shall be ruined by the justice of God. And if disobedient nations shall be destroyed, much more disobedient churches, from whom better things are expected.

CHAPTER XIII.

Still the prophet is attempting to awaken this secure and stubborn people to repentance, by the consideration of the judgments of God that were coming upon them. He is to tell them, I. By the sign of a girdle spoiled, that their pride should be stained, ver. 1—11. II. By the sign of bottles filled with wine, that their counsels should be blasted, ver. 12—14. III. In consideration hereof he is to call them to repent, and humble themselves, ver. 15—21. IV. He is to convince them that it is for their obstinacy and incorrigibleness that the judgments of God are so prolonged and brought to extremity, ver. 22—27.

THUS saith the LORD unto me, Go and get thee a linen girdle, and put it upon thy loins, and put it not in water. 2 So I got a girdle according to the word of the LORD, and put it on my loins. 3 And the word of the LORD came unto me the second time, saying, 4 Take the girdle that thou hast got, which is upon thy loins, and arise, go to Euphrates, and hide it there in a hole of the rock. 5 So I went, and hid it by Euphrates, as the LORD commanded me. 6 And it came to pass after many days, that the LORD said unto me, Arise, go to Euphrates, and take the girdle from thence, which I commanded thee to hide there. 7 Then I went to Euphrates, and digged, and took the girdle from the place where I had hid it: and, behold, the girdle was marred, it was profitable for nothing. 8 Then the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

9 Thus saith the LORD,
After this manner will I mar the pride of Judah,
And the great pride of Jerusalem.
10 This evil people, which refuse to hear my words,
Which walk in the imagination of their heart,
And walk after other gods,
To serve them, and to worship them,
Shall even be as this girdle, which is good for nothing.
11 For as the girdle cleaveth to the loins of a man,
So have I caused to cleave unto me the whole house of Israel
And the whole house of Judah, saith the LORD;
That they might be unto me for a people,
And for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory:
But they would not hear.

Here is, First. A sign, the marring of a girdle, which the prophet had worn for some time, by hiding it in a hole of a rock, near the river Euphrates. It was usual with the prophets to teach by signs, that a stupid unthinking people might be brought to consider and believe, and be affected with what was thus set before them. 1. He was to wear a linen girdle for some time, ver. 1, 2. Some think he wore it under his clothes, because it was linen, and is said to cleave to his loins, ver. 11. It should rather seem to be worn upon his clothes, for it was worn for a name and a praise, and probably was a fine sash, such as officers wear, and such as are commonly worn at this day in the eastern nations. He must not put it in water, but wear it as it was, that it might be the stronger, and less likely to rot; linen wastes almost as much with washing as with wearing. Being not wet it was the more stiff, and less apt to ply, yet he must make a shift to wear it. Probably it was very fine linen, which will wear long without washing. The prophet, like John Baptist, was none of those that wore soft clothing, and therefore it would be the more strange to see him with a linen girdle on, who probably used to wear a leather one. 2. After he had worn this linen girdle for some time, he must go and hide it in a hole of a rock, ver. 4, by the waterside, where, when the water was high, it would be wet, and when it fell, would grow dry again, and by that means would soon rot, sooner than if it were always wet or always dry. 3. After many days he must go and look for it, and should find it quite spoiled, gone all to rags, and good for nothing, ver. 7. It has been of old a question among interpreters, whether this was really done so as to be seen and observed by the people, or only in a dream or vision, so as to go no farther than the prophet's own mind. It seems hard to imagine that the prophet should be sent on two such long journeys, as to the river Euphrates, each of which would take him up some weeks' time, when he could so ill be spared at home; and for that reason most incline to think the journey at least was only in vision, like that of Ezekiel, from the captivity in Chaldea to Jerusalem, Eze. viii. 3, and from thence back to Chaldea, Eze. xi. 24; and the explanation of this sign is only given to the prophet himself, ver. 8, not to the people, the sign not being public. But there being, it is probable, at that time great conveniences of travelling between Jerusalem and Babylon, and some part of Euphrates being not so far off, but that it was made the utmost border of the land of promise, Jos. i. 4, I see no inconvenience in supposing the prophet to have made two journeys thither; for it is expressly said, "he did as the Lord commanded him;" and thus gave a signal proof of his obsequiousness to his God, to shame the stubbornness of a disobedient people. And the toil of his journey would be very proper to signify both the pains they took to corrupt themselves with their idolatries and the sad fatigue of their captivity; and Euphrates, being the river of Babylon which was to be the place of their bondage, was a material circumstance in this sign.

Secondly. The thing signified by this sign. The prophet was willing to be at any cost and pains to affect this people with the word of the Lord. Ministers must spend and be spent for the good of souls. We have the reddition of this sign, ver. 9—11.

1. The people of Israel had been to God as this girdle in two respects: 1st. He had taken them into covenant and communion with himself; "As the girdle cleaveth" very close "to the loins of a man," and surrounds him, "so have I caused to cleave to me the houses of Israel and Judah." They were a people near to God, Ps. cxlviii. 14; they were his own, a peculiar people to him; a kingdom of priests that had access to him above other nations. He caused them to cleave to him by the law he gave them, the prophets he sent among them, and the favours which in his providence he shewed them. He required their stated attendance in the courts of his house, and the frequent ratification of their covenant with him by sacrifices. Thus they were made so to cleave to him that one would think they could never have been parted. 2nd. He had herein designed his own honour. When he took them to be to him for a people, it was that they might be to him "for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory," as a girdle is an ornament to a man, and particularly the curious girdle of the ephod was to the high priest for glory and for beauty. Note, Those whom God takes to be to him for a people he intends to be to him for a praise. First. It is their duty to honour him by observing his institutions, and aiming therein at his glory, and thus adorning their profession. Secondly. It is their happiness that he reckons himself honoured in them and by them. He is pleased with them, and glories in his relation to them, while they behave themselves as becomes his people. He was pleased to take it among the titles of his honour to be the God of Israel, even a God to Israel, 1 Chr. xvii. 24. In vain do we pretend to be to God for a people if we be not to him for a praise.

2. They had by their idolatries and other iniquities loosed themselves from him, thrown themselves at a distance, robbed him of the honour they owed him, buried themselves in the earth, and foreign earth too, mingling themselves among the nations, and were so spoiled and corrupted that they were good for nothing. They could no more be to God as they were designed, "for a name and a praise," for "they would not hear," neither their duty to do it nor their privilege to value it; "they refused to hear the words of God," by which they might have been kept still cleaving close to him; they "walked in the imagination of their heart," wherever their fancy led them, and denied themselves no gratification they had a mind to, particularly in their worship; they would not cleave to God, but "walked after other gods to serve them and to worship them;" they doated upon the gods of the heathen nations that lay towards Euphrates, so that they were quite spoiled for the service of their own God, and were as this girdle, this rotten girdle, a disgrace to their profession, and not an ornament. And a thousand pities it was that such a girdle should be so spoiled, that such a people should so wretchedly degenerate.

3. God would, by his judgments, separate them from him, send them into captivity, deface all their beauty and ruin their excellency, so that they should be like a fine girdle gone to rags, a worthless, useless, despicable people. God will after this manner "mar the pride of Judah and the great pride of Jerusalem." He would strip them of all that which was the matter of their pride, of which they boasted, and in which they trusted; it should not only be sullied and stained, but quite destroyed, like this linen girdle. Observe, He speaks of the pride of Judah; the country people were proud of their holy land, their good land, but it is the great pride of Jerusalem; there the temple was, and the royal palace, and therefore those citizens were more proud than the inhabitants of other cities. God takes notice of the degrees of men's pride, the pride of some and the great pride of others, and he will mar it, he will stain it. Pride will have a fall, for God resists the proud. He will either mar the pride that is in us, that is, mortify it by his grace, make us ashamed of it, and, like Hezekiah, humble us for the pride of our hearts, the great pride, and cure us of it, as great as it is, (and this marring of the pride will be the making of the soul; happy it is for us if, by humbling providences, our hearts be humbled,) or else he will mar the thing we are proud of. Parts, gifts, learning, power, external privileges, if we are proud of these, it is just with God to blast them; even the temple, when it became Jerusalem's pride, was marred and laid in ashes. It is the honour of God to look upon every one that is proud and abase him.

12 Therefore thou shalt speak unto them this word;
Thus saith the LORD God of Israel,
Every bottle shall be filled with wine:
And they shall say unto thee, [with wine?
Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled
13 Then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the LORD,

Behold, I will fill all the inhabitants of this land,
Even the kings that sit upon David's throne,
And the priests, and the prophets,
And all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, with drunkenness.
14 And I will dash them one against another,
Even the fathers and the sons together, saith the LORD:
I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy,
But destroy them.
15 Hear ye, and give ear; be not proud:
For the LORD hath spoken.
16 Give glory to the LORD your God,
Before he cause darkness,
And before your feet stumble upon the dark mountains,
And, while ye look for light,
He turn it into the shadow of death, and make it gross
17 But if ye will not hear it, [darkness.
My soul shall weep in secret places for your pride;
And mine eye shall weep sore, and run down with tears,
Because the LORD's flock is carried away captive.
18 Say unto the king and to the queen,
Humble yourselves, sit down:
For your principalities shall come down,
Even the crown of your glory.
19 The cities of the south shall be shut up,
And none shall open them:
Judah shall be carried away captive all of it,
It shall be wholly carried away captive. [north:
20 Lift up your eyes, and behold them that come from the
Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock?
21 What wilt thou say when he shall punish thee?
For thou hast taught them to be captains, and as chief over thee:
Shall not sorrows take thee, as a woman in travail?

Here is, First. A judgment threatened against this people that would quite intoxicate them. This doom is pronounced against them in a figure, to make it the more taken notice of and the more affecting; ver. 12, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Every bottle shall be filled with wine;" that is, Those that by their sins have made themselves "vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction," shall be filled with the wrath of God, as a bottle is with wine, and as every vessel of mercy, prepared for glory, shall be filled with mercy and glory, so "they shall be full of the fury of the Lord," Isa. li. 20, and they shall be brittle as bottles, and as old bottles into which new wine is put, they shall burst and be broken to pieces, Mat. ix. 17; or, they shall have their heads as full of wine as bottles are, for so it is explained, ver. 13, "They shall be filled with drunkenness:" compare Isa. li. 17. It is likely this was a common proverb among them, applied divers ways; but they, not being aware of the prophet's meaning in it, ridiculed him for it, "Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled with wine?" What strange thing is there in that? Tell us something that we did not know before. Perhaps they were thus tetchy with the prophet because they apprehended this to be a reflection upon them for their drunkenness, and probably it was in part so intended; they love flagons of wine, Hos. iii. 1; they made their king sick with bottles of wine; Hos. vii. 5; their watchmen were all for wine, Isa. lvi. 12; they love their false prophets to prophesy to them of wine, Mic. ii. 11, that bid them be merry, for they should never want their bottle to make them so. Well, saith the prophet, you shall have your bottles full of wine, but not such wine as you desire. They suspected he had some mystical meaning in it, which prophesied no good concerning them, but evil, and he owns that so he had. What he meant was this,

1. That they should be as giddy as men in drink. And a drunken man is fitly compared to a bottle or cask full of wine; for when the wine is in the wit, and wisdom, and virtue, and all that is good for any thing, is out. Now God threatens, ver. 13, that they shall all be filled with drunkenness; they shall be full of confusion in their counsels, shall falter in all their talk, and stagger in all their motions; they shall not know what they say or do, much less what they should say or do. They shall be sick of all their enjoyments, and throw them up as drunken men do, Job xx. 15. They shall fall into a slumber, and be utterly unable to help themselves, and, like men that have drunk away their reason, shall lie at the mercy, and expose themselves to the contempt, of all about them. And this shall be the condition not of some among them, (if any had been sober they might have helped the rest,) but even "the kings that sit upon the throne of David," that should have been like their father David, who was wise as an angel of God, shall be thus intoxicated. Their priests and prophets too, their false prophets, that pretended to guide them, were as indulgent of their lusts, and therefore were justly as much deprived of their senses, as any other. Nay, and all the inhabitants both of the land and of Jerusalem were as far gone as they. Whom God will destroy he infatuates.

2. That being giddy they should run ahead upon one another. The cup of the wine of the Lord's fury shall throw them not only into a lethargy, so that they shall not be able to help themselves or one another, but into a perfect frenzy, so that they shall do mischief to themselves and one another; ver. 14, "I will dash a man against his brother." Not only their drunken follies but their drunken frays shall help to ruin them. Drunken men are often quarrelsome, and upon that account they have woe and sorrow, Pr. xxiii. 29, 30. So their sin is their punishment; it was so here. God sent an evil spirit into families and neighbourhoods, as Jud. ix. 23, which made them jealous of, and spiteful towards, one another; so that the fathers and sons went together by the ears, and were ready to pull one another to pieces, which made them all an easy prey to the common enemy. This decree against them being gone forth, God saith, "I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them;" for they will not pity, nor have mercy, but destroy one another: see Hab. ii. 15, 16.

Secondly. Here is good counsel given, which if it were taken this desolation would be prevented. It is, in short, to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God. If they will hearken and give ear, this is that which God has to say to them, "Be not proud," ver. 15. This was one of the sins for which God had a controversy with them, ver. 9; let them mortify and forsake this sin, and God will let fall his controversy. "Be not proud;" that is, when God speaks to you by his prophets do not think yourselves too good to be taught; be not scornful, be not wilful; let not your hearts rise against the word, nor slight the messengers that bring it you. When God is coming forth against you in his providences, and by them he speaks, be not secure when he threatens, be not impatient when he strikes; for pride is at the bottom of both. It is the great God that has spoken, whose authority is incontestable, whose power is irresistible; therefore bow to what he saith, and be not proud, as you have been. They must not be proud; for,

1. They must advance God, and study how to do him honour; "Give glory to the Lord your God," and not to your idols; not to other gods. Give him glory by confessing your sins, owning yourselves guilty before him, and accepting the punishment of your iniquity, ver. 16. Give him glory by a sincere repentance and reformation. Then, and not till then, we begin to live as we should, and to some good purpose, when we begin to "give glory to the Lord our God;" to make his honour our chief end, and to seek it accordingly. Do this quickly, while your space to repent is continued to you; "before he cause darkness," before he bring his judgments upon you, which you will see no way of escaping. Note, Darkness will be the portion of those that will not repent, to give glory to God. When those that by the fourth vial were scorched with heat repented not to give glory to God, the next vial filled them with darkness, Rev. xvi. 9, 10. The aggravation of the darkness here threatened is, 1st. That their attempts to escape shall hasten their ruin; "Their feet shall stumble;" when they are making all the haste they can over "the dark mountains," and they shall fall, and be unable to get up again. Note, Those that think to outrun the judgments of God will find their road impassable; let them make the best of their way, they can make nothing of it; the judgments that pursue them will overtake them; their way is dark and slippery, Ps. xxxv. 6. And therefore before it comes to that extremity it is our wisdom to give glory to him, and so make our peace with him; to fly to his mercy, and then there will be no occasion to fly from his justice. 2nd. That their hopes of a better state of things will be disappointed; "While you look for light," for comfort and relief, he will "turn it into the shadow of death," which is very dismal and terrible; and make it gross darkness, like that of Egypt, when Pharaoh continued to harden his heart, which was darkness that might be felt. The expectation of impenitent sinners perisheth when they die, and think to have it satisfied.

2. They must abase themselves, and take shame to themselves. The prerogative of the king and queen will not exempt them from this, ver. 18, "Say to the king and queen," that, as great as they are, they must humble themselves by true repentance, and so give both glory to God and a good example to their subjects. Note, Those that are exalted above others in the world must humble themselves before God, who is higher than the highest, and to whom kings and queens are accountable. They must humble themselves and sit down; sit down and consider what is coming; sit down in the dust, and lament themselves. Let them humble themselves, for God will otherwise take an effectual course to humble them. "Your principalities shall come down," the honour and power by which you value yourselves, and in which you confide, "even the crown of your glory," your goodly or glorious crown. When you are led away captives, where will your principality, and all the badges of it, be then? Blessed be God there is a crown of glory, which those shall inherit who do humble themselves, that shall never come down.

Thirdly. This counsel is enforced by some arguments if they continue proud and unhumbled.

1. It will be the prophet's unspeakable grief; ver. 17, "If you will not hear it," will not submit to the word, but continue refractory, not only mine eye, but "my soul shall weep in secret places." Note, The obstinacy of people in refusing to hear the word of God will be a heart-breaking to their poor ministers, who know something of the terrors of the Lord, and the worth of souls; and are so far from desiring that they tremble at the thoughts of the death of sinners. His grief for it was undissembled, his soul wept; and void of affectation, for he chose to weep in secret places, where no eye saw him but his who is all eye. He would not only mingle his tears with his public preaching, but with his private devotions; nay, thoughts of their case would make him melancholy, and he would become a perfect recluse. It would grieve him, 1st. To see their sins unrepented of; "My soul shall weep for your pride," your haughtiness, and stubbornness, and vain confidence. Note, The sins of others should be matter of sorrow to us; we must mourn for that which we cannot mend, and mourn the more for it because we cannot mend it. 2nd. To see their calamity past redress and remedy; "Mine eyes shall weep sore," not so much because my relations, friends, and neighbours are in distress, but "because the Lord's flock," his people, and the sheep of his pasture, "are carried away captive." That should always grieve us most by which God's honour suffers, and the interest of his kingdom is weakened.

2. It will be their own inevitable ruin, ver. 19—21.

1st. The land shall be laid waste; "The cities of the south shall be shut up." The cities of Judah lay in the southern part of the land of Canaan; these shall be straitly besieged by the enemy, so that there shall be no going in and out; or, deserted by the inhabitants that there shall be none to go in and out. Some understand it of the cities of Egypt which was south from Judah; the places there, whence they expected succours, shall fail them, and they shall find no access to them.

2nd. The inhabitants shall be hurried away into a foreign country, there to live in slavery; "Judah shall be carried away captive." Some were already carried off, which they hoped might serve to answer the prediction, and that the residue should still be left. No, "it shall be carried away all of it;" God will make a full end with them, "it shall be wholly carried away." So it was in the last captivity under Zedekiah, because they repented not.

3rd. The enemy was now at hand that should do this; ver. 20, "Lift up your eyes." I see them upon their march, and you may if you will "behold them that come from the north," from the land of the Chaldeans; see how fast they advance, how fierce they appear. Upon this he addresseth himself to the king, or rather (because the pronouns are feminine) to the city or state. First. What will you do now with the people which is committed to your charge, and which you ought to protect? "Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock?" Whither canst thou take them now for shelter? How can they escape these ravening wolves? Magistrates must look upon themselves as shepherds, and those that are under their charge as their flock, which they are intrusted with the care of, and must give an account of; they must take delight in them as their beautiful flock, and consider what to do for their safety in times of public danger. Masters of families that neglect their children, and suffer them to perish for want of a good education, and ministers that neglect their people, should think they hear God putting this question to them, "Where is the flock that was given thee to feed, that beauteous flock?" It is starved, it is left exposed to the beasts of prey. What account wilt thou give of them when the chief Shepherd shall appear? Secondly. What have you to object against the equity of God's proceedings? "What wilt thou say when he shall visit upon thee" the former days? Thou canst say nothing, but that "God is just in all that is brought upon thee." They that flatter themselves with hopes of impunity, what will they say? What a confusion will cover their faces when they shall find themselves deceived, and that God doth punish them? Thirdly. What thoughts will they now have of their own folly, in giving the Chaldeans such power over them, by seeking to them for assistance, and joining in league with them? Thus "thou hast taught them against thyself to be captains, and to become the head." Hezekiah began, when he shewed his treasures to the ambassadors of the king of Babylon, tempting him thereby to come and plunder him. Those that, having a God to trust to, court foreign alliances, and confide in them, do but make rods for themselves, and teach their neighbours how to become their masters. Fourthly. How will they bear the trouble that is at the door? "Shall not sorrows take thee as a woman in travail?" Sorrows which thou canst not escape or put off, extremity of sorrows; and in these respects more grievous than those of a woman in travail, that they were not expected before, and that there is no man-child to be born, the joy of which shall make them afterwards to be forgotten.

22 And if thou say in thine heart,
Wherefore come these things upon me? [vered,
For the greatness of thine iniquity are thy skirts disco-
And thy heels made bare. [spots?
23 Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his
Then may ye also do good, that are accustomed to do
24 Therefore will I scatter them as the stubble [evil.
That passeth away by the wind of the wilderness.
25 This is thy lot, the portion of thy measures from me, saith the LORD; [hood.
Because thou hast forgotten me, and trusted in false-
26 Therefore will I discover thy skirts upon thy face,
That thy shame may appear.
27 I have seen thine adulteries, and thy neighings,
The lewdness of thy whoredom,
And thine abominations on the hills in the fields.
Woe unto thee, O Jerusalem!
Wilt thou not be made clean? when shall it once be?

Here is, First. Ruin threatened, as before, that the Jews shall go into captivity, and fall under all the miseries of beggary and bondage; shall be stripped of their clothes, their skirts discovered, for want of upper garments to cover them; and their heels made bare, for want of shoes, ver. 22. Thus they used to deal with prisoners taken in war, when they drove them into captivity, naked and barefooted, Isa. xx. 4. Being thus carried off into a strange country, they shall be scattered there, as the stubble that is blown away by the wind of the wilderness, and nobody is concerned to bring it together again, ver. 24. If the stubble escape the fire it shall be carried away by the wind. If one judgment do not the work, another shall, with those that by sin have made themselves as stubble. They shall be stripped of all their ornaments, and exposed to shame, as whores that are carted, ver. 26. They made their pride appear, but God will make their shame appear; so that those who have doated on them shall be ashamed of them.

Secondly. An inquiry made by the people into the cause of this ruin, ver. 22. Thou wilt say in thine heart, (and God knows how to give a proper answer to what men say in their hearts, though they do not speak it out; Jesus knowing their thoughts replied to them, Mat. ix. 4,) "Wherefore come these things upon me?" The question is supposed to come into the heart, 1. Of a sinner quarrelling with God, and refusing to receive correction. They could not see that they had done any thing which might justly provoke God to be thus angry with them. They durst not speak it out; but in their hearts they thus charged God with unrighteousness, as if he had laid upon them more than was meet. They seek for the cause of their calamities, when, if they had not been wilfully blind, they might easily have seen it. Or, 2. Of a sinner returning to God. If there come but a penitent thought into the heart at any time, saying, "What have I done?" (ch. viii. 6) wherefore am I in affliction? why doth God contend with me? God takes notice of it, and is ready by his Spirit to impress the conviction, that sin being discovered it may be repented of.

Thirdly. An answer to this inquiry. God will be justified when he speaks, and will oblige us to justify him; and therefore will set the sin of sinners in order before them. Do they ask, "Wherefore these things came upon them?" Let them know it is all long of themselves.

1. It is for the greatness of their iniquities, ver. 22. God doth not take advantage against them for small faults. No, the sins for which he now punisheth them are of the first rate, very heinous in their own nature, and highly aggravated. For 'the multitude of thine iniquity,' so it may be read. Sins of every kind, and often repeated and relapsed into. And some think we are more in danger from the multitude of our lesser sins than from the heinousness of our greater sins; of both we may say, "Who can understand his errors?"

2. It is for their obstinacy in sin. Their being so long accustomed to it that there is little hopes left of their being reclaimed from it; ver. 23, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin," that is by nature black, "or the leopard his spots," that are even woven into the skin? Dirt contracted may be washed off; but we cannot alter the natural colour of a hair, Mat. v. 36, much less of the skin; and so impossible is it, morally impossible, to reclaim and reform these people. 1st. They had been long accustomed to do evil; they were taught to do evil; they had been educated and brought up in sin; they had served an apprenticeship to it, and had all their days made a trade of it. It was so much their constant practice that it was become a second nature to them. 2nd. Their prophets therefore despaired of ever bringing them to do good. That was it they aimed at; they persuaded them to cease to do evil, and learn to do well, but could not prevail. They had been so long used to do evil, that it was next to impossible for them to repent, and amend, and begin to do good. Note, Custom in sin is a very great hindrance to conversion from sin. The disease that is inveterate is generally thought incurable. Those that have been long accustomed to sin have shaken off the restraints of fear and shame; their consciences are seared, the habits of sin are confirmed; it pleads prescription, and it is just with God to give those up to their own hearts' lusts that have long refused to give up themselves to his grace. Sin is the blackness of the soul, the deformity of it; it is its spot, the discolouring of it; it is natural to us, we were shapen in it, so that we cannot get clear of it by any power of our own; but there is an Almighty grace that is able to change the Ethiopian's skin, and that grace shall not be wanting to those that, in a sense of their need of it, seek it earnestly, and improve it faithfully.

3. It is for their treacherous departures from the God of truth, and dependences on lying vanities; ver. 25, "This is thy lot," to be scattered and driven away; this is "the portion of thy measures from me," the punishment assigned thee as by line and measure; this shall be thy share of the miseries of this world; expect it, and think not to escape it. It is "because thou hast forgotten me," the favours I have bestowed upon thee, and the obligations thou art under to me; thou hast no sense, no remembrance of these. Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of all sin, as the remembrance of our Creator betimes is the happy and hopeful beginning of a holy life. And, having forgotten me, thou hast trusted in falsehood; in idols, in an arm of flesh, in Egypt and Assyria, in the self-flatteries of a deceitful heart. Whatever those trust to that forsake God they will find it a broken reed, a broken cistern.

4. It is for their idolatry, their spiritual whoredom, that sin which is of all other most provoking to the jealous God. Therefore they are exposed to a shameful calamity, ver. 26, because they have been guilty of a shameful iniquity, and yet are shameless in it; ver. 27, "I have seen thine adulteries;" thine inordinate fancy for strange gods, which thou hast been impatient for the gratification of, and hast even neighed after it; even "the lewdness of thy whoredoms," thine impudence and insatiableness in them; that is, thy eager worshipping of idols on the hills in the fields, upon the high places. This is that for which a woe is denounced against thee, "O Jerusalem;" nay, and many woes.

Fourthly. Here is an affectionate expostulation with them in the close upon the whole matter. Though it was adjudged next to impossible for them to be brought to do good, ver. 23, yet while there is life there is hope; and therefore still he reasons with them to bring them to repentance, ver. 27. 1. He reasons with them concerning the thing itself; "Wilt thou not be made clean?" Note, It is the great concern of those who are polluted by sin to be made clean by repentance and faith, and an universal reformation. The reason why sinners are not made clean is because they will not be made clean; and herein they act most unreasonably. "Wilt thou not be made clean?" Surely thou wilt at length be persuaded to "wash thee, and make thee clean," and so be wise for thyself. 2. Concerning the time of it; "When shall it once be?" Note, It is an instance of the wonderful grace of God that he desires the repentance and conversion of sinners, and thinks the time long till they are brought to it. But it is an instance of the wonderful folly of sinners that they put that off from time to time which is of absolute necessity, and which, if it be not done some time, they are certainly undone for ever. They do not say they will never be cleansed, but not yet; they will defer it to a more convenient season, but cannot tell us "when it shall once be."

CHAPTER XIV.

This chapter was penned upon occasion of a great drought, for want of rain. This judgment began in the latter end of Josiah's reign, but, as it should seem, continued in the beginning of Jehoiakim's; for lesser judgments are sent to give warning of greater coming, if not prevented by repentance. This calamity was mentioned several times before, but here in this chapter more fully. Here is, I. A melancholy description of it, ver. 1—6. II. A prayer to God to put an end to this calamity, and to return in mercy to their land, ver. 7—9. III. A severe threatening, that God would proceed in his controversy, because they proceeded in their iniquity, ver. 10—12. IV. The prophet's excusing the people, by laying the blame on their false prophets; and the doom passed both on the deceivers and the deceived, ver. 13—16. V. Directions given to the prophet, instead of interceding for them, to lament them; but his continuing notwithstanding to intercede for them, ver. 17—22.

THE word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah concerning the dearth.

2 Judah mourneth, and the gates thereof languish;
They are black unto the ground;
And the cry of Jerusalem is gone up.
3 And their nobles have sent their little ones to the waters;
They came to the pits, and found no water;
They returned with their vessels empty;
They were ashamed and confounded,
And covered their heads.
4 Because the ground is chapt,
For there was no rain in the earth,
The plowmen were ashamed,
They covered their heads.
5 Yea, the hind also calved in the field,
And forsook it, because there was no grass.
6 And the wild asses did stand in the high places,
They snuffed up the wind like dragons;
Their eyes did fail, because there was no grass.
7 O LORD, though our iniquities testify against us,
Do thou it for thy name's sake:
For our backslidings are many;

We have sinned against thee.

8 O the hope of Israel, the saviour thereof in time of trouble,
Why shouldest thou be as a stranger in the land,
And as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a 9 Why shouldest thou be as a man astonied, [night?

EASTERN WATER CARRIERS.—ver. 3.

The first verse is the title of the whole chapter. It doth indeed all concern the dearth; but much of it is the prophet's prayers concerning it; yet these are not unfitly said to be the word of the Lord which came to him concerning it; for every acceptable prayer is that which God puts into our hearts. Nothing is our word that comes to him but what is first his word that comes from him. In these verses we have,

First. The language of nature lamenting the calamity. When the heavens were as brass, and distilled no dews, the earth was as iron, and produced no fruits; and then what an universal grief and confusion was there!

1. The people of the land were all in tears. "Destroy all their vines and their fig-trees, and you cause all their mirth to cease," Hos. ii. 11, 12. All their joy fails with the joy of harvest, with that of their corn and wine; ver. 2, "Judah mourneth," not for the sin but for the trouble; for the withholding of the rain, not for the withdrawing of God's favour. "The gates thereof;" that is, all that go in and out at their gates, "languish," look pale, and grow feeble, for want of the necessary supports of life, and for fear of the farther fatal consequences of this judgment. The gates, through which supplies of corn formerly used to be brought into their cities, now look melancholy, when, instead of that, the inhabitants are departing through them to seek for bread in other countries. Even those that sit in the gates languish, "they are black unto the ground;" they go in black as mourners, and sit on the ground; as the poor beggars at the gates are black in the face for want of food, blacker than a coal, Lam iv. 8. Famine is represented by a black horse, Rev. vi. 5. They fall to the ground through weakness, not being able to go along the streets. "The cry of Jerusalem is gone up," that is, of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; for the city is served by the field; or, of people from all parts of the country met at Jerusalem to pray for rain, so some. But I think it was rather the cry of their trouble, and the cry of their sin, than the cry of their prayer.

2. The great men of the land felt from this judgment; ver. 3, "The nobles sent their little ones to the water," perhaps their own children, having been forced to part with their servants, because they had not wherewithal to keep them, and being willing to train up their children, when they were little, to labour, especially in a case of necessity, as this was. We find Ahab and Obadiah, the king and the lord chamberlain of his household, in their own persons seeking for water in such a time of distress as this was, 1 Kin. xviii. 5, 6. Or rather, 'Their meaner ones,' their servants and small officers; these they sent to seek for water, which there is no living without, but there was none to be found; "they returned with their vessels empty," the springs were dried up when there was no rain to feed them; and then they, that is, their masters that sent them, "were ashamed and confounded" at the disappointment. They would not be ashamed of their sins, nor confounded at the sense of them, but were unhumbled under the reproofs of the word, thinking their wealth and dignity set them above repentance; but God took a course to make them ashamed of that which they were so proud of, when they found that even on this side hell their nobility would not purchase them a drop of water to cool their tongue. Let our reading the account of this calamity make us thankful for the mercy of water, that we may not by the feeling of the calamity be taught to value it. What is most needful is most plentiful.

3. The husbandmen felt most sensibly and immediately from it; ver. 4, "The ploughmen were ashamed," for the ground was so parched and hard that it would not admit the plough; even then when it was so chapped and cleft that it seemed as if it did not need the plough. They were ashamed to be idle, for there was nothing to be done, and therefore nothing to be expected. The sluggard that will not plough by reason of cold is not ashamed of his own folly; but the diligent husbandman, that cannot plough by reason of heat, is ashamed of his own affliction: see what an immediate dependence husbandmen have upon the Divine providence, which therefore they should always have an eye to, for they cannot plough or sow in hope, unless God water their furrows, Ps. lxv. 10.

4. The case even of the wild beasts was very piteous, ver. 5, 6. Man's sin brings those judgments upon the earth which make even the inferior creatures groan; and the prophet takes notice of this as a plea with God for mercy. Judah and Jerusalem have sinned; but the hinds and the wild asses, what have they done? The hinds are pleasant creatures, lovely and loving, and particularly tender of their young; and yet such is the extremity of the case, that, contrary to the instinct of their nature, they leave their young, even when they are newly calved, and most need them, to go seek for grass elsewhere; and if they can find none they abandon them, because not able to suckle them. It grieved not the hind so much that she had no grass for herself as that she had none for her young; which will shame those who spend that upon their lusts which they should preserve for their families. The hind, when she has brought forth her young, is said to have cast forth her sorrows, Job xxxix. 3, and yet she continues her cares; but, as it follows there, soon sees the good effect of them, for her young ones in a little while grow up, and trouble her no more, ver. 4. But here the great trouble of all is, that she has nothing for them. Nay, one would be sorry even for the wild asses, (though they are creatures that none have any great affection for,) for though the barren land is made their dwelling at the best, Job xxxix. 5, 6, yet even that is now made too hot for them, so hot, that they cannot breathe in it: but they get to the highest places they can, where the air is coolest, and snuff up the wind like dragons, like those creatures that, being naturally exceeding hot, are continually panting for breath. Their eyes fail, and so doth their strength, because there is no grass to support them. The tame ass that serves her owner is welcome to his crib, Isa. i. 3, and has her keeping for her labour; when the wild ass, that scorns the crying of the driver, is forced to live upon air, and is well enough served for not serving. He that will not labour let him not eat.

Secondly. Here is the language of grace, lamenting the iniquity, and complaining to God of the calamity. The people are not forward to pray, but the prophet here prays for them, and so excites them to pray for themselves, and puts words into their mouths, which they may make use of in hopes to speed, ver. 7—9. In this prayer,

1. Sin is humbly confessed. When we come to pray for the preventing or removing of any judgment, we must always acknowledge that we deserve it, and a thousand times worse. We cannot hope by extenuating the crime to obtain a mitigation of the punishment, but must acknowledge that "our iniquities testify against us." Our sins are witnesses against us, and true penitents see them to be so. They testify, for they are plain and evident, we cannot deny the charge; they testify against us, for our conviction; which tends to our present shame and confusion, and our future condemnation. They disprove and overthrow all our pleas for ourselves; and so not only accuse us, but answer against us. If we boast of our own excellences, and trust to our own righteousness, our iniquities testify against us, and prove us perverse. If we quarrel with God as dealing unjustly or unkindly with us in afflicting us, our iniquities testify against us that we do him wrong; "Our backslidings are many," and our revolts are great, whereby "we have sinned against thee;" too numerous to be concealed, for they are many; too heinous to be excused, for they are against thee.

2. Mercy is earnestly begged; "Though our iniquities testify against us," and against the granting of the favour which the necessity of our case calls for, yet "Do thou it." They do not say particularly what they would have done; but, as becomes penitents and beggars, they refer themselves to God; Do with us as thou thinkest fit, Jud. x. 15. Not, Do thou it in this way, or at this time, but "Do thou it for thy name's sake;" that is, Do that which will be most for the glory of thy name. Note, Our best pleas in prayer are those that are fetched from the glory of God's own name. Lord, do it that thy mercy may be magnified, thy promise fulfilled, and thine interest in the world kept up; we have nothing to plead in ourselves, but every thing in thee. There is another petition in this prayer, and it is a very modest one; ver. 9, "Leave us not," withdraw not thy favour and presence. Note, We should dread and deprecate God's departures from us more than the removal of any of all our creature comforts.

3. Their relation to God, their interest in him, and their expectations from him grounded thereupon, are most pathetically pleaded with him, ver. 8, 9.

1st. They look upon him as one they have reason to think should deliver them when they are in distress, yea, though their iniquities testify against them; for in him mercy hath often rejoiced against judgment. The prophet, like Moses of old, is willing to make the best he can of the case of his people; and therefore, though he must own that they have sinned many a great sin, Ex. xxxii. 31, yet he pleads, "Thou art the hope of Israel." God has encouraged his people to hope in him, in calling himself so often the God of Israel, and the Rock of Israel, and the Holy One of Israel, he hath made himself the Hope of Israel. He has given Israel his word to hope in, and caused them to hope in it; and there are those yet in Israel that make God alone their hope, and expect he will be their Saviour in time of trouble, and they look not for salvation in any other. Thou hast many a time been so, in the time of their extremity. Note, Since God is his people's all-sufficient Saviour, they ought to hope in him in their greatest straits; and since he is their alone Saviour, they ought to hope in him only. They plead likewise, "Thou art in the midst of us," we have the special tokens of thy presence with us, thy temple, thine ark, thine oracles; and "we are called by thy name," the Israel of God, and therefore we have reason to hope thou wilt not leave us; "We are thine, save us." Thy name is called upon by us, and therefore what evils we are under reflect dishonour upon thee, as if thou wast not able to relieve thine own. The prophet had often told the people that their profession of religion would not protect them from the judgments of God; yet here he pleads it with God, as Moses, Ex. xxxii. 11; even this may go far as to temporal punishments with a God of mercy; valeat quantum valere potest, —'let the plea avail as far as is proper.'

2nd. It therefore grieves them to think that he doth not appear for their deliverance; and, though they do not charge it upon him as unrighteous, they humbly plead it with him why he should be gracious,—for the glory of his own name. For otherwise he will seem, First. Unconcerned for his own people. What will the Egyptians say? They will say, Israel's hope and Saviour never minds them; he is become as a stranger in the land, that doth not at all interest himself in its interests; that his temple, which he called his rest for ever, is no more so, but he is in it "as a wayfaring man, that turns aside to tarry but for a night" in an inn, which he never inquires into the affairs of, nor is in any care about. Though God never is, yet he sometimes seems to be, as if he cared not what became of his church. Christ slept when his disciples were in a storm. Secondly. Incapable of giving them any relief. The enemies will say, Because the Lord was not able to bring his people to Canaan, he let them perish in the wilderness, Num. xiv. 16; so now they will say, that either his wisdom or his power fail him; that either he is as a man astonished, who, though he has the reason of a man, yet, being astonished, is quite at a loss, and at his wit's end; or, as a mighty man, that is overpowered by such as are more mighty, and therefore cannot save; though mighty, yet a man, and therefore his power limited. Either of these would be a most insufferable reproach to the Divine perfections. And therefore why is the God, that we are sure is in the midst of us, become as a stranger? Why doth the almighty God seem as if he were no more than a mighty man, who, when he is astonished, though he would, yet cannot save? It becomes us in prayer to shew ourselves concerned more for God's glory than for our own comfort. "Lord, what wilt thou do unto thy great name?"

10 Thus saith the LORD unto this people,
Thus have they loved to wander,
They have not refrained their feet,

Therefore the LORD doth not accept them;
He will now remember their iniquity,
And visit their sins.
11 Then said the LORD unto me,
Pray not for this people for their good.
12 When they fast, I will not hear their cry;
And when they offer burnt offering and an oblation, I will not accept them:
But I will consume them by the sword,
And by the famine, and by the pestilence.
13 Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD!
Behold, the prophets say unto them,
Ye shall not see the sword, neither shall ye have famine;
But I will give you assured peace in this place.
14 Then the LORD said unto me,
The prophets prophesy lies in my name:
I sent them not, neither have I commanded them,
Neither spake unto them:
They prophesy unto you a false vision and divination,
And a thing of nought, and the deceit of their heart.
15 Therefore thus saith the LORD
Concerning the prophets that prophesy in my name, and I sent them not,
Yet they say, Sword and famine shall not be in this land;
By sword and famine shall those prophets be consumed,
16 And the people to whom they prophesy
Shall be cast out in the streets of Jerusalem
Because of the famine and the sword;
And they shall have none to bury them,
Them, their wives, nor their sons, nor their daughters:
For I will pour their wickedness upon them.

The dispute between God and his prophet in this chapter seems to be like that between the owner and the dresser of the vineyard, concerning the barren fig-tree, Lu. xiii. 7. The justice of the owner condemns it to be cut down, the clemency of the dresser intercedes for a reprieve. Jeremiah had been earnest with God in prayer to return in mercy to this people. Now here,

First. God overrules the plea which he had offered in their favours, and shews him that it would not hold. In answer to it thus he saith, "Concerning this people," ver. 10. He doth not say, Concerning my people, for he disowns them, because they had broken covenant with him. It is true they were called by his name, and had the tokens of his presence among them; but they had sinned, and provoked God to withdraw. This the prophet had owned, and hoped to obtain mercy for them, notwithstanding this, through intercession and sacrifice; therefore God here tells him,

1. That they were not duly qualified for a pardon. The prophet had owned their backslidings were many; and, though they were so, yet there was hopes for them if they returned; but this people shews no disposition at all to return. They have wandered, and they have loved to wander; their backslidings have been their choice and their pleasure, which should have been their shame and pain, and therefore they will be their ruin. They cannot expect God should take up his rest with them when they take such delight in going astray from him after their idols. It is not through necessity or inadvertency that they wander, but they love it. Sinners are wanderers from God; their wanderings forfeit God's favour; but it is their loving to wander that quite cuts them off from it. They were told what their wanderings would come to, that one sin would hurry them on to another, and all to ruin; and yet they have not taken warning, and refrained their feet. So far were they from returning to their God, that neither his prophets nor his judgments could prevail with them to give themselves the least check in a sinful pursuit. This is that for which God is now reckoning with them. When he denies them rain from heaven he is remembering their iniquity and visiting their sin; that is it for which their fruitful land is thus turned into barrenness.

2. That they had no reason to expect that the God they had rejected should accept them; no, not though they betook themselves to fasting and prayer, and put themselves to the expence of burnt offerings and sacrifice. "The Lord doth not accept them," ver. 10. "He takes no pleasure in them," so the word is; for what pleasure can the holy God take in those that take pleasure in his rivals, in any service, in any society rather than his. "When they fast," ver. 12, which is a proper expression of repentance and reformation; "when they offer a burnt offering and an oblation," which was designed to be an expression of faith in a Mediator, though their prayers be thus enforced, and offered up in those vehicles that used to be acceptable, yet, because they do not proceed from humble, penitent, and renewed hearts, but still they love to wander, therefore I will not hear their cry, be it never so loud; nor will I accept them; neither their persons nor their performances. It had been long since declared, that "the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord," and those only are accepted that do well, Gen. iv. 7.

3. That they had forfeited all benefit by the prophet's prayers for them, because they had not regarded his preaching to them. This is the meaning of that repeated prohibition given to the prophet; ver. 11, "Pray not thou for this people for their good," as before, ch. xi. 14; vii. 16. This did not forbid him thus to express his good-will to them. Moses continued to intercede for Israel, after God had said, "Let me alone," Ex. xxxii. 10; but it forbade them to expect any good effect from it, as long as they turned away their ear from hearing the law. Thus was the doom of the impentitent ratified, as that of Saul's rejection was by that word to Samuel, "When wilt thou cease to mourn for Saul?" It therefore follows, ver. 12, "I will consume them," not only by this famine, but by the farther sore judgments of sword and pestilence; for God has many arrows in his quiver, and those that will not be convinced and reclaimed by one shall be consumed by another.

Secondly. The prophet offers another plea in excuse of the people's obstinacy; and it is but an excuse, but he was willing to say whatever their case would bear. It is this, that the prophets, who pretended a commission from heaven, imposed upon them, and flattered them with assurances of peace, though they went on in their sinful way, ver. 13. He speaks of it with lamentation; "Ah, Lord God," the poor people seem willing to take notice of what comes in thy name; and there are those who in thy name tell them that they shall not see the sword or famine, and they say it as from thee, with all the gravity and confidence of prophets; 'I will continue you in this place, and will give you assured peace here, peace of truth.' I tell them the contrary, but I am one against many, and every one is apt to credit that which makes for them; therefore, Lord, pity and spare them, for their leaders cause them to err. This excuse had been of some weight if they had not had warning given them before of false prophets, and rules by which to discover them; so that if they were deceived it was purely their own fault. But this teacheth us, as far as we can with truth, to make the best of bad, and judge as charitably of others as their case will bear.

Thirdly. God not only overrules this plea, but condemns both the blind leaders and the blind followers to fall together into the ditch.

1. God disowns the flatteries; ver. 14, "They prophesy lies in my name." They had no commission from God to prophesy at all, "I neither sent them, nor commanded them, nor spake unto them." They never were employed to go on any errand at all from God, he never made himself known to them, much less by them to the people; never any word of the Lord came to them, no call, no warrant, no instructions, much less did he send them on this errand, to rock them asleep in security. No; men may flatter themselves, and Satan may flatter them, but God never doth. It is a false vision, and a thing of nought. Note, What is false and groundless is vain and worthless. The vision that is not true, be it never so pleasing, is good for nothing; it is the deceit of their heart, a spider's web spun out of their own bowels, and in it they think to shelter themselves; but it will be swept away in a moment, and prove a great cheat. They that oppose their own thoughts to God's word (God indeed saith so, but they think otherwise) walk in the deceit of their heart, and it will be their ruin.

2. He passeth sentence upon the flatterers, ver. 15. As for the prophets, who put this abuse upon the people, by telling them they shall have peace; and this affront upon God by telling them so in God's name, let them know that they shall have no peace themselves. They shall fall first by those very judgments, which they have flattered others with the hopes of an exemption from. They undertook to warrant people, that sword and famine should not be in the land; but it shall soon appear how little their warrants are good for, when they themselves shall be cut off by sword and famine. How should they secure others, or foretell peace to them, when they cannot secure themselves, nor have such a foresight of their own calamities as to get out of the way of them. Note, The sorest punishments await those who promise sinners impunity in their sinful ways.

3. He lays the flattered under the same doom, ver. 16. The people to whom they prophesy lies, and who willingly suffer themselves to be thus imposed upon, they shall die by sword and famine. Note, The unbelief of the deceived, with all the falsehood of the deceivers, shall not make the Divine threatenings of none effect. Sword and famine will come, whatever they say to the contrary; and those will be least safe that are most secure. Impenitent sinners will not escape the damnation of hell by saying they can never believe there is such a thing; but will feel what they will not fear. It is threatened that this people shall not only fall by sword and famine, but they shall be as it were hanged up in chains, as monuments of that Divine justice which they set at defiance; their bodies shall be cast out, even in the streets of Jerusalem, which of all places, one would think should be kept clear from such nuisances. There they shall lie unburied; their nearest relations, who should do them that last office of love, being either so poor that they cannot afford it, or so weakened with hunger that they are not able to attend it, or so overwhelmed with grief that they have no heart to it, or so destitute of natural affection that they will not pay them so much respect. Thus will God pour their wickedness upon them, that is, the punishment of their wickedness; the full vials of God's wrath shall be poured on them, to which they have made themselves obnoxious. Note, When sinners are overwhelmed with trouble, they must in it see their own wickedness poured upon them. This refers to the wickedness, both of the false prophets and of the people; the blind lead the blind, and both fall together into the ditch, where they will be miserable comforters one to another.

17 Therefore thou shalt say this word unto them;
Let mine eyes run down with tears night and day,
And let them not cease:
For the virgin daughter of my people is broken
With a great breach, with a very grievous blow.
18 If I go forth into the field,
Then behold the slain with the sword!
And if I enter into the city,
Then behold them that are sick with famine!
Yea, both the prophet and the priest
Go about into a land that they know not.
19 Hast thou utterly rejected Judah?
Hath thy soul lothed Zion?
Why hast thou smitten us, and there is no healing for us?
We looked for peace, and there is no good;
And for the time of healing, and behold trouble!
20 We acknowledge, O LORD, our wickedness,
And the iniquity of our fathers:
For we have sinned against thee.
21 Do not abhor us, for thy name's sake,
Do not disgrace the throne of thy glory:
Remember, break not thy covenant with us.

22 Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain?
Or can the heavens give showers?
Art not thou he, O LORD our God?
Therefore we will wait upon thee:
For thou hast made all these things.

The present deplorable state of Judah and Jerusalem is here made the matter of the prophet's lamentation, ver. 17, 18; and the occasion of his prayer and intercession for them, ver. 19; and I am willing to hope that the latter as well as the former is by Divine direction, and that these words, ver. 17, "Thus shalt thou say unto them," or concerning them, or in their hearing, refer to the intercession as well as to the lamentation, and then it amounts to a revocation of the directions given to the prophet not to pray for them, ver. 11. However, it is plain, by the prayers we find in these verses, that the prophet did not understand it as a prohibition, but only as a discouragement, like that, 1 Jno. v. 16, "I do not say he shall pray for that." Here,

First. The prophet stands weeping over the ruins of his country. God directs him to do so, that, shewing himself affected, he might if possible affect them with the foresight of the calamities that were coming upon them. Jeremiah must not only say it to himself, but to them too, "Let mine eyes run down with tears," ver. 17. Thus he must signify to them, that he certainly foresaw the sword coming, and another sort of famine, more grievous even than this which they were now groaning under; this was in the country for want of rain, that in the city through the straitness of the siege. The prophet speaks as if he already saw the miseries attending the descent which the Chaldeans made upon them; "The virgin daughter of my people," that is as dear to me as a daughter to her father, she "is broken with a great breach, with a very grievous blow," much greater and more grievous than any she has yet sustained; for, ver. 18, in the field multitudes lie dead that were slain by the sword, and in the city multitudes lie dying for want of food. Doleful spectacles! The prophets and the priests, the false prophets that flattered them with their lies, and the wicked priests that persecuted the true prophets, these are now expelled their country, and go about, either as prisoners and captives, whithersoever their conquerors lead them; or as fugitives and vagabonds, wherever they can find shelter and relief, in a land that they know not. Some understand it of the true prophets, Ezekiel and Daniel, that were carried to Babylon with the rest. The prophet's eyes must run down with tears day and night in the prospect of this, that the people might be convinced, not only that this woful day would infallibly come, and would be a very woful day indeed, but that he was far from desiring it, and would as gladly have brought them messages of peace as their false prophets, if he might but have had warrant from heaven to do it. Note, Because God, though he inflicts death on sinners, yet delights not in it, it becomes his ministers, though in his name they pronounce the death of sinners, yet sadly to lament it.

Secondly. He stands up to make intercession for them; for who knows but God will yet return and repent? While there is life there is hope and room for prayer. And though there were many among them who neither prayed themselves nor valued the prophet's prayers, yet there were some who were better affected, would join with him in his devotions, and set the seal of their Amen to them.

1. He humbly expostulates with God concerning the present deplorableness of their case, ver. 19. It was very sad, for, 1st. Their expectations from their God failed them. They thought he had avouched Judah to be his; but now it seems he hath utterly rejected it, and cast it off; will not own any relation to it, or concern for it. However, they thought Zion was the beloved of his soul, was his rest for ever; but now his soul even loathes Zion, loathes even the services there performed, for the sake of the sins there committed. 2nd. Then no marvel that all their other expectations failed them. They were smitten, and their wounds were multiplied, but there was no healing for them; they looked for peace, because there uses to come after a storm a calm, and fair weather after a long fit of wet, but there was no good; things went still worse and worse. They looked for a healing time, but could not gain so much as a breathing time. Behold trouble at the door, by which we hoped peace would enter. And is it so then? "Hast thou" indeed "rejected Judah?" Justly thou mightest. "Hath thy soul loathed Zion?" We deserve it should. But wilt thou not at length in wrath remember mercy?

2. He makes a penitent confession of sin, speaking that language which they all should have spoken, though but few did; ver. 20, We acknowledge our wickedness, the abounding wickedness of our land, and the iniquity of our fathers, which we have imitated, and therefore justly smart for. We know, we acknowledge, that we have sinned against thee, and therefore thou art just in all that is brought upon us; but because we confess our sins we hope to find thee faithful and just in forgiving our sins.

3. He deprecates God's displeasure, and by faith appeals to his honour and promise, ver. 21. His petition is, "Do not abhor us;" though thou afflict us, "do not abhor us;" though thy hand be turned against us, let not thy heart be so, nor let thy mind be alienated from us. They own God might justly abhor them, they had rendered themselves odious in his eyes; yet, when they pray, "Do not abhor us," they mean, receive us into favour again. "Let not thy soul loathe Zion," ver. 19. Let not our incense be an abomination. They appeal, 1st. To the honour of God, the honour of his Scriptures, by which he hath made himself known; his word, which he hath magnified above all his name. "Do not abhor us for thy name's sake," that name of thine by which we are called, and which we call upon. The honour of his sanctuary. Lord, do not abhor us, for that will disgrace the throne of thy glory; that is, the temple, which is called "a glorious high throne from the beginning," ch. xvii. 12. Let not that which has been the joy of the whole earth be made a hissing and an astonishment; we deserve to have disgrace put upon us, but let it not be so as to reflect upon thyself; let not the desolations of the temple give occasion to the heathen to reproach Him that used to be worshipped there, as if he could not or would not protect it, or as if the gods of the Chaldeans had been too hard for him. Note, Good men lay the credit of religion, and its profession in the world, nearer their hearts than any private interest or concern of their own; and those are powerful pleas in prayer which are fetched from thence, and great supports to faith. We may be sure God will not disgrace the throne of his glory on earth, nor eclipse the glory of his throne by one providence, but he will soon make it shine forth, and more brightly than before, by another. God will be no loser in his honour at the long run. 2nd. To the promise of God. Of this they are humbly bold to put him in mind; Remember thy covenant with us, and break not that covenant. Not that they had any distrust of his fidelity, or that they thought he needed to be put in mind of his promise to them, but what he had said he would plead with himself; they take the liberty to plead with him: "Then will I remember my covenant," Lev. xxvi. 42.

4. He professeth a dependence upon God for the mercy of rain, which they were now in the want of, ver. 22. If they have forfeited their interest in him as their God in covenant, yet they will not let go their hold as the God of nature. 1st. They will never make their application to the idols of the heathen, for that would be foolish and fruitless. "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain?" No; in a time of great drought in Israel, Baal, though all Israel was at his devotion in the days of Ahab, yet he could not relieve them; it was that God only who answered by fire that could answer by water too. 2nd. They will not terminate their regards in second causes, nor expect supply from nature only. "Can the heavens give showers?" No, not without orders from the God of heaven; for it is he that has the key of the clouds, that "opens the bottles of heaven, and waters the earth from his chambers." But, 3rd. All their expectation therefore is from him, and their confidence in him. "Art not thou he, O Lord our God," from whom we may expect succour, and to whom we must apply ourselves? And art not thou he that causeth rain and giveth showers? for thou hast made all these things; thou gavest them being, and therefore thou givest them law, and hast them all at thy command; thou madest that moisture in nature, which is in a continual circulation, to serve the intentions of providence, and thou directest it, and makest what use thou pleasest of it; "Therefore we will wait upon thee," and upon thee only; we will "ask of the Lord rain," Zec. x. 1. We will trust in him to give it us in due time, and be willing to tarry his time; it is fit we should, and it will not be in vain to do so. Note, The sovereignty of God should engage, and his all-sufficiency encourage, our attendance on him, and our expectations from him at all times.

CHAPTER XV.

When we left the prophet in the close of the foregoing chapter, so pathetically pouring out his prayer before God, we had reason to hope, that in this chapter we should find God reconciled to the land, and the prophet brought into a quiet composed frame; but to our great surprise we find it much otherwise as to both. I. Notwithstanding the prophet's prayers, God here ratifies the sentence given against the people, and abandons them to ruin, turning a deaf ear to all the intercessions made for them, ver. 1—9. II. The prophet himself, notwithstanding the satisfaction he had in communion with God, still finds himself uneasy and out of temper: 1. He complains to God of his continual struggle with his persecutors, ver. 10; 2. God assures him that he shall be taken under special protection, though there was a general desolation coming upon the land, ver. 11—14; 3. He appeals to God concerning his sincerity in the discharge of his prophetical office, and thinks it hard he should not have more of the comfort of it, ver. 15—18; 4. Fresh security is given him that, upon condition he continue faithful, God will continue his care of him, and his favour to him, ver. 19—21. And thus, at length, we hope he regained the possession of his own soul.

THEN said the LORD unto me,
Though Moses and Samuel stood before me,
Yet my mind could not be toward this people:
Cast them out of my sight, and let them go forth.
2 And it shall come to pass,
If they say unto thee, Whither shall we go forth?
Then thou shalt tell them, Thus saith the LORD;
Such as are for death, to death;
And such as are for the sword, to the sword;
And such as are for the famine, to the famine;
And such as are for the captivity, to the captivity.
3 And I will appoint over them four kinds, saith the LORD:
The sword to slay, and the dogs to tear,
And the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the earth,
To devour and destroy.
4 And I will cause them to be removed into all kingdoms of the earth,
Because of Manasseh the son of Hezekiah king of Judah,
For that which he did in Jerusalem.
5 For who shall have pity upon thee, O Jerusalem?
Or who shall bemoan thee?
Or who shall go aside to ask how thou doest?
6 Thou hast forsaken me, saith the LORD,
Thou art gone backward: [destroy thee;
Therefore will I stretch out my hand against thee, and
I am weary with repenting.
7 And I will fan them with a fan in the gates of the land;
I will bereave them of children, I will destroy my people,
Since they return not from their ways. [seas:
8 Their widows are increased to me above the sand of the
I have brought upon them against the mother of the young man a spoiler at noonday:
I have caused him to fall upon it suddenly, and terrors upon the city.
9 She that hath borne seven languisheth:
She hath given up the ghost;
Her sun is gone down while it was yet day:
She hath been ashamed and confounded:
And the residue of them will I deliver to the sword
Before their enemies, saith the LORD.

We scarce find anywhere more pathetical expressions of Divine wrath against a provoking people than we have here in these verses. The prophet had prayed earnestly for them, and found some among them to join with him; and yet not so much as a reprieve was gained, or the least mitigation of the judgment; but this answer is given to the prophet's prayers, that the decree was gone forth, was irreversible, and would shortly be executed. Observe here,

First. What the sin was upon which this severe sentence was grounded. 1. It is in remembrance of a former iniquity; it is because of Manasseh, for that which he did in Jerusalem, ver. 4. What that was we are told, and that it was for that that Jerusalem was destroyed, 1 Kin. xxiv. 3, 4. It was for his idolatry, and "the innocent blood which he shed, which the Lord would not pardon." He is called the son of Hezekiah, because his relation to so good a father was a great aggravation of his sin, so far was it from being an excuse of it. The greatest part of a generation was worn off since Manasseh's time, yet his sin is brought into that account; as in Jerusalem's last ruin God brought upon it all the righteous blood shed on the earth, to shew how heavy the guilt of blood will light and lie somewhere, sooner or later, and that reprieves are not pardons. 2. It is in consideration of their present impenitency. See how their sin is described; ver. 6, "Thou hast forsaken me," my service, and thy duty to me; "Thou art gone backward," into the ways of contradiction, art become the reverse of what thou shouldest have been, and of what God by his law would have led thee forward to; and see how the impenitency is described, ver. 7, "They return not from their ways," the ways of their own hearts, into the ways of God's commandments again. There is mercy for those who have turned aside, if they will return. But what favour can they expect that persist in their apostacy?

Secondly. What the sentence is. It is such as speaks no less than an utter ruin.

1. God himself abandons and abhors them; "My mind cannot be towards them." How can it be thought that the holy God should have any remaining complacency in those that have such a rooted antipathy to him. It is not in a passion, but with a just and holy indignation, that he saith, "Cast them out of my sight," as that which is in the highest degree odious and offensive; "and let them go forth," for I will be troubled with them no more.

2. He will not admit any intercession to be made for them, ver. 1. "Though Moses and Samuel stood before me," by prayer or sacrifice to reconcile me to them, yet I could not be prevailed with to admit them into favour. Moses and Samuel were two as great favourites of Heaven as ever were the blessings of this earth, and were particularly famed for the success of their mediation between God and his offending people. Many a time they had been destroyed if Moses had not stood before him in the breach; and to Samuel's prayers they owe their lives, 1 Sam. xii. 19; yet even their intercessions should not prevail, no, not though they were now in a state of perfection, much less Jeremiah's, who was a man now subject to like passions as others. The putting of this as a case, Though they should stand before me, supposeth that they do not, and is an intimation that saints in heaven are not intercessors for saints on earth. It is the prerogative of the eternal Word to be the only mediator in the other world, whatever Moses, and Samuel, and others, were in this.

3. He condemns them all to one destroying judgment or other. When God casts them out of his presence, "Whither shall they go forth?" ver. 2. Certainly no whither to be safe or easy; but to be met by one judgment while they are pursued by another, till they find themselves surrounded with mischiefs on all hands, so that they cannot escape. "Such as are for death, to death;" by death here is meant the pestilence, Rev. vi. 8, for it is death without visible means. Those that "are for death to death," or "for the sword to the sword," that is, every man shall perish in that way that God hath appointed. The law that appoints the malefactor's death determines what death he shall die; or, he that is by his own choice for this judgment, let him take it, or for that, let him take it, but by the one or the other they shall all fall, and none shall escape. It is a choice like that which David was put to, and was thereby put into a great strait, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. Captivity is mentioned last, some think because the sorest judgment of all; it being both a complication and continuance of miseries. That of the sword is again repeated, ver. 3, and is made the first of another four frightful set of destroyers, which God will appoint over them; as officers over the soldiers, to do what they please with them. As those that escape the sword, yet shall be cut off by pestilence, famine, or captivity, so those that fall by the sword, yet Divine vengeance has not done with them, that pursues sinners on the other side of death. There shall be dogs to tear in the city, and fowls of the air, and wild beasts in the field to devour. And if there be any that think to outrun justice they shall be made the most public monuments of it: "They shall be removed into all kingdoms of the earth," ver. 1, like Cain, who, that he might be made a spectacle of horror to all, became a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth.

4. They shall fall without being relieved. Who can do any thing to help them when, 1st. God, even their own God, (so he had been,) appears against them? "I will stretch out my hand against thee," which notes a deliberate, determined stroke, which will reach far, and wound deep; ver. 6, "I am weary with repenting." It is a strange expression. They had carried themselves so provokingly, especially by their treacherous professions of repentance, that they had put even infinite patience itself to the stretch. God had oftentimes turned away his wrath, when it was ready to break forth against them, but now he will grant no more reprieves. Miserable is the case of those who have sinned so long against God's mercy, that at length they have sinned it away. 2nd. Their own country expels them, and is ready to spew them out, as it had done the Canaanites that were before them; for so it was threatened, Lev. xviii. 28, "I will fan them with a fan in the gates of the land," in their own gates, through which they shall be scattered; or "into the gates of the earth," that is, into the cities of all the nations about them. 3rd. Their own children, that should assist them when they speak with the enemy in the gate, shall be cut off from them, ver. 7, "I will bereave them of children," so that they shall have little hopes that the next generation will retrieve their affairs, for "I will destroy my people," and when the inhabitants are slain the land will soon be desolate. This melancholy article is enlarged upon, ver. 8, 9, where we have,

First. The destroyer brought upon them. When God has bloody work to do, he will find out bloody instruments to do it with. Nebuchadnezzar is here called, "a spoiler at noonday," not a thief in the night, that is afraid of being discovered, but one that without fear shall break through and destroy all the fences of rights and properties, and this in the face of the sun, and defiance of its light. 'I have brought against the mother a young man, a spoiler,' so some read it; for Nebuchadnezzar, when he first invaded Judah, was but a young man, in the first year of his reign. We read it, "I have brought upon them, even against the mother of the young men, a spoiler," that is, against Jerusalem, a mother city, that had a very numerous family of young men. Or, that invasion was in a particular manner terrible to those mothers who had many sons fit for war, who must now jeopard their lives in the high places of the field; and, being an unequal match for the enemy, would be likely to fall there, to the inexpressible grief of their poor mothers that had nursed them up with a deal of tenderness. And the same God that brought the spoiler upon them caused him to fall upon it, that is, upon the spoil delivered to him, suddenly, and by surprise, and then terrors come upon the city. The original is very abrupt, 'The city and terrors; O the city,' what a consternation will it then be in! O the terrors that shall then seize it! Then the city and terrors shall be brought together, that seemed at a distance from each other. 'I will cause to fall suddenly upon her' (that is, upon Jerusalem,) 'a watcher and terrors,' so Mr. Gataker reads it, for the word is used for a watcher, Dan. iv. 13, 23, and the Chaldean soldiers were called watchers, ch. iv. 16.

Secondly. The destruction made by this destroyer. A dreadful slaughter is here described. 1*st.* The wives are deprived of their husbands; "their widows are increased above the sand of the seas," so numerous are they now grown. It was promised that the men of Israel (for those only were numbered) should be as the sand of the sea for multitude, but now they shall be all cut off, and their widows shall be so. But observe, God saith, "They are increased to me." Though the husbands were cut off by the sword of his justice, their poor widows were gathered in the arms of his mercy, who has taken it among the titles of his honour to be the God of the widows. Widows are said to be taken into the number, the number of those whom God has a particular compassion and concern for. 2nd. The parents are deprived of their children. "She that has borne seven" sons, whom she expected to be the support and joy of her age now "languisheth" when she hath seen them all cut off by the sword in one day who had been many years her burthen and care. "She that had many children is waxen feeble," 1 Sam. ii. 5. See what uncertain comforts children are, and let us therefore rejoice in them, as though we rejoiced not. When the children are slain, the mother gives up the ghost, for her life was bound up in theirs; "Her sun is gone down while it was yet day;" she is bereaved of all her comforts then when she thought herself in the midst of the enjoyment of them. She is now ashamed and confounded to think how proud she had been of her sons, how fond of them, and how much she promised herself from them. Some understand by this languishing mother, Jerusalem lamenting the death of her inhabitants, as passionately as ever poor mother bewailed her children. Many are cut off already, and the residue of them, who have yet escaped, and it was hoped were reserved to be the seed of another generation, even them will I deliver to the sword before their enemies, as the condemned malefactor is delivered to the sheriff to be executed, saith the Lord, the judge of heaven and earth, who we are sure herein judgeth right, though the judgment seem severe.

5. They shall fall without being pitied; ver. 5, "For who shall have pity on thee, O Jerusalem?" When thy God hath cast thee out of his sight, and his compassions fail and are shut up from thee, neither thine enemies nor thy friends shall have any compassion for thee. They shall have no sympathy with thee, they shall not bemoan thee, or be sorry for thee, shall have no concern for thee, shall not go a step out of their way to ask how thou dost. For, 1st. Their friends who were expected to do these friendly offices, were all involved with them in the calamities, and had enough to do to bemoan themselves. 2nd. It was plain to all their neighbours that they had brought all this misery upon themselves by their obstinacy in sin, and they might easily have prevented it by repentance and reformation, which they were often in vain called to; and therefore "who can pity them? O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself." Those will perish for ever unpitied, that might have been saved upon such easy terms, and would not. 3rd. God will thus complete their misery; he will set their acquaintance, as he did Job's, at a distance from them. And his hand, his righteous hand, is to be acknowledged in all the unkindnesses of our friends, as well as in all the injuries done us by our foes.

10 Woe is me, my mother,
That thou hast borne me a man of strife
And a man of contention to the whole earth!
I have neither lent on usury, nor men have lent to me
Yet every one of them doth curse me. [on usury;
11 The LORD said, Verily it shall be well with thy remnant;
Verily I will cause the enemy to entreat thee well
In the time of evil and in the time of affliction.
12 Shall iron break the northern iron and the steel?
13 Thy substance and thy treasures will I give to the spoil
Without price, and that for all thy sins, even in all thy borders.
14 And I will make thee to pass with thine enemies
Into a land which thou knowest not: [upon you.
For a fire is kindled in mine anger, which shall burn

Jeremiah is now returned from his public work, and is retired into his closet. What passed between him and his God there we have an account of in these and the following verses, which he published afterwards to affect the people with the weight and importance of his messages to them. Here is,

First. The complaint which the prophet makes to God of the many discouragements he met with in his work, ver. 10.

1. He met with a great deal of contradiction and opposition. He was "a man of strife and contention to the whole land," so it might be read, rather than to "the whole earth," for his business lay only in that land; both city and country quarrelled with him, and set themselves against him, and said and did all they could to thwart him. He was a peaceable man, gave no provocation to any, nor was apt to resent the provocations given him, and yet a man of strife, that is, not a man striving, but a man striven with; he was for peace, but when he spake they were for war. And, whatever they pretended, that which was the real cause of their quarrels with them was his faithfulness to God and to their souls. He shewed them their sins that were working their ruin, and put them into a way to prevent that ruin, which was the greatest kindness he could do them; and yet this was it for which they were incensed against him, and looked upon him as their enemy. Even the Prince of Peace himself was thus a man of strife, a sign spoken against, continually enduring the contradiction of sinners against himself; and the Gospel of peace brings division, even to fire and sword, Mat. x. 34, 35; Lu. xii. 49, 51. Now this made Jeremiah very uneasy, even to a degree of impatience. He cried out, "Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me;" as if it were his mother's fault that she bore him, and he had better never have been born, than be born to such an uncomfortable life; nay, he is angry that she had born him a man of strife, as if he had been fatally determined to this by the stars that were in the ascendant at his birth. If he had any meaning of this kind, doubtless it was very much his infirmity; we rather hope it was intended for no more but a pathetical lamentation of his own case.

Note, 1st. Even those who are most quiet and peaceable, yet, if they serve God faithfully, are often made men of strife. We can but follow peace, have the making only of one side of the bargain, and therefore can but, as much as in us lies, live peaceably. 2nd. It is very uncomfortable to those who are of a peaceable disposition to live among those that are continually picking quarrels with them. 3rd. Yet, if we cannot live so peaceably as we desire with our neighbours, we must not be so disturbed at it as thereby to lose the repose of our own minds, and put ourselves upon the fret.

2. He met with a great deal of contempt, contumely, and reproach. They every one of them cursed him; they branded him as a turbulent, factious man, as an incendiary, and a sower of discord and sedition. They ought to have blessed him, and to have blessed God for him; but they were arrived to such a pitch of enmity against God and his word, that for his sake they cursed his messenger, spoke ill of him, wished ill to him, did all they could to make him odious: they all did so; he had scarce one friend in Judah or Jerusalem that would give him a good word. Note, It is often the lot of the best of men to be put under the worst of characters; "So persecuted they the prophets." But one would be apt to suspect, that surely Jeremiah had given them some provocation, else he could not have lost himself thus; No, not the least, I have neither lent money nor borrowed money, have been neither creditor nor debtor, for so general is the signification of the words here. 1st. It is implied here, that those who deal much in the business of this world, are often involved thereby in strife and contention; meum et tuum,—'mine and thine,' are the great makebates; lenders and borrowers sue and are sued, and great dealers often get a deal of ill will. 2nd. It was an instance of Jeremiah's great prudence, and is written for our learning, that being called to be a prophet, he entangled not himself in the affairs of this life, but kept clear from them, that he might apply himself the more closely to the business of his profession, and might not give the least umbrage of suspicion that he aimed at secular advantages in it, nor any occasion to his neighbours to contend with him. He put out no money, for he was no usurer, nor, indeed, had any money to lend; he took up no money, for he was no purchaser, nor merchant, no spendthrift. He was perfectly dead to this world, and the things of it; a very little served to keep him; and we find, ch. xvi. 2, he had neither wife nor children to keep. And yet, 3rd. Though he carried himself thus discreetly, and so as one would have thought should have gained him a universal esteem, yet he lay under a general odium, through the iniquity of the times. Blessed be God, as bad as things are with us, they are not so bad but there are those with whom virtue has its praise; yet let not those who carry themselves most prudently think it strange if they have not the respect and esteem they deserve. "Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you."

Secondly. The answer which God gave to this complaint. Though there was in it a mixture of passion and infirmity, yet God graciously took cognizance of it, because it was for his sake that the prophet suffered reproach. In this answer,

1. God assures him that he should weather the storm, and be made easy at last, ver. 11. Though his neighbours quarrelled with him for what he did in the discharge of his office, yet God accepted him, and promised to stand by him. And it is in the original expressed in the form of an oath, If I take not care of thee, let me never be counted faithful; "Verily, it shall go well with thy remnant," that is, with the remainder of thy life, for so the word signifies. The residue of thy days shall be more comfortable to thee than those hitherto have been. 'Thy end shall be good,' so the Chaldee reads it. Note, It is a great and sufficient support to the people of God, that, how troublesome soever their way may be, it shall be well with them in their latter end, Ps. xxxvii. 37. They have still a remnant, a residue, something behind, and left in reserve, which will be sufficient to balance all their grievances, and the hope of it to make them easy. It should seem Jeremiah, besides the vexation that his people gave him, was uneasy at the apprehension he had of sharing largely in the public judgments which he foresaw coming; and though he mentioned not this, God replied to his thought of it, as to Moses, Ex. iv. 19. Jeremiah thought, if his friends were thus abusive to him, what would his enemies be? And God had thought fit to awaken in him an expectation of this kind, ch. xii. 5; but here he quiets his mind with this promise, "Verily, I will cause the enemy to entreat thee well in the time of evil," when all about thee shall be laid waste. Note, God has all men's hearts in his hands, and can turn those to favour his servants whom they were most afraid of. And the prophets of the Lord have often met with fairer and better treatment among open enemies than among those that call themselves his people. When we see trouble coming, and it looks very threatening, yet let us not despair, but hope in God, because it may prove better than likely. This promise was accomplished, when Nebuchadnezzar having taken the city charged the captain of the guard to be kind to Jeremiah, and let him have every thing he had a mind to, ch. xxxix. 11, 12. The following words, ver. 12, "Shall common iron break the northern iron and the steel?" or brass, being compared with the promise God made to Jeremiah, ch. i. 18, that he would make him an iron-pillar and brazen walls, seem intended for his comfort. They were continually clashing with him, and were rough and hard as iron, but Jeremiah, being armed with power and courage from on high, is as northern iron, which is naturally stronger, and as steel, which is hardened by art, and therefore they shall not prevail against him; compare this with Eze. ii. 6, and iii. 8, 9. And he might the better bear their quarrelling with him when he was sure of the victory.

2. God assures him that his enemies and persecutors should be lost in the storm, should be ruined at last; and therein the word of God in his mouth should be accomplished, and he should be proved a true prophet, ver. 13, 14. God here turns his speech from the prophet to the people; and to them also ver. 12 may be applied, "Shall iron break the northern iron and the steel?" Shall their courage and strength, and the most hardy and vigorous of their efforts, be able to contest either with the counsel of God or with the army of the Chaldeans, which are as inflexible, as invincible, as the northern iron and the steel? Let them therefore hear their doom: "Thy substance and thy treasure will I give to the spoil," and that "without price;" the spoilers shall have it gratis, it shall be to them a cheap and easy prey. Observe, The prophet was poor, he neither lent nor borrowed, he had nothing to lose, neither substance nor treasure, and therefore the enemy will treat him well; cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator,—'the traveller that has no property about him, will congratulate himself when accosted by a robber.' But the people that had great estates in money and land would be slain for what they had, or the enemy, finding they had much, would use them hardly to make them confess more. And it is their own iniquity that herein corrects them; It is "for all thy sins, even in all thy borders;" all parts of the country, even those which lay most remote, had contributed to the national guilt, and all shall now be brought to account. Let not one tribe lay the blame upon another, but each take shame to themselves; It is "for all thy sins in all thy borders." Thus shall they stay at home till they see their estates ruined, and then they shall be carried into captivity, to spend the sad remains of a miserable life in slavery: "I will make thee to pass with thine enemies," that shall lead thee in triumph, "into a land that thou knowest not," and therefore canst expect to find no comfort in it. And all this is the fruit of God's wrath; It is "a fire kindled in mine anger, which shall burn upon you," and if not extinguished in time will burn eternally.

15 O LORD, thou knowest: remember me,
And visit me, and revenge me of my persecutors;
Take me not away in thy longsuffering:
Know that for thy sake I have suffered rebuke.
16 Thy words were found, and I did eat them; [heart:
And thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine
For I am called by thy name, O LORD God of hosts.
17 I sat not in the assembly of the mockers, nor rejoiced;
I sat alone because of thy hand:
For thou hast filled me with indignation.
18 Why is my pain perpetual,
And my wound incurable, which refuseth to be healed?
Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar,
And as waters that fail?
19 Therefore thus saith the LORD,
If thou return, then will I bring thee again,
And thou shalt stand before me:
And if thou take forth the precious from the vile,
Thou shalt be as my mouth:
Let them return unto thee;
But return not thou unto them. [wall:
20 And I will make thee unto this people a fenced brasen
And they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee:
For I am with thee to save thee
And to deliver thee, saith the LORD.
21 And I will deliver thee out of the hand of the wicked,
And I will redeem thee out of the hand of the terrible.

Here, as before, we have,

First. The prophet's humble address to God, containing a remonstrance both of his integrity and of the hardships he underwent notwithstanding. It is matter of comfort to us that, whatever ails us, we have a God to go to, before whom we may spread our case, and to whose omniscience we may appeal, as the prophet here, "O Lord, thou knowest." Thou dost know my sincerity, which men are resolved they will not acknowledge; thou dost know my distress, which men disdain to take notice of. Observe here,

1. What is it that the prophet prays for, ver. 15. 1st. That God would consider his case, and be mindful of him. "O Lord, remember me." Think upon me for good, 2nd. That God would communicate strength and comfort to him; Visit me, not only remember me, but let me know that thou rememberest me, that thou art nigh unto me. 3rd. That he would appear for him, against those that did him wrong, "Revenge me of my persecutors;" or rather, 'vindicate me from my persecutors.' Give judgment against them, and let thy judgment be executed so far as is necessary for my vindication, and to compel them to acknowledge that they have done me wrong; and farther a good man will not desire that God would revenge him. Let something be done to convince the world, that (whatever blasphemers say to the contrary) Jeremiah is a righteous man, and the God whom he serves is a righteous God. 4th. That he would yet spare him and continue him in the land of the living; Take me not away by a sudden stroke, but in thy longsuffering lengthen out my days. The best men will own themselves so obnoxious to God's wrath, that they are indebted to his patience for the continuance of their lives. Or, while thou exercisest long suffering towards my persecutors, let not them prevail to take me away. Though in a passion he complained of his birth, ver. 10; yet he desires here that his death might not be hastened; for life is sweet to nature; the life of a useful man is so to grace, "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world."

2. What it is that he pleads with God for mercy and relief against his enemies, persecutors, and slanderers.

1st. That God's honour was interested in his case. "Know," and make it known, "that for thy sake I have suffered rebuke." Those that lay themselves open to reproach by their own fault and folly have great reason to bear it patiently, but no reason to expect that God should appear for them; but if it is for doing well that we suffer ill, and for righteousness' sake that we have all manner of evil said against us, we may hope that God will vindicate our honour with his own. To the same purpose, ver. 16, "I am called by thy name, O Lord of hosts;" it was for that reason that his enemies hated him, and therefore for that reason he promised himself that God would own him, and stand by him.

2nd. That the word of God which he was employed to preach to others he had experienced the power and pleasure of in his own soul, and therefore had the graces of the Spirit to qualify him for the Divine favour, as well as his gifts. We find some rejected of God, who yet could say, "Lord, we have prophesied in thy name." But Jeremiah could say more, ver. 16, "Thy words were found" by me. He searched the Scriptures, diligently studied the law, and found that in it which was reviving to him; if we seek we shall find. Found for me; the words which he was to deliver to others were laid ready to his hand, were brought to him by inspiration; "and I did," not only taste them, but "eat them," received them entirely, conversed with them intimately, they were welcome to me, as food to one that is hungry. I entertained them, digested them, turned them in succum et sanguinem,—'into blood and spirits,' and was myself delivered into the mould of those truths which I was to deliver to others. The prophet was bidden to eat the roll, Eze. ii. 8; Rev. x. 9. "I did eat it," that is, as it follows, "it was to me the joy and rejoicing of my heart," nothing could be more agreeable. Understand it, First. Of the message itself he was to deliver. Though he was to foretell the ruin of his country, which was dear to him, and in the ruin of which he could not but have a deep share, yet all natural affections were swallowed up in zeal for God's glory; and even these messages of wrath, being Divine messages, were a satisfaction to him. He also rejoiced at first in hope that the people would take warning, and prevent the judgment. Or, Secondly. Of the commission he received to deliver this message. Though the work he was called to was not attended with any secular advantages, but, on the contrary, exposed him to contempt and persecution, yet, because it put him in a way to serve God, and do good, he took pleasure in it, was glad to be so employed; and it was his meat and drink to do the will of him that sent him, Jno. iv. 34. Or, Thirdly. Of the promise God gave him, that he would assist and own him in his work, ch. i. 8; he was satisfied in that, and depended upon it, and therefore hoped it should not fail him.

3rd. That he had applied himself to the discharge of his office with all possible gravity, and seriousness, and self-denial, though he had had of late but little satisfaction in it, ver. 17. First. It is his comfort that he had given up himself wholly to the business of his office, and had done nothing disagreeable to it; nothing either to divert himself from it, or disfit himself for it. He kept no unsuitable company; denied himself the use even of lawful recreations, abstained from every thing that looked like levity, lest thereby he should make himself mean, and less regarded. He sat alone, spent a deal of time in his closet, because of the hand of the Lord that was strong upon him to carry him on in his work; Eze. iii. 14, "For thou hast filled me with indignation," with such messages of wrath against this people as have made me always pensive. Note, It will be a comfort to God's ministers, when men despise them, if they have the testimonies of their consciences for them, that they have not by any vain foolish carriage made themselves despicable; that they have been dead not only to the wealth of the world, as this prophet was, ver. 10, but to the pleasures of it too, as here. But, Secondly. It is his complaint that he had had but little pleasure in his work. It was at first the rejoicing of his heart, but of late it had made him melancholy; so that he had no heart to sit in the meeting of those that make merry. He cared not for company, for indeed no company cared for him; he sat alone, fretting at the people's obstinacy, and the little success of his labours among them; this filled him with a holy indignation. Note, It is the folly and infirmity of some good people, that they lose much of the pleasantness of their religion by the fretfulness and uneasiness of their natural temper, which they humour and indulge, instead of mortifying it.

4th. He throws himself upon God's pity and promise in a very passionate expostulation; ver. 18, "Why is my pain perpetual," and nothing done to ease it? the wounds which my enemies are continually giving, both to my peace and to my reputation, incurable, and nothing done to retrieve either my comfort or my credit? I once little thought I should have been thus neglected; will the God that has promised me his presence "be to me as a liar?" The God on whom I depend, be to me "as waters that fail?" We are willing to make the best we can of it, and to take it as an appeal, First. To the mercy of God; I know he will not let the pain of his servant be perpetual, but he will ease it, will not let his wound be incurable, but he will heal it; and therefore I will not despair. Secondly. To his faithfulness, "Wilt thou be to me as a liar?" No, I know thou wilt not; God is not a man that he should lie. The fountain of life will never be to his people "as waters that fail."

Secondly. God's gracious answer to this address, ver. 19—21. Though the prophet betrayed much human frailty in his address, yet God vouchsafed to answer him with good words and comfortable words, for he knows our frame. Observe,

1. What God here requires of him as the condition of the farther favours he designed him. Jeremiah had done and suffered much for God, yet God is no debtor to him, but he is still upon his good behaviour. God will own him, But,

1st. He must recover his temper, and be reconciled to his work, and friends with it again, and not quarrel with it any more as he had done. He must return; must shake off these distrustful discontented thoughts and passions, and not give way to them; must regain the peaceable possession and enjoyment of himself, and resolve to be easy. Note, When we have stepped aside into any disagreeable frame or way, our care must be to return, and compose ourselves into a right temper of mind again; and then we may expect God will help us, if thus we endeavour to help ourselves.

2nd. He must resolve to be faithful in his work; for he could not any longer expect the Divine protection than he did approve himself so. Though there was no cause at all to charge Jeremiah with unfaithfulness, and God knew his heart to be sincere, yet God saw fit to give him this caution. Those that do their duty must not take it ill to be told their duty. In two things he must be faithful: First. He must distinguish between some and others of those he preached to. Thou must "take forth the precious from the vile." The righteous are the precious, be they never so mean and poor; the wicked are the vile, be they never so rich and great. In our congregations these are mixed, wheat and chaff in the same floor. We cannot distinguish them by name, but we must by character, and must give to each their portion, speaking comfort to precious saints, and terror to vile sinners; neither making the heart of the righteous sad, nor strengthening the hands of the wicked, Eze. xiii. 27, but rightly dividing the word of truth. Ministers must take those whom they see to be precious into their bosoms, and not sit alone as Jeremiah did; but keep up conversation with those they may do good to, and get good by. Secondly. He must closely adhere to his instructions, and not in the least vary from them, "Let them return to thee, but return not thou to them." That is, he must do the utmost he can in his preaching to bring people up to the mind of God; tell them they must at their peril comply with that. They that had flown off from him, that did not like the terms upon which God's favour was offered to them, "let them return to thee," and, upon second thoughts, come up to the terms, and strike the bargain. But "do not thou return to them," do not compliment them, or comply with them, nor think to make the matter easier to them than the word of God has made it. Men's hearts and lives must come up to God's law, and comply with that, for God's law will never come down to them, or comply with them.

2. What he here promiseth him upon the performance of these conditions. If he approve himself well,

1st. God will quiet his mind, and pacify the present tumult of his spirits. "If thou return, I will bring thee again;" will restore thy soul, as Ps. xxiii. 3. The best and strongest saints, if at any time they have gone aside out of the right way, and are determined to return, yet need the grace of God to bring them again.

2nd. God will employ him in his service as a prophet; work, which even in those bad times, had comfort and honour enough in it to be its own wages; "Thou shalt stand before me," to receive instructions from me, as a servant from his master, "and thou shalt be as my mouth," to deliver my messages to the people; as an ambassador is the mouth of the prince that sends him. Note, Faithful ministers are God's mouth to us; they are so to look upon themselves, and to speak God's mind, and as becomes the oracles of God; and we are so to look upon them, and to hear God speaking to us by them. Observe, If thou keep close to thine instructions, "thou shall be as my mouth," not otherwise. So far, and no farther, God will stand by ministers, as they go by the written word; "Thou shalt be as my mouth," that is, what thou sayest shall be made good, as if I myself had said it: see Isa. xliv. 26; 1 Sam. iii. 19.

3rd. He shall have strength and courage to face the many difficulties he meets with in his work, and his spirit shall not fail again as now it doth; ver. 20, "I will make thee unto this people as a fenced brazen wall," which the storm batters, and beats violently upon, but cannot shake; "Return not thou to them," by any sinful compliances, and then trust thy God to arm thee by his grace with holy resolutions. Be not sneaking, and God will make thee daring. He had complained that he was made a man of strife; Expect that, saith God; "they shall fight against thee," they will still continue their opposition, "but they shall not prevail against thee," to drive thee off from thy work, or to cut thee off from the land of the living.

4th. He shall have God for his protector and mighty deliverer; "I am with thee to save thee." Those that have God with them have a Saviour with them, who hath wisdom and strength enough to deal with the most formidable enemy; and those that are with God, and faithful to him, he will deliver them, ver. 21, either from trouble or through it. They may perhaps fall into the hand of the wicked, and they may appear terrible to them; but God will rescue them out of their hands. They shall not be able to kill them, till they have finished their testimony; they shall not prevent their happiness. God will so deliver them, as to preserve them to his heavenly kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 18; and that is deliverance enough. There are many things that appear very frightful that yet do not prove at all hurtful to a good man.

CHAPTER XVI.

In this chapter, I. The greatness of the calamity that was coming upon the Jewish nation is illustrated by prohibitions given to the prophet, neither to set up a house of his own, ver. 1—4, nor to go into the house of mourning, ver. 5—7, nor into the house of feasting, ver. 8, 9. II. God is justified in these severe proceedings against them, by an account of their great wickedness, ver. 10—13. III. An intimation is given of mercy in reserve, ver. 14, 15. IV. Some hopes are given that the punishment of the sin should prove the reformation of the sinners, and that they should return to God at length in a way of duty, and so be qualified for his returns to them in a way of favour, ver. 14—21.

THE word of the LORD came also unto me, saying,
2 Thou shalt not take thee a wife,
Neither shalt thou have sons or daughters in this place.
3 For thus saith the LORD
Concerning the sons and concerning the daughters that are born in this place,
And concerning their mothers that bare them,
And concerning their fathers that begat them in this land;
4 They shall die of grievous deaths;
They shall not be lamented; neither shall they be buried;
But they shall be as dung upon the face of the earth:
And they shall be consumed by the sword, and by famine;
And their carcases shall be meat
For the fowls of heaven, and for the beasts of the earth.
5 For thus saith the LORD,
Enter not into the house of mourning,
Neither go to lament nor bemoan them:
For I have taken away my peace from this people, saith the LORD,
Even lovingkindness and mercies.
6 Both the great and the small shall die in this land:
They shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them,
Nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them:
7 Neither shall men tear themselves for them in mourning,
To comfort them for the dead;
Neither shall men give them the cup of consolation to drink
For their father or for their mother.

CUP OF CONSOLATION AT A FUNERAL FEAST.

8 Thou shalt not also go into the house of feasting,
To sit with them to eat and to drink.
9 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Behold, I will cause to cease out of this place
In your eyes, and in your days,

The voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride.

The prophet is here for a sign to the people; they would not regard what he said, let it be tried whether they will regard what he doth. In general, he must carry himself so in every thing as became one that expected to see his country in ruins very shortly. This he foretold, but few regarded the prediction; therefore he is to shew that he is himself fully satisfied in the truth of it. Others go on in their usual course; but he, in the prospect of these sad times is forbidden, and therefore forbears, marriage, mourning for the dead, and mirth. Note, Those that would convince others of, and affect them with, the word of God, must make it appear, even in the most self-denying instances, that they do believe it themselves, and are affected with it. Would we rouse others out of their security, and persuade them to sit loose to the world, we must ourselves be mortified to present things, and shew that we expect the dissolution of them.

First. Jeremiah must not marry, nor think of having a family, and being a housekeeper; ver. 2, "Thou shalt not take thee a wife," nor think of having "sons and daughters in this place;" not in the land of Judah, not in Jerusalem, not in Anathoth. The Jews, more than any people, valued themselves by their early marrying and their numerous offspring; but Jeremiah must live a bachelor, not so much in honour of virginity, as in diminution of it; by this it appears, that it was advisable and seasonable only in calamitous times, and times of present distress, 1 Cor. vii. 26; that it is so, is a part of the calamity. There may be a time when it will be said, "Blessed is the womb that bare not," Lu. xxiii. 29; and when we see such times at hand it is wisdom for all, especially for prophets, to keep themselves as much as may be from being "entangled with the affairs of this life," and encumbered with that which, the dearer it is to them, the more it will be the matter of their care, and fear, and grief at such a time. The reason here given is, because the fathers and mothers, the sons and the daughters, shall die of grievous deaths, ver. 3, 4; and those that have wives and children, 1. They will have such a clog upon them, that they cannot flee from those deaths. A single man may make his escape, and shift for his own safety, when he that has a wife and children can neither find means to convey them with him nor find in his heart to go and leave them behind him. 2. They will be in continual terror for fear of those deaths, and the more they have to lose by them the greater will the terror and consternation be, when death appears every where in its triumphant pomp and power. 3. The death of every child, and the aggravating circumstances of it, will be a new death to the patient. Better have no children, than have them brought forth and bred up for the murderer, Hos. ix. 13, 14, than see them live and die in misery. Death is grievous, but some deaths are more grievous than others, both to them that die, and to their relations that survive them; hence we read of "so great a death," 2 Cor. i. 10. Two things are used a little to palliate and alleviate the terror of death, as to this world, and to sugar the bitter pill, bewailing the dead, and burying them; but to make those deaths grievous indeed, these are denied; "They shall not be lamented," but shall be carried off, as if all the world were weary of them; nay, they shall "not be buried," but left exposed, as if they were designed to be monuments of justice. "They shall be as dung upon the face of the earth," not only despicable but detestable, as if they were good for nothing but to muck the ground; and being consumed, some by the sword, and some by famine, "their carcases shall be meat for the fowls of heaven, and the beasts of the earth." Will not any one say, better be without children than live to see them come to this. What reason have we to say, that all is vanity and vexation of spirit, when those creatures that we expect should be our greatest comforts may prove not only our heaviest cares, but our sorest crosses!

Secondly. Jeremiah must not go to the house of mourning upon occasion of the death of any of his neighbours or relations; ver. 5, "Enter thou not into the house of mourning." It was usual to condole those whose relations were dead, to bemoan them, to cut themselves, and make themselves bald, which it seems was commonly practised as an expression of mourning, though forbidden by the law, Deu. xiv. 1; nay, sometimes they did in a passion of grief tear themselves for them, ver. 6, 7, partly in honour of the deceased, (thus signifying that they thought there was a great loss of them,) and partly in compassion to the surviving relations, to whom the burthen will be made the lighter by their having sharers with them in their grief. They used to mourn with them, and so to comfort them for the dead, as Job's friends with him, and the Jews with Martha and Mary; and it was a friendly office to give them a cup of consolation to drink, to provide cordials for them, and press them earnestly to drink of them, for the support of their spirits, give wine to them that are of heavy heart, for their father or mother, that it may be some comfort to them to find that, though they have lost their parents, yet they have some friends left that have a concern for them. Thus the usage stood, and it was a laudable usage; it is a good work to others, as well as of good use to ourselves, to go to the house of mourning. It seems the prophet Jeremiah had been wont to abound in good offices of this kind, and it well became his character, both as a pious man and as a prophet; and one would think it should have made him better beloved among his people than it should seem he was. But now God bids him not lament the death of his friends as usual, for, 1. His sorrow for the destruction of his country in general must swallow up his sorrow for particular deaths. His tears must now be turned into another channel, and there is occasion enough for them all. 2. He had little reason to lament those who died now just before the judgments entered, which he saw at the door, but rather to think them happy who were seasonably taken away from the evil to come. 3. This was to be a type of what was coming, when there should be such an universal confusion, that all neighbourly, friendly offices should be neglected. Men shall be in deaths so often, and even dying daily, that they shall have no time, no room, no heart for the ceremonies that used to attend deaths; the sorrows shall be so ponderous as not to admit relief; and every one so full of grief for his own troubles that he shall have no thoughts of his neighbour's. All shall be mourners then, and no comforters; every one will find it enough to bear his own burthen; for, ver. 5, "I have taken away my peace from this people," that is, put a full period to their prosperity, deprived them of health, and wealth, and quiet, and friends, and every thing wherewith they might comfort themselves and one another. Whatever peace we enjoy, it is God's peace, it is his gift, and if he give quietness who then can make trouble? But if we make not a good use of his peace, he can and will take it away, and where are we then? Job xxxiv. 29. I will take "away my peace, even my lovingkindness and mercies," these shall be shut up and restrained, which are the fresh springs from which all their fresh streams flow, and then farewell all good. Note, Those have cut themselves off from all true peace that have thrown themselves out of the favour of God. All is gone when God takes away from us his lovingkindness and his mercies. Then it follows, ver. 6, "Both the great and the small shall die," even "in this land," the land of Canaan, that used to be called the land of the living. God's favour is our life; take away that, and we die, we perish, we all perish.

Thirdly. Jeremiah must not go to the house of mirth, no more than to the house of mourning, ver. 8. It had been his custom, and it was innocent enough, when any of his friends made entertainments at their houses, and invited him to them, to go and sit with them, not merely to drink, but to eat and to drink, soberly and cheerfully. But now he must not take that liberty, 1. Because it was unseasonable and disagreeable to the providences of God that were concerning the land and nation; God called loud to weeping, and mourning, and fasting, he was coming forth against them in his judgments, and it was time for them to humble themselves. And it well became the prophet who gave them the warning to give them an example of taking the warning and complying with it, and so to make it appear he did himself believe it. Ministers ought to be examples of self-denial and mortification, and to shew themselves affected with those terrors of the Lord with which they desire to affect others; and it becomes all the sons of Zion to sympathise with her in her afflictions, and not to be merry when she is perplexed, Am. vi. 6. 2. Because he must thus shew the people what sad times were coming upon them. His friends wondered he would not meet them, as he used to do, in the house of feasting; but he lets them know it was to intimate to them that all their feasting would be at an end shortly; ver. 9, "I will cause to cease the voice of mirth." You shall have nothing to feast on, nothing to rejoice in, but be surrounded with calamities that shall mar your mirth, and cast a damp upon it. God can find ways to tame the most jovial. This shall be done in this place, in Jerusalem, that used to be the joyous city, and thought her joys were all secure to her; it shall be done in your eyes, in your sight, to be a vexation to you, who now look so haughty, look so merry; it shall be done in your day, you yourselves shall live to see it. The voice of praise they had made to cease by their iniquities and idolatries, and therefore justly God made to cease among them the voice of mirth and gladness. The voice of God's prophets was not heard, was not heeded among them, and therefore no longer shall the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride, of the songs that used to grace the nuptials, be heard among them: see ch. vii. 34.

10 And it shall come to pass, when thou shalt shew this people all these words, and they shall say unto thee, Wherefore hath the LORD pronounced all this great evil against us? or what is our iniquity? or what is our sin that we have committed against the LORD our God? 11 Then shalt thou say unto them,

Because your fathers have forsaken me, saith the LORD,
And have walked after other gods,
And have served them, and have worshipped them,
And have forsaken me, and have not kept my law;
12 And ye have done worse than your fathers;
For, behold, ye walk every one after the imagination of his evil heart,
That they may not hearken unto me:
13 Therefore will I cast you out of this land [fathers;
Into a land that ye know not, neither ye nor your
And there shall ye serve other gods day and night;
Where I will not shew you favour.

Here is, First. An inquiry made into the reasons why God would bring those judgments upon them; ver. 10, "When thou shalt shew this people all these words," the words of this curse, they will say unto thee, "Wherefore has the Lord pronounced all this great evil against us?" One would hope there were some among them that asked this question with an humble, penitent heart, desiring to know what was the sin for which God contended with them, that they might cast it away, and prevent the judgment; Shew us the Jonah that raiseth the storm, and we will throw it overboard. But it seems here to be the language of those who quarrelled at the word of God, and challenged him to shew what they had done which might deserve so severe a punishment. "What is our iniquity? and what is our sin?" What crime have we ever been guilty of proportionable to such a sentence? Instead of humbling and condemning themselves, they stand upon their own justification; and insinuate that God did them wrong in pronouncing this evil against them, and that he laid upon them more than was right, and they had reason to enter into judgment with God, Job xxxiv. 23. Note, It is amazing to see how hardly sinners are brought to justify God, and judge themselves when they are in trouble, and to own the iniquity and the sin that has procured them the trouble.

Secondly. A plain and full answer given to this inquiry. Do they ask the prophet why and for what reason God is thus angry with them? He shall not stop their mouths by telling them they may be sure there is a sufficient reason, the righteous God is never angry without cause, without good cause; but he must tell them particularly what is the cause, that they may be convinced and humbled, or at least that God may be justified. Let them know, then,

1. That God visited upon them the iniquities of their fathers; ver. 11, "Your fathers have forsaken me, and have not kept my law;" they shook off Divine institutions, and grew weary of them, they thought them too plain, too mean, and then they walked after other gods, whose worship was more gay and pompous; and, being fond of variety and novelty, they served them and worshipped them; and this was the sin which God had said, in the second commandment, he would visit upon their children, who kept up these idolatrous usages, because they received them by tradition from their fathers, 1 Pet. i. 18.

2. That God reckoned with them for their own iniquities, ver. 12. You have made your fathers' sin your own, and are become obnoxious to the punishment which in their days was deferred, for "you have done worse than your fathers." If they had made a good use of their fathers' reprieve, and had been led by the patience of God to repentance, they should have fared the better for it, and the judgment should have been prevented, the reprieve turned into a national pardon; but making an ill use of it, and being hardened by it in their sins, they fared the worse for it, and, the reprieve being expired, an addition was made to the sentence, and it was executed with the more severity. They were more impudent and obstinate in sin than their fathers, "walked every one after the imagination of his heart," made that their guide and rule, and were resolved to follow that, on purpose that they might not hearken to God and his prophets. They designedly suffer their own lusts and passions to be noisy, that they might drown the voice of their consciences. No wonder, then, that God has taken up this resolution concerning them, ver. 13, "I will cast you out of this land," this land of light, this valley of vision; since you will not hearken to me, you shall not hear me, you shall be hurried away, not into a neighbouring country, which you have formerly had some acquaintance and correspondence with, but into a far country, "a land that ye know not, neither you nor your fathers," in which you have no interest, nor can expect to meet with any comfortable society to be an allay to your misery. Justly were they banished into a strange land who doated upon strange gods, which neither they nor their fathers knew, Deu. xxxii. 17. Two things would make their case there very miserable, and both of them relate to the soul, the better part; the greatest calamities of their captivity were those which affected that and debarred that from its bliss: 1st. It is the happiness of the soul to be employed in the service of God, but "there shall ye serve other gods day and night," that is, you shall be in continual temptation to serve them, and perhaps compelled to do it by your cruel taskmasters; and when you are forced to worship idols you will be as sick of it as ever you were fond of it when it was forbidden you by your godly kings. See how God often makes men's sin their punishment, and fills the backslider in heart with his own ways. You shall have no public worship at all but the worship of idols, and then you will think with regret how you slighted the worship of the true God. 2nd. It is the happiness of the soul to have some tokens of the lovingkindness of God, but you shall go to a strange land, "where I will not shew you favour." If they had had God's favour, that would have made even the land of their captivity a pleasant land; but if they lie under his wrath the yoke of their oppression will be intolerable to them.

14 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That it shall no more be said, The LORD liveth,
That brought up the children of Israel out of the land of 15 But, The LORD liveth, [Egypt;
That brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north,
And from all the lands whither he had driven them:
And I will bring them again into their land
That I gave unto their fathers.
16 Behold, I will send for many fishers,
Saith the LORD, and they shall fish them;
And after will I send for many hunters,
And they shall hunt them from every mountain,
And from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks.
17 For mine eyes are upon all their ways:
They are not hid from my face,
Neither is their iniquity hid from mine eyes.
18 And first I will recompense their iniquity and their sin
Because they have defiled my land, [double;
They have filled mine inheritance with the carcases
Of their detestable and abominable things.
19 O LORD, my strength, and my fortress,
And my refuge in the day of affliction, [earth,
The Gentiles shall come unto thee from the ends of the
And shall say, Surely our fathers have inherited lies,
And things wherein there is no profit. [vanity,
20 Shall a man make gods unto himself,
And they are no gods?
21 Therefore, behold, I will this once cause them to know,
I will cause them to know mine hand and my might;
And they shall know that my name is The LORD.

There is a mixture of mercy and judgment in these verses, and it is hard to know to which to apply some of the passages here, they are so interwoven, and some seem to look as far forward as the times of the Gospel.

First. God will certainly execute judgment upon them for their idolatries; let them expect it, for the decree is gone forth.

1. God sees all their sins, though they commit them never so secretly, and palliate them never so artfully; ver. 17, "Mine eyes are upon all their ways." They have not their eye upon God, have no regard to him, stand in no awe of him, but he has his eye upon them, neither they nor their sins are hid from his face, from his eyes. Note, None of the sins of sinners either can be concealed from God or shall be overlooked by him, Pr. v. 21; Job xxxiv. 21; Ps. xc. 8.

2. God is highly displeased, particularly at their idolatries, ver. 18. As his omniscience convicts them, so his justice condemns them: "I will recompense their iniquity and their sin double;" not double to what it deserves, but double to what they expect, and to what I have done formerly. Or, I will recompense it abundantly; they shall now pay for their long reprieve, and the Divine patience they have abused. The sin for which God has a controversy with them is, their having defiled God's land with their idolatries, and not only alienated that which he was entitled to as his inheritance, but polluted that which he dwelt in with delight as his inheritance, and made it offensive to him, "with the carcases of their detestable things;" that is, the gods themselves which they worshipped, the images of which, though they were of gold and silver, were as loathsome to God as the stinking carcases of men or beasts are to us. Idols are carcases of detestable things; God hates them, and so should we. Or, the sacrifices which they offered to these idols, with which the land was filled, for they had high places in all the coasts and corners of it. This was the sin which above any other incensed God against them.

3. He will find out and raise up instruments of his wrath, that shall cast them out of their land, according to the sentence passed upon them; ver. 16, "I will send for many fishers and many hunters"—the Chaldean army, that shall have many ways of ensnaring and destroying them, by fraud as fishers, by force as hunters; they shall find them out wherever they are, and shall chase and closely pursue them to their ruin, shall discover them wherever they are hid in hills, or mountains, or holes of the rocks, and shall drive them out. God has various ways of prosecuting a people with his judgments, that avoid the convictions of his word. He has men at command fit for his purpose; he has them within call, and can send for them when he pleaseth.

4. Their bondage in Babylon shall be sorer and much more grievous than that in Egypt, their taskmasters more cruel, and their lives made more bitter; this is implied in the promise, ver. 14, 15, that their deliverance out of Babylon shall be more illustrious in itself, and more welcome to them, than that out of Egypt. Their slavery in Egypt came upon them gradually, and almost insensibly; that in Babylon came upon them at once, and with all the aggravating circumstances of terror. In Egypt they had a Goshen of their own, but none such in Babylon. In Egypt they were used as servants that were useful; in Babylon as captives that had been hateful.

5. They shall be warned, and God shall be glorified by these judgments brought upon them. These judgments have a voice, and speak aloud, 1st, Instruction to them. When God chastens them he teaches them. By this rod God expostulates with them; ver. 20, "Shall a man make gods to himself?" Will any man be so perfectly void of all reason and consideration as to think that a God of his own making can stand him in any stead? Will you ever again be such fools as you have been, to make to yourselves gods which are no gods, when you have a God whom you may call your own, who made you, and is himself the true and living God? 2nd. Honour to God, for he will be known by the judgments which he executeth. He will first recompense their iniquity, ver. 18, and then he will this once, ver. 21, this once for all; not by many interruptions of their peace, but this one desolation and destruction of it. Or, this once and no more "I will cause them to know my hand," the length and weight of my punishing hand, how far it can reach, and how deep it can wound. And "they shall know that my name is Jehovah," a God with whom there is no contending; that gives being to threatenings, and puts life into them as well as promises.

Secondly. Yet he hath mercy in store for them, intimations of which come in here for the encouragement of the prophet himself, and of those few among them that tremble at God's word. It was said with an air of severity, ver. 13, that God would banish them into a strange land; but, that thereby they might not be driven to despair, presently there follow words of comfort.

1. The days will come, the joyful days, when the same hand that dispersed them shall gather them again, ver. 14, 15. They are cast out, but they are not cast off, they are not cast away; they shall be brought up from the land of the north, the land of their captivity, where they are held with a strong hand, and from all the lands whither they are driven, and seemed to be lost and buried in the crowd. Nay, I will bring them again into their own land, and settle them there. As the foregoing threatenings agreed with what was written in the law, so doth this promise, Lev. xxvi. 44, "Yet will I not cast them away;" Deu. xxx. 4, "Thence will the Lord thy God gather thee." And the following words, ver. 16, may be understood as a promise; God will send for fishers and hunters, the Medes and Persians, that shall find them out in the countries where they are scattered, and send them back to their own land; or Zerubbabel and others of their own nation, who should fish them out and hunt after them, to persuade them to return, or whatever instruments the Spirit of God made use of to stir up their spirits to go up, which at first they were backward to. They began to nestle in Babylon, but, "as an eagle stirs up her nest and flutters over her young," so God did by them, Zec. ii. 7.

2. Their deliverance out of Babylon should upon some accounts be more illustrious and memorable than their deliverance out of Egypt was. Both were the Lord's doing, and marvellous in their eyes; both were proofs that the Lord liveth, and were to be kept in everlasting remembrance to his honour, as the living God, but the fresh mercy shall be so surprising, so welcome, that it shall even abolish the memory of the former. Not but that new mercies should put us in mind of old ones, and give us occasion to renew our thanksgivings for them, yet because we are tempted to think that the former days were better than these, and to ask, "Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of?" as if God's arm were waxen short, and to cry up the age of miracles above the latter ages, when mercies are wrought in a way of common providence; therefore we are allowed here comparatively to forget the bringing of Israel out of Egypt, as a deliverance outdone by that out of Babylon; that was done by might and power, this by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, Zec. iv. 6. In this there was more of pardoning mercy appearing than that, which is the most glorious branch of Divine mercy; for their captivity in Babylon had more in it of the punishment of sin than their bondage in Egypt; and therefore that which comforts Zion in her deliverance out of Babylon is this, that her iniquity is pardoned, Isa. xl. 2. Note, God glorifies himself, and we must glorify him, in those mercies that have no miracles in them as well as in those that have; and, though the favours of God to our fathers must not be forgotten, yet those to ourselves in our own day we must especially give thanks for.

3. Their deliverance out of captivity shall be accompanied with a blessed reformation, and they shall return effectually cured of their inclination to idolatry, which will complete their deliverance, and make it a mercy indeed. They had defiled their own land with their detestable things, ver. 18; but when they have smarted for so doing they shall come and humble themselves before God, ver. 19—21.

1st. They shall be brought to acknowledge that their God only is God indeed, for he is a God at need. My strength to support and comfort me, my fortress to protect and shelter me, and my refuge to whom I may flee in the day of affliction. Note, Need drives many to God who had set themselves at a distance from him. Those that slighted him in the day of their prosperity will be glad to flee to him in the day of their affliction.

2nd. They shall be quickened to return to him by the conversion of the Gentiles; "The Gentiles shall come to thee from the ends of the earth," and therefore shall not we come? Or, the Jews, who had by their idolatries made themselves as Gentiles, (so I rather understand it,) shall come to thee, by repentance and reformation, shall return to their duty and allegiance, even from the ends of the earth, from all the countries whither they were driven. The prophet comforts himself with the hope of this, and in a transport of joy returns to God the notice he had given him of it; "O Lord, my strength and my fortress," I am now easy, since thou hast given me a prospect of multitudes that "shall come to thee from the ends of the earth," both of Jewish converts and of Gentile proselytes. Note, Those that are brought to God themselves cannot but rejoice greatly to see others coming to him, coming back to him.

3rd. They shall acknowledge the folly of their ancestors, which it becomes them to do, when they were smarting for the sins of their ancestors; "Surely our fathers have inherited," not the satisfaction they promised themselves and their children, but "lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit;" we are now sensible that our fathers were cheated in their idolatrous worship, it did not prove what it promised, and therefore what have we to do any more with it? Note, It were well if the disappointment which some have met with in the service of sin, and the pernicious consequences of it to them, might prevail to deter others from treading in their steps.

4th. They shall reason themselves out of their idolatry, and that reformation is likely to be sincere and durable which results from a rational conviction of the gross absurdity there is in sin. They shall argue thus with themselves, (and it is well argued,) ver. 20, "Should a man" be such a fool, be so perfectly void of the reason of a man, as to "make gods to himself," the creatures of his own fancy, the work of his own hands, when they are really no gods? Can a man be so besotted, so perfectly lost to human understanding, as to expect any Divine blessing or favour from that which pretends to no divinity, but what it first received from him?

5th. They shall herein give honour to God, and make it to appear that they know both his hand in his providence and his name in his word, and they are brought to know his name by what they are made to know of his hand, ver. 21. This once now at length they shall be made to know that which they would not be brought to know by all the pains the prophets took with them. Note, So stupid are we, that nothing less than the mighty hand of Divine grace, known experimentally, can make us know aright the name of God, as it is revealed to us.

4. Their deliverance out of captivity shall be a type and figure of the great salvation to be wrought out by the Messiah, who shall "gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." And this is that which so far outshines the deliverance out of Egypt, as even to eclipse the lustre of it, and make it even to be forgotten. To this some apply that of the many fishers and hunters, the preachers of the Gospel, who were fishers of men, to inclose souls with the gospel net; to find them out in every mountain and hill, and secure them for Christ. Then the Gentiles came to God, some from the ends of the earth, and turned to the worship of him from the service of dumb idols.

CHAPTER XVII.

In this chapter, I. God convicts the Jews of the sin of idolatry, by the notorious evidence of the fact, and condemns them to captivity for it, ver. 1—4. II. He shews them the folly of all their carnal confidences, which should stand them in no stead, when God's time was to contend with them, and that this was one of the sins upon which his controversy with them was grounded, ver. 5—11. III. The prophet makes his appeal and address to God, upon occasion of the malice of his enemies against them, committing himself to the Divine protection, and begging of God to appear for him, ver. 12—18. IV. God by the prophet warns the people to keep holy the sabbath day, assuring them that if they did it should be the lengthening out of their tranquillity; but if not, God would, by some desolating judgment, assert the honour of his sabbaths, ver. 19—27.

THE sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron,
And with the point of a diamond:
It is graven upon the table of their heart,
And upon the horns of your altars; [groves
2 Whilst their children remember their altars and their
By the green trees upon the high hills.
3 O my mountain in the field, [spoil,
I will give thy substance and all thy treasures to the
And thy high places for sin, throughout all thy borders.
4 And thou, even thyself, shalt discontinue
From thine heritage that I gave thee;
And I will cause thee to serve thine enemies
In the land which thou knowest not:
For ye have kindled a fire in mine anger,
Which shall burn for ever.

The people had asked, ch. xvi. 10, "What is our iniquity, and what is our sin?" as if they could not be charged with any thing worth speaking of, for which God should enter into judgment with them; their challenge was answered there, but here we have a farther reply to it, in which,

First. The indictment is fully proved upon the prisoners, both the fact and the fault; their sin is too plain to be denied, and too bad to be excused, and they have nothing to plead either in extenuation of the crime or in arrest and mitigation of the judgment.

1. They cannot plead, Not guilty, for their sins are upon record in the book of God's omniscience, and their own consciences; nay, and they are obvious to the eye and observation of the world, ver. 1, 2. It is written before God in the most legible and indelible characters, and sealed among his treasures, never to be forgotten, Deu. xxxii. 34. It is written there "with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond;" what is so written will not be worn out by time, but is, as Job speaks, "graven in the rock for ever." Note, The sin of sinners is never forgotten till it is forgiven. It is ever before God, till by repentance it comes to be ever before us. "It is graven upon the table of their heart," their own consciences witness against them, and are instead of a thousand witnesses. What is graven on the heart, though it may be covered and closed up for a time, yet, being graven, it cannot be razed out, but will be produced in evidence when the books shall be opened. Nay, we need not appeal to the tables of the heart, perhaps they will not own the convictions of their consciences. We need go no farther for proof of the charge, than the horns of their altars, on which the blood of their idolatrous sacrifices was sprinkled, and perhaps the names of the idols to whose honour they were erected were inscribed. Their neighbours will witness against them, and all the creatures they have abused, by using them in the service of their lusts. To complete the evidence, their own children shall be witnesses against them; they will tell truth, when their fathers dissemble and prevaricate; they remember the altars and the groves to which their parents took them when they were little, ver. 2. It appears they were full of them, and acquainted with them betimes, they talk of them so frequently, so familiarly, and with so much delight.

2. They cannot plead that they repent, or are come to a better mind; no, as the guilt of their sin is undeniable, so their inclination to sin is invincible and incurable. In this sense many understand ver. 1, 2. Their sin is deeply engraven as with a pen of iron in the tables of their hearts; they have a rooted affection to it, it is woven into their very nature: their sin is dear to them, as that is of which we say it is engraven on our hearts. The bias of their minds is still as strong as ever towards their idols, and they are not wrought upon either by the word or rod of God to forget them, and abate their affection to them. It is written upon the horns of their altars, for they have given up their names to their idols, and resolve to abide by what they have done; they have bound themselves as with cords to the horns of their altars; and ver. 2 may be read fully to this sense: 'As they remember their children, so remember they their altars and their groves;' they are as fond of them, and take as much pleasure in them, as men do in their own children, and are as loath to part with them; they will live and die with their idols, and can no more forget them than a woman can forget her sucking child.

Secondly. The indictment being thus fully proved, the judgment is affirmed, and the sentence ratified, ver. 3, 4; forasmuch as they are thus wedded to their sins, and will not part with them,

1. They shall be made to part with their treasures, and those shall be given into the hands of strangers. Jerusalem is God's mountain in the field, it was built on a hill in the midst of a plain; all the treasures of that wealthy city will God give to the spoil. Or, 'My mountains with the fields, thy wealth and all thy treasures will I expose to spoil;' both the products of the country and the stores of the city shall be seized by the Chaldeans. Justly are men stripped of that which they have served their idols with, and have made the food and fuel of their lusts. My mountain, (so the whole land was, Ps. lxxviii. 54, Deu. xi. 11,) you have turned into your high places for sin, have worshipped your idols upon the high hills, ver. 2, and now they shall be given for a spoil in all your borders. What we make for a sin God will make for a spoil; for what comfort can we expect in that wherewith God is dishonoured?

2. They shall be made to part with their inheritance, with their real estates as well as personal, and shall be carried captives into a strange land; ver. 4, "Thou, even thyself," or, thou thyself, and those that are in thee, all the inhabitants, "shall discontinue from thy heritage that I gave thee." God owns it was their heritage, and he gave it them, they had an unquestionable title to it, which was an aggravation of their folly in throwing themselves out of the possession of it. It is through thyself, (so some read it,) through thine own default, that thou art disseized. Thou shalt discontinue or intermit the occupation of thy land. The law appointed them to let their land rest (it is the word here used) one year in seven, Ex. xxiii. 11. They did not observe that law, and now God would compel them to let it rest. The land shall enjoy her sabbaths, Lev. xxvi. 34, and yet it shall be no rest to them, they shall serve their enemies in a land they know not. Observe, 1st. Sin works a discontinuance of our comforts, and deprives us of the enjoyment of that which God has given us. Yet, 2nd. A discontinuance of the possession is not a defeasance of the right, but it is intimated that upon their repentance they shall recover possession again. For the present "ye have kindled a fire in mine anger," which burns so hot, that it seems as if it would burn for ever; and so it will unless you repent, for it is the anger of an everlasting God fastening upon immortal souls; and who knows the power of that anger?

5 Thus saith the LORD;
Cursed be the man that trusteth in man,
And maketh flesh his arm,
And whose heart departeth from the LORD.
6 For he shall be like the heath in the desert,
And shall not see when good cometh;
But shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness,
In a salt land and not inhabited.
7 Blessed is the man that trusteth in the LORD,
And whose hope the LORD is.
8 For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters,
And that spreadeth out her roots by the river,
And shall not see when heat cometh,
But her leaf shall be green;
And shall not be careful in the year of drought,
Neither shall cease from yielding fruit.
9 The heart is deceitful above all things,
And desperately wicked: who can know it?
10 I the LORD search the heart,
I try the reins,
Even to give every man according to his ways,
And according to the fruit of his doings.
11 As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not;
So he that getteth riches, and not by right,
Shall leave them in the midst of his days,
And at his end shall be a fool.

It is excellent doctrine that is preached in these verses, and of general concern and use to us all, and it doth not appear to have any particular reference to the present state of Judah and Jerusalem. The prophet's sermons were not all prophetical, but some of them practical; yet this discourse, which probably we have here only the heads of, would be of singular use to them by way of caution, not to misplace their confidence in the day of their distress. Let us all learn what we are taught here.

First. Concerning the disappointment and vexation they will certainly meet with that depend upon creatures for success and relief when they are in trouble; ver. 5, 6, "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man." God pronounceth him cursed for the affront he thereby puts upon him; or, cursed, that is, miserable, is the man that doth so, for he leans upon a broken reed, which will not only fail him, but will run into his hand and pierce it. Observe, 1. The sin here condemned. It is trusting in man; putting that confidence in the wisdom and power, the kindness and faithfulness of men, which should be placed in those attributes of God only; making our applications to men, and raising our expectations from them as principal agents, whereas they are but instruments in the hand of Providence. It is making flesh the arm we stay upon, the arm we work with, and with which we hope to work our point; the arm under which we shelter ourselves, and on which we depend for protection. God is his people's arm, Isa. xxxiii. 2. We must not think to make any creature to be that to us which God has undertaken to be. Man is called flesh, to shew the folly of those that make him their confidence. He is flesh, that is, weak and feeble, as flesh without bones or sinews, that has no strength at all in it; he is inactive as flesh without spirit, which is a dead thing; he is mortal and dying as flesh, which soon putrefies and corrupts, and is continually wasting. Nay, he is false and sinful, and has lost his integrity, so his being flesh signifies, Gen. vi. 3. 2. The great malignity there is in this sin. It is the departure of the evil heart of unbelief from the living God. They that trust in man perhaps draw nigh to God with their mouth, and honour him with their lips, they call him their hope, and say they trust in him; but really their heart departeth from him; they distrust him, despise him, and decline a correspondence with him. Cleaving to the cistern is leaving the fountain, and is resented accordingly. 3. The fatal consequences of this sin. He that puts a confidence in man puts a cheat upon himself; for, ver. 6, "He shall be like the heath in the desert," a sorry shrub, the product of barren ground, sapless, and useless, and worthless; his comforts shall all fail him, and his hopes be blasted; he shall wither, be dejected in himself, and trampled on by all about him. When good comes he shall not see it, he shall not share in it; when the times mend, they shall not mend with him, but he "shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness;" that is, his expectations shall be continually frustrated; when others have a harvest, he shall have none. They that trust to their own righteousness and strength, and think they can do well enough without the merit and grace of Christ, thus make flesh their arm, and their souls cannot prosper in graces or comforts; they can neither produce the fruits of acceptable services to God nor reap the fruits of saving blessings from him; they dwell in a dry land.

Secondly. Concerning the abundant satisfaction which they have, and will have, that make God their confidence, that live by faith in his providence and promise, that refer themselves to him and his conduct at all times, and repose themselves in him and his love in the most unquiet times, ver. 7, 8. Observe, 1. The duty required of us. To trust in the Lord, to do our duty to him, and then depend upon him to bear us out in doing it; when creatures and second causes either deceive or threaten us, either are false to us or fierce against us, to commit ourselves to God as all-sufficient, both to make up the want of those that fail us and to protect us from those that set upon us. It is to make the Lord our hope, his favour the good we hope for, and his power the strength we hope in. 2. The comfort that attends the doing of this duty. He that doth so "shall be as a tree planted by the waters," a choice tree, about which great care has been taken to set it in the best soil, so far from being like the heath in the wilderness; like a tree that spreads out her roots, and thereby is firmly fixed, spreads them out by the rivers, whence it draws abundance of sap; which notes both the establishment and the comfort which they have that make God their hope; they are easy, they are pleasant, and enjoy a continual security and serenity of mind. A tree thus planted, thus watered, shall not see when heat comes, that is, shall not sustain any damage by the most scorching heats of summer; it is so well moistened from its roots, that it shall be sufficiently guarded against drought. Those that make God their hope, 1st. They shall flourish in credit and comfort, like a tree that is always green, whose leaf doth not wither; they shall be cheerful to themselves, and beautiful in the eyes of others. Those who thus give honour to God by giving him credit, God will put honour upon them, and make them the ornament and delight of the places where they live, as green trees are. 2nd. They shall be fixed in an inward peace and satisfaction; "shall not be careful in a year of drought," when there is want of rain, for, as it has seed in itself, so it has its moisture. Those that make God their hope have enough in him to make up the want of all creature comforts. We need not be solicitous about the breaking of a cistern, as long as we have the fountain. 3rd. They shall be fruitful in holiness, and in all good works. They that trust in God, and by faith derive strength and grace from him, shall not cease from yielding fruit, they shall still be enabled to do that which will redound to the glory of God, the benefit of others, and their own account.

Thirdly. Concerning the sinfulness of man's heart, and the Divine inspection it is always under, ver. 9, 10. It is folly to trust in man, for he is not only frail, but false and deceitful. We are apt to think we trust in God, and are entitled to the blessings here promised to them that do so. But this is a thing about which our own hearts deceive us as much as any thing. We think we trust in God when really we do not, as appears by this, that our hopes and fears rise or fall according as second causes smile or frown. But it is true in general,

1. There is that wickedness in our hearts which we ourselves are not aware of, and do not suspect to be there; nay, it is a common mistake among the children of men to think themselves, their own hearts at least, a great deal better than really they are. "The heart," that is, the conscience of man in his corrupt and fallen state, "is deceitful above all things;" it is subtle and false, it is apt to supplant, (so the word properly signifies,) it is that from which Jacob had his name, a supplanter. It calls evil good, and good evil; puts false colours upon things, and cries peace to those to whom peace doth not belong. When men say in their hearts, that is, suffer their hearts to whisper to them, that either there is no God, or he doth not see, or he will not require, or they shall have peace,—though they go on; in these and a thousand the like suggestions the heart is deceitful; it cheats men into their own ruin, and this will be the aggravation of it, that they are self-deceivers, self-destroyers. Herein "the heart is desperately wicked," it is deadly, it is desperate. The case is bad indeed, and in a manner deplorable and past relief, if the conscience, which should rectify the errors of the other faculties, is itself a mother of falsehood and a ringleader in the delusion. What will become of a man if that in him which should be the candle of the Lord give a false light, if God's deputy in the soul, that is intrusted to support his interests, betrays them? Such is the deceitfulness of the heart, that we may truly say, "Who can know it?" Who can describe how bad the heart is? We cannot know our own hearts, not what they will do in an hour of temptation, (Hezekiah did not, Peter did not;) not what corrupt dispositions there are in them, nor in how many things they have turned aside; who can understand his errors? Much less can we know the hearts of others, or have any dependence upon them. But,

2. Whatever wickedness there is in the heart, God sees it and knows it, is perfectly acquainted with it, and apprised of it; "I the Lord search the heart." This is true of all that is in the heart, all the thoughts of it, the quickest, and those that are most carelessly overlooked by ourselves; all the intents of it, the closest, and those that are most artfully disguised and industriously concealed from others. Men may be imposed upon, but God cannot. He not only searcheth the heart with a piercing eye, but he tries the reins, to pass a judgment upon what he discovers, to give every thing its true character and due weight. He tries as the gold is tried, whether it be standard or no; as the prisoner is tried, whether he be guilty or no. And this judgment he makes of the heart is in order to his passing judgment upon the man; it is "to give to every man according to his ways," according to the desert and the tendency of them; life to those that walked in the ways of life, and death to those that persisted in the paths of the destroyer; "and according to the fruit of his doings," the effect and influence his doings have had upon others; or according to what is settled by the word of God to be the fruit of men's doings, blessings to the obedient and curses to the disobedient. Note, Therefore God is judge himself, and he alone, because he and none but he knows the hearts of the children of men. It is true especially of all the deceitfulness and wickedness of the heart, all its corrupt devices, desires, and designs: God observes and discerns them; and, which is more than any man can do, he judgeth of the overt act by the heart. Note, God knows more evil by us than we do by ourselves, which is a good reason why we should not flatter ourselves, but always stand in awe of the judgment of God.

Fourthly. Concerning the curse that attends wealth unjustly gotten. Fraud and violence had been reigning crying sins in Judah and Jerusalem; now the prophet would have those who had been guilty of these sins, and were now stripped of all they had, to read their sin in their punishment, ver. 11, "He that gets riches, and not by right," though he may make them his hope, he shall never have joy of them. Observe, It is possible that those who use unlawful means to get wealth may succeed therein, and prosper for a time; and it is a temptation to many to defraud and oppress their neighbours, when there is money to be got by it. He that has got treasures by vanity and a lying tongue may hug himself in his success, and say, I am rich, nay, and I am innocent too, Hos. xii. 8, but he "shall leave them in the midst of his days," they shall be taken from him or he from them; God shall cut him off with some surprising stroke then when he said, "Soul, take thine ease, thou hast goods laid up for many years," Lu. xii. 19, 20. He shall leave them to he knows not whom, and not be able to take any of his riches away with him. It intimates what a great vexation it is to a worldly man at death that he must leave his riches behind him, and justly may it be a terror to those that got them unjustly; for, though the wealth will not follow them to another world, the guilt will, and the torment of an everlasting, "Son, remember," Lu. xvi. 25. Thus, "at his end he shall be a fool," a Nabal, whose wealth did him no good, which he had so sordidly hoarded, when his heart became dead as a stone. He was a fool all along; sometimes perhaps his own conscience told him so, but at his end he will appear to be so. Those are fools indeed that are fools in their latter end; and so multitudes will prove who were cried up as wise men, that did well for themselves, Ps. xlix. 13, 18. They that get grace will be wise in their latter end, will have the comfort of it in death, and the benefit of it to eternity, Pr. xix. 20; but they that place their happiness in the wealth of the world, and right or wrong will be rich, will rue the folly of it when it is too late to rectify the fatal mistake. This is like "the partridge that sits on eggs and hatcheth them not," but either they are broken, as Job xxxix. 15, or stolen, as Isa. x. 4, or they become addled; some sort of fowl there was well known among the Jews whose case this commonly was. The rich man takes a great deal of pains to get an estate together, and sits brooding upon it, but never has any comfort or satisfaction in it. His projects to enrich himself by sinful courses miscarry, and come to nothing. Let us, therefore, be wise in time; what we get, to get it honestly; and what we have, to use it charitably; that we may lay up in store a good foundation, and be wise for eternity.

12 A glorious high throne from the beginning
Is the place of our sanctuary.
13 O LORD, the hope of Israel,
All that forsake thee shall be ashamed, [earth,
And they that depart from me shall be written in the Because they have forsaken the LORD, the fountain of living waters.
14 Heal me, O LORD, and I shall be healed;
Save me, and I shall be saved:
For thou art my praise.
15 Behold, they say unto me,
Where is the word of the LORD? let it come now.
16 As for me, I have not hastened from being a pastor to follow thee:
Neither have I desired the woeful day; thou knowest:
That which came out of my lips was right before thee.
17 Be not a terror unto me:
Thou art my hope in the day of evil.
18 Let them be confounded that persecute me, but let not me be confounded:
Let them be dismayed, but let not me be dismayed:
Bring upon them the day of evil,
And destroy them with double destruction

Here, as often before, we have the prophet retired for private meditation, and alone with God. Those ministers that would have comfort in their work must be much so. In his converse here with God and his own heart he takes the liberty which devout souls sometimes use in their soliloquies, to pass from one thing to another, without tying themselves too strictly to the laws of method and coherence.

First. He acknowledgeth the great favour of God to his people in setting up a revealed religion among them, and dignifying them with Divine institutions; ver. 12, "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." The temple at Jerusalem, where God manifested his special presence, where the lively oracles were lodged, where the people paid their homage to their sovereign, and whither they fled for refuge in distress, was the place of their sanctuary. That was a glorious high throne: it was a throne of holiness, that made it truly glorious; it was God's throne, that made it truly high. Jerusalem is called the city of the great king, not only Israel's king, but the king of the whole earth, so that it might be justly deemed the metropolis, or royal city, of the world. It was from the beginning so, from the first projecting of it by David and building of it by Solomon, 2 Chr. ii. 9. It was the honour of Israel that God set up such a glorious throne among them. 'As the glorious and high throne,' namely, that is heaven, 'is the place of our sanctuary,' so some read it. Note, All good men have a high value and veneration for the ordinances of God, and reckon the place of the sanctuary a glorious high throne. Jeremiah mentions this here, either as a plea with God for mercy to their land, in honour of the throne of his glory, ch. xiv. 21, or as an aggravation of the sin of his people in forsaking God, though his throne was among them, and so profaning his crown and the place of his sanctuary.

Secondly. He acknowledgeth the righteousness of God in abandoning those to ruin that forsook him, and revolted from their allegiance to him, ver. 13.

He speaks it to God, as subscribing both to the certainty and equity of it; "O Lord, the hope of" those in "Israel" that adhere to thee, "all that forsake thee shall be ashamed." They must of necessity be so, for they forsake thee for lying vanities, which will deceive them and make them ashamed; they will be ashamed, for they shame themselves; they will justly be put to shame, for they have forsaken him who alone can keep them in countenance when troubles come. 'Let them be ashamed,' so some read it; and so it is a pious imprecation of the wrath of God upon them, or of petition for his grace to make them penitently ashamed. "They that depart from me," that is, from the word of God which I have preached, they do in effect depart from God, as those that return to God are said to return to the prophet, ch. xv. 19. 'They that depart from thee,' (so some read it,) they "shall be written in the earth;" they shall soon be blotted out, as that is which is written in the dust; they shall be trampled upon and exposed to contempt; they belong to the earth, and shall be numbered among earthly people, that lay up their treasure on earth, and whose names are not written in heaven. And they deserve to be thus written with the fools in Israel, that their folly may be made manifest unto all, because they have "forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters," that is, spring waters, and that for broken cisterns. Note, God is to all that are his a fountain of living waters. There is a fulness of comfort in him, an overflowing, everflowing fulness, like that of a fountain; it is always fresh, and clear, and clean, like spring water, while the pleasures of sin are puddle waters. They are free to it; it is not a fountain sealed; they deserve, therefore, to be condemned, as Adam, to red earth, to which by the corruption of their nature they are allied, because they have forsaken the garden of the Lord, which is so well watered. They that depart from God are written in the earth.

Thirdly. He prays to God for healing saving mercy for himself. If the case of those be so miserable that depart from God, let me always draw nigh to him, Ps. lxxiii. 27, 28; and in order to that, "Lord, heal me and save me," ver. 14. Heal my backslidings, my bent to backslide, and save me from being carried away by the strength of the stream, to forsake thee. He was wounded in spirit with grief upon many accounts; Lord, heal me with thy comforts, and make me easy. He was continually exposed to the malice of unreasonable men; Lord, save me from them, and let me not fall into their wicked hands. Heal me, that is, sanctify me by thy grace; save me, that is, bring me to thy glory. All that shall be saved hereafter are sanctified now; unless the disease of sin be purged out, the soul cannot live. To enforce this petition he pleads, 1. The firm belief he had of God's power; "Heal thou me, and then I shall be healed;" the cure will certainly be wrought if thou undertake it; it will be a thorough cure, and not a palliative one. Those that come to God to be healed ought to be abundantly satisfied in the all-sufficiency of their physician. Save me, and then I shall certainly be saved, be my dangers and enemies never so threatening. If God holds us up we shall live; if he protect us we shall be safe. 2. The sincere regard he had to God's glory; "For thou art my praise," and for that reason I desire to be healed and saved, "that I may live and praise thee," Ps. cxix. 175. Thou art he whom I praise, and the praise due to thee I never gave to another. Thou art he whom I glory in and boast of, for on thee do I depend. Thou art he that furnisheth me with continual matter for praise, and I have given thee the praise of the favours already bestowed upon me. 'Thou shalt be my praise,' so some read it; heal me and save me, and thou shalt have the glory of it; "My praise shall be continually of thee," Ps. lxxi. 6, and lxxix. 13.

Fourthly. He complains of the infidelity and daring impiety of the people to whom he preached. It greatly troubled him, and he shews before God this trouble, as the servant that had slights put upon him by the guests he was sent to invite, "came and shewed his Lord these things." He had faithfully delivered God's message to them, and what answer has he to return to him that sent him? Why, ver. 15, "Behold, they say unto me, Where is the word of the Lord? Let it come now," Isa. v. 19. They bantered the prophet, and made a jest of that which he delivered with the greatest seriousness. 1. They denied the truth of what he said; If that be the word of the Lord which thou speakest to us, where is it? why is it not fulfilled? Thus the patience of God was impudently abused, as a ground to question his veracity. 2. They defied the terror of what he said; Let God Almighty do his worst, let all he has said come to pass, we shall do well enough, the lion is not so fierce as he is painted, Am. v. 18. Lord, to what purpose is it to speak to men that will neither believe nor fear?

Fifthly. He appeals to God concerning his faithful discharge of the office to which he was called, ver. 16. The people did all they could to make him weary of his work, to exasperate him and make him uneasy, and to tempt him to prevaricate and alter his message, for fear of displeasing them; but, Lord, saith he, thou knowest I have not yielded to them. 1. He kept constant to his work. His office, instead of being his credit and protection, exposed him to reproach, contempt, and injury; and yet, saith he, "I have not hastened from being a pastor after thee;" I have not overrun my work, nor sued for a discharge or a quietus. Prophets were pastors to the people, to feed them with the good word of God; but they were to be pastors after God, and all ministers must be so, according to his heart, ch. iii. 15, to follow him, and the directions and instructions he gives. Such a pastor Jeremiah was; and, though he met with as much difficulty and discouragement as ever any man did, yet he did not fly off as Jonah did, nor desire to be excused from going any more on God's errands. Note, Those that are employed for God, though their success answer not their expectation, yet they must not therefore throw up their commission, but continue to follow God, though the storm be in their faces. 2. He kept up his affection to the people. Though they were very abusive to him, he was compassionate to them: "I have not desired the woful day." The day of the accomplishment of his prophecies would be a woful day indeed to Jerusalem, and therefore he deprecated it and wished it might never come; though as to himself it would be the avenging of him upon his persecutors and the proving of him a true prophet, which they had questioned, ver. 15, and upon those accounts he might be tempted to desire it. Note, God doth not, and therefore ministers must not, desire the death of sinners, but rather that they may turn and live. Though we warn of the woful day, we must not wish for it, but rather weep because of it, as Jeremiah did. 3. He kept close to his instructions. Though he might have curried favour with the people, or at least have avoided their displeasure, if he had not been so sharp in his reproofs and severe in his threatenings, yet he would deliver his message faithfully; and that he had done so was a comfort to him; Lord, "thou knowest that which came out of my lips was right before thee," that is, it exactly agreed with what I had received from thee, and therefore thou art reflected upon in their quarrelling with me. Note, If what we say and do be right before God, we may easily despise the reproaches and censures of men; it is a small thing to be judged of their judgment.

Sixthly. He humbly begs of God that he would own him and protect him, and carry him on cheerfully in that work to which God had so plainly called him, and he had so sincerely devoted himself. Two things he here desires:

1. That he might have comfort in serving the God that sent him; ver. 17, "Be not thou a terror to me." Surely more is implied than is expressed; Be thou a comfort to me, and let thy favour rejoice my heart and encourage me, when my enemies do all they can to terrify me and either to drive me from my work or make me drive on heavily in it. Note, The best have that in them which might justly make God a terror to them, as he was for some time to Job, ch. vi. 4; to Asaph, Ps. lxxvii. 3; to Heman, Ps. lxxxviii. 15. And this is that which good men, "knowing the terrors of the Lord," dread and deprecate more than any thing; nay, whatever frightful accidents might befal them, or how formidable soever their enemies may appear to them, they can do well enough, so long as God is not a terror to them. He pleads, "Thou art my hope," and then nothing else is my fear, no, not "in the day of evil," when it is most threatening, most pressing. My dependence is upon thee, and therefore be not a terror to me. Note, Those that by faith make God their confidence shall have him for their comfort in the worst of times, if it be not their own fault. If we make him our trust we shall not find him our terror.

2. That he might have courage in dealing with the people to whom he was sent, ver. 18. They persecuted him, who should have entertained and encouraged him; Lord, saith he, let them be confounded, that is, let them be overpowered by the convictions of the word, and made ashamed of their obstinacy, or else let the judgments threatened be at length executed upon them; but let not me be confounded, let not me be terrified by their menaces, so as to betray my trust. Note, God's ministers have work to do which they need not to be either ashamed or afraid to go on in, but they do need be helped by the Divine grace to go on in it without shame or fear. Jeremiah had not desired the woful day upon his country in general, but as to his persecutors, in a just and holy indignation at their malice he prays, "Bring upon them the day of evil," in hopes the bringing it upon them might prevent the bringing of it upon the country; if they were taken away the people would be better, therefore "destroy them with a double destruction," that is, let them be utterly destroyed, root and branch, and let the prospect of that destruction be their present confusion. This the prophet prays, not at all that he might be avenged, nor so much that he might be eased, but that the Lord may be known by the judgments which he executeth.

19 Thus said the LORD unto me; Go and stand in the gate of the children of the people, whereby the kings of Judah come in, and by the which they go out, and in all the gates of Jerusalem; 20 And say unto them, Hear ye the word of the LORD, ye kings of Judah, and all Judah, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that enter in by these gates: 21 Thus saith the LORD; Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the sabbath day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; 22 Neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the sabbath day, neither do ye any work, but hallow ye the sabbath day, as I commanded your fathers. 23 But they obeyed not, neither inclined their ear, but made their neck stiff, that they might not hear, nor receive instruction.

24 And it shall come to pass,
If ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the LORD,
To bring in no burden through the gates of this city on the sabbath day,
But hallow the sabbath day, to do no work therein;
25 Then shall there enter into the gates of this city
Kings and princes sitting upon the throne of David,
Riding in chariots and on horses,
They, and their princes,
The men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem:
And this city shall remain for ever.
26 And they shall come from the cities of Judah,
And from the places about Jerusalem,
And from the land of Benjamin, and from the plain,
And from the mountains, and from the south,
Bringing burnt offerings, and sacrifices,
And meat offerings, and incense,
And bringing sacrifices of praise, unto the house of the 27 But if ye will not hearken unto me [LORD.
To hallow the sabbath day, and not to bear a burden,
Even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the sabbath day;
Then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof,
And it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem,
And it shall not be quenched.

These verses are a sermon concerning sabbath sanctification; it is a word which the prophet received from the Lord, and was ordered to deliver in the most solemn, public manner to the people; for they were sent not only to reprove sin, and to press obedience in general, but they must descend to particulars. This message concerning the sabbath probably was sent in the days of Josiah, for the furtherance of that work of reformation which he set on foot; for the promises here, ver. 25, 26, are such as I think we scarce find, when things came nearer to the extremity. This message must be proclaimed in all the places of concourse, and therefore in the gates, not only because through them people were continually passing and repassing, but because in them they kept their courts, and laid up their stores. It must be proclaimed (as the king or queen is usually proclaimed) at the court gate first, the gate by which the kings of Judah use to come in and go out, ver. 19. Let them be told their duty first, particularly this duty; for, if sabbaths be not sanctified as they should be, the rulers of Judah are to be contended with; so they were, Neh. xiii. 17, for they are certainly wanting in their duty. He must also preach it in all the gates of Jerusalem. It is a matter of great and general concern, therefore let all take notice of it. Let the kings of Judah hear the word of the Lord, for, as high as they are, he is above them; and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for, as mean as they are, he takes notice of them, and of what they say and do on sabbath days. Observe,

First. How the sabbath is to be sanctified, and what is the law concerning it, ver. 21, 22. 1. They must rest from their worldly employments on the sabbath day, must do no servile work. They must bear no burthen into the city, or out of it; into their houses, or out of them; neither husbandmen's burthens of corn carried in, nor muck carried out; nor tradesmen's burthens of wares or merchandizes imported or exported. There must not a loaded horse, or cart, or waggon, be seen on the sabbath day, either in the streets or in the roads. The porters must not ply on that day, nor must the servants be suffered to fetch in provisions or fuel. It is a day of rest, and must not be made a day of labour, unless in case of necessity. 2. They must apply themselves to that which is the proper work and business of the day; "Hallow ye the sabbath;" that is, consecrate it to the honour of God, and spend it in his service and worship; and it is in order to this that worldly business must be laid aside, that we may be entire for, and intent upon, that work, which requires and deserves the whole man. 3. They must herein be very circumspect; "Take heed to yourselves," watch against every thing that borders upon the profanation of the sabbath. Where God is jealous, we must be cautious. "Take heed to yourselves," for it is at your peril if you rob God of that part of your time which he has reserved to himself. 'Take heed to your souls,' so the word is. In order to the right sanctifying of sabbaths, we must look well to the frame of our spirits, and have a watchful eye upon all the motions of the inward man. Let not the soul be burthened with the cares of this world on sabbath days, but let that be employed, even all that is within us, in the work of the day. And, 4. He refers them to the law, the statute in this case made and provided. This is no new imposition upon you, but is what "I commanded your fathers;" it is an ancient law, it was an article of the orignal contract; nay, it was a command to the patriarchs.

Secondly. How the sabbath had been profaned, ver. 23. Your fathers were required to keep holy the sabbath day, "but they obeyed not;" they "hardened their necks" against this as well as other commands that were given them. This is mentioned to shew that there needed a reformation in this matter, and that God had a just controversy with them for the long transgression of this law which they had been guilty of. They hardened their necks against this command, that they might not hear and receive instruction concerning other commands. Where sabbaths are neglected, all religion sensibly goes to decay.

Thirdly. What blessings God had in store for them, if they would make conscience of sabbath sanctification. Though their fathers had been guilty of the profanation of the sabbath, they should not only not smart for it, but their city and nation should recover its ancient glory, if they would keep sabbaths better, ver. 24—26. Let them take care to hallow the sabbath, and do no work therein; and then, 1. The court shall flourish. Kings in succession, or the many branches of the royal family at the same time, all as great as kings, with other the princes that sit upon the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David, Ps. cxxii. 5, shall ride in great pomp through the gates of Jerusalem, some in chariots, and some on horses, attended with a numerous retinue of the men of Judah. Note, The honour of the government is the joy of the kingdom, and the support of religion would contribute greatly to both. 2. The city shall flourish. Let there be a face of religion kept up upon Jerusalem, by sabbath sanctification, that it may answer its title, the holy city, and then it shall remain for ever, shall for ever be inhabited, so the word may be rendered; it shall not be destroyed and dispeopled, as it is threatened to be. Wh. tever supports religion tends to establish the civil interests of a land. 3. The country shall flourish. The cities of Judah, and the land of Benjamin, shall be replenished with vast numbers of inhabitants, and those abounding in plenty, and living in peace, which will appear by the multitude and value of their offerings which they shall present to God. And by this the flourishing of a country may be judged of, what doth it do for the honour of God? Those that starve their religion, either they are poor, or are in a fair way to be so. 4. The church shall flourish. Meat offerings and incense, and sacrifices of praise, shall be brought to the house of the Lord, for the maintenance of the service of that house, and the servants that attend it. God's institutions shall be conscientiously observed; no sacrifices and incense shall be offered to idols, and alienated from God, but every thing shall go in the right channel. They shall have both occasion and hearts to bring sacrifices of praise to God. This is made an instance of their prosperity. Then a people truly flourish, when religion flourisheth among them. And this is the effect of sabbath sanctification. When that branch of religion is kept up, other instances of it are kept up likewise; but when that is lost, devotion is lost either in superstition or profaneness. It is a true observation which some have made, that the streams of all religion run either deep or shallow, according as the banks of the sabbath are kept up or neglected.

Fourthly. What judgments they must expect would come upon them, if they persisted in the profanation of the sabbath; ver. 27, "If ye will not hearken to me" in this matter, to keep the gates shut on sabbath days, so that there may be no unnecessary entering in, or going out on that day,—if you will break through the inclosure of the Divine law, and lay that day in common with other days,—know that God will kindle a fire in the gates of your city; intimating, that it shall be kindled by an enemy besieging the city, and assaulting the gates, and who shall take this course to force their entrance. Justly will those gates be fired that are not used, as they ought to be, to shut out sin, and to keep people in to an attendance on their duty. This fire shall devour even the palaces of Jerusalem, where the princes and nobles dwell, who did not use their power and interest as they ought to have done, to keep up the honour of God's sabbaths; but it shall not be quenched till it has laid the whole city in ruins. This was fulfilled by the army of the Chaldeans, ch. lii. 13. The profanation of the sabbath is a sin for which God has often contended with a people by fire.

CHAPTER XVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. A general declaration of God's ways in dealing with nations and kingdoms; that he can easily do what he will with them, as easily as the potter can with the clay, ver. 1—6. But that he certainly will do what is just and fair with them; if he threaten their ruin, yet, upon their repentance, he will return in mercy to them; and when he is coming towards them in mercy nothing but their sin will stop the progress of his favours, ver. 7—10. II. A particular demonstration of the folly of the men of Judah and Jerusalem, in departing from their God to idols, and so bringing ruin upon themselves, notwithstanding the fair warnings given them, and God's kind intentions towards them, ver. 11—17. III. The prophet's complaint to God of the base ingratitude, and unreasonable malice of his enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, and his prayers against them, ver. 18—23.

THE word which came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Arise, and go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. 3 Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels. 4 And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter: so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. 5 Then the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

POTTER AT WORK.

6 O house of Israel, cannot I do with you
As this potter? saith the LORD.
Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand,
So are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel.
7 At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom,
To pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it;
8 If that nation, against whom I have pronounced,
Turn from their evil,
I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them.
9 And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom,
To build and to plant it;
10 If it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice,
Then I will repent of the good, wherewith I said I would benefit them.

The prophet is here sent to the potter's house, (he knew where to find it,) not to preach a sermon, as before, to the gates of Jerusalem, but to prepare a sermon, or rather, to receive it ready prepared. Those needed not to study their sermons that had them, as he had this, by immediate inspiration. "Go to the potter's house," and observe how he manageth his work, "and there I will cause thee," by silent whispers, "to hear my words." There thou shalt receive a message to be delivered to the people. Note, Those that would know God's mind must observe his appointments, and attend there where they may hear his word. The prophet was never disobedient to the heavenly vision, and therefore went to the potter's house, ver. 3, and took notice how "he wrought his work upon the wheels," just as he pleased, with a great deal of ease, and in a little time. And, ver. 4, when a lump of clay, that he designed to form into one shape, either proved too stiff, or had a stone in it, or some way or other came to be "marred in his hand," he presently turned it into another shape; if it will not serve for a vessel of honour, it will serve for a vessel of dishonour, just as seems good to the potter. It is probable Jeremiah knew well enough how the potter wrought his work, and how easily he threw it into what form he pleased; but he must go and observe it now, that, having the idea of it fresh in his mind, he might the more readily and distinctly apprehend that truth which God designed thereby to represent to him, and might the more intelligently explain it to the people. God used similitudes by his servants the prophets, Hos. xii. 10, and it was requisite they should themselves understand the similitudes they used. Ministers will make a good use of their converse with the business and affairs of this life, if they learn thereby to speak more plainly and familiarly to people about the things of God, and to expound Scripture comparisons. For they ought to make all their knowledge some way or other serviceable to their profession. Now let us see what the message is which Jeremiah receives, and is intrusted with the delivery of, at the potter's house. While he looks carefully upon the potter's work, God darts into his mind these two great truths, which he must preach to the house of Israel:

First. That God hath both an incontestable authority and an irresistible ability to form and fashion kingdoms and nations as he pleaseth, so as to serve his own purposes. "Cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord,"

ver. 6. Have not I as absolute a power over you in respect both of might and right? Nay, God has a clearer title to a dominion over us than the potter has over the clay, for he only gives it its form, whereas we have both matter and form from God. "As the clay is in the potter's hand" to be moulded and shaped as he pleases, "so are ye in my hand." This intimates, 1. That God has an incontestable sovereignty over us, is not debtor to us, may dispose of us as he thinks fit, and is not accountable to us: and it would be as absurd for us to dispute this as for the clay to quarrel with the potter. 2. That it is a very easy thing with God to make what use he pleaseth of us, and what changes he pleaseth with us, and we cannot resist him. One turn of the hand, one turn of the wheel, quite alters the shape of the clay, makes it a vessel, unmakes it, new makes it. Thus are our times in God's hand, and not in our own, and it is in vain for us to strive with him. It is spoken here of nations; the most politic, the most potent, are what God is pleased to make them, and no other: see this explained by Job, ch. xii. 23, "He increaseth the nations and destroyeth them; he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again;" Ps. cvii. 33, &c.; and compare Job xxxiv. 29, "All nations before God are as the drop of the bucket," soon wiped away; "or the small dust of the balance," soon blown away, Isa. xl. 15, and therefore no doubt as easily managed as the clay by the potter. 3. That God will not be a loser by any, in his glory, at long run; but if he be not glorified by them he will be glorified upon them. If the potter's vessel be marred for one use, it shall serve for another. Those that will not be monuments of mercy shall be monuments of justice; "The Lord has made all things for himself, yea, even the wicked for the day of evil," Pr. xvi. 4. God formed us out of the clay, Job xxxiii. 6. Nay, and we are still as clay in his hands, Isa. lxiv. 8. And has not he the same power over us that the potter has over the clay? Rom. ix. 21. And are not we bound to submit, as the clay, to the potter's wisdom and will? Isa. xxix. 15, 16; xiv. 9.

Secondly. That in the exercise of this authority and ability he always goes by fixed rules of equity and goodness. He dispenseth favours indeed in a way of sovereignty, but never punisheth by arbitrary power. "High is his right hand," yet he rules not with a high hand, but as it follows there, "Justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne," Ps. lxxxix. 13, 14. God asserts his despotic power, and tells us what he might do, but at the same time assures us he will act as a righteous and merciful judge.

1. When God is coming against us in ways of judgment, we may be sure it is for our sins, which shall appear by this, that national repentance will stop the progress of the judgments; ver. 7, 8, "If God speak concerning a nation, to pluck up" its fences that secure it, and so lay it open; its fruit-trees that adorn and enrich it, and so leave it desolate; to pull down its fortifications, that the enemy may have liberty to enter in; its habitations, that the inhabitants may be under a necessity of going out, and so destroy it as either a vineyard or a city is destroyed;—in this case, if that nation take the alarm, and repent of their sins, and reform their lives, turn every one from his evil way, and return to God, God will graciously accept them, will not proceed in his controversy, will return in mercy to them, and, though he cannot change his mind, he will change his way, so that it may be said, he "repents him of the evil he said he would do to them." Thus often, in the time of the judges, when the oppressed people were penitent people, still God raised them up saviours; and when they turned to God their affairs presently took a new turn. It was Nineveh's case, and we wish it had oftener been Jerusalem's: see 2 Chr. vii. 14. It is an undoubted truth, that a sincere conversion from the evil of sin, will be an effectual prevention of the evil of punishment; and God can as easily raise up a penitent people from their ruins, as the potter can make anew the vessel of clay, when it was marred in his hand.

2. When God is coming towards us in ways of mercy, if any stop be given to the progress of that mercy, it is nothing but sin that gives it; ver. 9, 10, "If God speak concerning a nation, to build and to plant it," that is, to advance and establish all the true interests of it, it is his husbandry, and his building, 1 Cor. iii. 9; and if he speak in favour of it, it is done, it is increased, it is enriched, it is enlarged, its trade flourisheth, its government is settled in good hands, and all its affairs prosper, and its enterprises succeed. But if this nation, which God is thus loading with benefits, "do evil in his sight, and obey not his voice;" if it lose its virtue, and become debauched and profane; if religion grow into contempt, and vice get to be fashionable, and so be kept in countenance and reputation, and there be a general decay of serious godliness among them; then God will turn his hand against them, will pluck up what he was planting, and pull down what he was building, ch. xlv. 4. The good work that was in the doing shall stand still, and be let fall; and what favours were farther designed shall be withheld, and this is called his "repenting of the good wherewith he said he would benefit them," as he changed his purpose concerning Eli's house, 1 Sam. ii. 30, and hurried Israel back into the wilderness, when he had brought them within sight of Canaan. Note, Sin is the great mischief-maker between God and a people. It forfeits the benefit of his promises, and spoils the success of their prayers. It defeats his kind intentions concerning them, Hos. vii. 1, and baffles their pleasing expectations from him. It ruins their comforts, prolongs their grievances, brings them into straits, and retards their deliverances, Isa. lix. 1, 2.

11 Now therefore go to, speak to the men of Judah,
And to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, saying,
Thus saith the LORD;
Behold, I frame evil against you,
And devise a device against you:
Return ye now every one from his evil way,
And make your ways and your doings good.
12 And they said, There is no hope:
But we will walk after our own devices,
And we will every one do the imagination of his evil heart.
13 Therefore thus saith the LORD;
Ask ye now among the heathen,
Who hath heard such things:
The virgin of Israel hath done a very horrible thing.
14 Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field?
Or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?
15 Because my people hath forgotten me, they have burned incense to vanity,
And they have caused them to stumble in their ways from the ancient paths,
To walk in paths, in a way not cast up;
16 To make their land desolate, and a perpetual hissing;
Every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished, and wag his head.
17 I will scatter them as with an east wind before the enemy;
I will shew them the back, and not the face, in the day of their calamity.

These verses seem to be the application of the general truths laid down in the foregoing part of the chapter to the nation of the Jews and their present state.

First. God was now speaking concerning them, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy; for it is that part of the rule of judgment that their case agrees with, ver. 11. Go and tell them, saith God, "Behold, I frame evil against you, and devise a device against you." Providence, in all its operations, is plainly working towards your ruin. Look upon your carriage towards God, and you cannot but see that you deserve it; look upon his dealings with you, and you cannot but see that he designs it. He frames evil, as the potter frames the vessel, so as to answer the end.

Secondly. He invites them by repentance and reformation to meet him in the way of his judgments, and so to prevent his farther proceedings against them; "Return ye now every one from his evil ways," that so, according to the rule before laid down, God may turn from the evil he had purposed to do unto you, and that providence, which seemed to have been framed like a vessel on the wheel against you, shall presently be thrown into a new shape, and the issue shall be in favour of you. Note, The warnings of God's word, and the threatenings of his providence, should be improved by us as strong inducements to us to reform our lives; in which it is not enough to turn from our evil ways, but we must make our ways and our doings good, conformable to the rule, to the law.

Thirdly. He foresees their obstinacy, and their perverse refusal to comply with this invitation, though it tended so much to their own benefit; ver. 12, "They said, There is no hope." If we must not be delivered unless we return from our evil ways, we may even despair of ever being delivered, for we are resolved "we will walk after our own devices." It is to no purpose for the prophets to say any more to us, to use any more arguments, or press the matter any farther, we will have our way whatever it costs us; "we will do every one the imagination of his own evil heart," and will not be under the restraint of the Divine law. Note, That which ruins sinners is affecting to live as they list. They call it liberty to live at large, whereas for a man to be a slave to his lusts is the worst of slaveries. See how strangely some men's hearts are hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, that they will not so much as promise amendment; nay, they set the judgments of God at defiance; We will go on with our own devices, and let God go on with his, and we will venture the issue.

Fourthly. He upbraids them with the monstrous folly of their obstinacy, and their hating to be reformed. Surely never were people guilty of such an absurdity, never any that pretended to reason acted so unreasonably; ver. 13, "Ask ye among the heathen," even those that had not the benefit of Divine revelation, no oracles, no prophets, as Judah and Jerusalem had, yet even among them, "Who hath heard such a thing?" The Ninevites, when thus warned, turned from their evil ways. Some of the worst of men, when they are told of their faults, especially when they begin to smart for them, will at least promise reformation, and say they will endeavour to mend. But "the virgin of Israel" bids defiance to repentance, is resolved to go on frowardly, whatever conscience and providence say to the contrary, and thus "hath done a very horrible thing." She should have preserved herself pure and chaste for God, who had espoused her to himself; but she has alienated herself from him, and refuseth to return to him. Note, It is a horrible thing, enough to make one tremble to think of it, that those who have made their condition sad by sinning should make it desperate by refusing to reform. Wilful impenitency is the grossest self-murder, and that is a horrible thing, which we should abhor the thought of. He shews their folly in two things:

1. In the nature of the sin itself that they were guilty of. They forsook God for idols, which was the most horrible thing that could be, for they perfectly put a cheat upon themselves, ver. 14, 15. Will a thirsty traveller leave the snow, that being melted runs down from the mountains of Lebanon, and, passing over the rock of the field, flows in clear, clean, crystal streams; will he leave these, pass these by, and think to mend himself with some dirty puddle water? Or, "shall the cold flowing waters that come from any other place be forsaken" in the heat of summer? No; when men are parched with heat and drought, and meet with cooling, refreshing streams, they will make use of them, and not turn their backs upon them. The margin reads it, 'Will a man that is travelling the road leave my fields, which are plain and level, for a rock that is rough and hard, or for the snow of Lebanon, which, lying in great drifts, makes the road impassable?' 'Or shall the running waters be forsaken for the strange cold water?' No; in these things men know when they are well, and will keep so; they will not leave a certainty for an uncertainty. But "my people hath forgotten me," ver. 15, hath quitted a fountain of living waters for broken cisterns; they have burned incense to idols that are as vain as vanity itself, that are not what they pretend to be, nor can perform what is expected from them. They had not the common wit of travellers, but even their leaders caused them to err, and they were content to be misled. 1st. They left the ancient paths, which were appointed by the Divine law, which had been walked in by all the saints, which was therefore the right way to their journey's end, a safe way, and being well tracked was both easy to hit and easy to walk in. But when they were advised to keep to the good old way they positively said they would not, ch. vi. 16. 2nd. They chose bypaths. They walked in a way not cast up, not in the highway, the king's highway, in which they might travel safely, and which would certainly lead them to their right end, but in a dirty way, a rough way, a way in which they could not but stumble. Such was the way of idolatry, such is the way of all iniquity; it is a false way, it is a way of stumblingblocks, and yet this way they chose to walk in, and lead others in.

2. In the mischievous consequences of it. Though the thing itself had been ill they might have had some excuse for it if they could have promised themselves any good out of it; but the direct tendency of it was "to make their land desolate," and consequently themselves miserable, (for so the inhabitants must needs be if their country be laid waste,) and both themselves and their land "a perpetual hissing." Those deserve to be hissed that have fair warning given them and will not take it. "Every one that passeth by" their land shall make his remarks upon it, and "shall be astonished and wag his head," some admiring, others commiserating, others triumphing in the desolations of a country that had been the glory of all lands. They shall wag their heads in derision, upbraiding them with their folly in forsaking God and their duty, and so pulling this misery upon their own heads. Note, Those that revolt from God will justly be made the scorn of all about them; and having reproached the Lord will themselves be a reproach. Their land being made desolate in pursuance of their destruction, it is threatened, ver. 17, "I will scatter them as with an east wind," which is fierce and violent, by it they shall be hurried to and fro before the enemy, and find no way open to escape. They shall not only flee before the enemy,—that they may do, and yet make an orderly retreat,—but they shall be scattered, some one way and some another. And that which completes their misery is, "I will shew them the back, and not the face in the day of their calamity." Our calamities may be easily borne if God look towards us, and smile upon us when we are under them, if he countenance us and shew us favour. But if he turn the back upon us, if he shew himself displeased, if he be deaf to our prayers, and refuse us his help, if he forsake us, leave us to ourselves, and stand at a distance from us, we are quite undone. "If he hide his face, who then can behold him?" Job xxxiv. 29. Herein God would deal with them as they had dealt with him, ch. ii. 27; "They have turned their back unto me, and not their face." It is a righteous thing with God to shew himself strange to those in the day of their trouble who have shewed themselves rude and undutiful to him in their prosperity. This will have its full accomplishment in that day, when God will say to those that, though they have been professors of piety, yet were workers of iniquity, "Depart from me, I know you not, nay, I never knew you."

18 Then said they,
Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah;
For the law shall not perish from the priest,
Nor counsel from the wise,
Nor the word from the prophet.
Come, and let us smite him with the tongue,
And let us not give heed to any of his words.
19 Give heed to me, O LORD,
And hearken to the voice of them that contend with me.
20 Shall evil be recompensed for good?
For they have digged a pit for my soul.
Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them,
And to turn away thy wrath from them.
21 Therefore deliver up their children to the famine,
And pour out their blood by the force of the sword;
And let their wives be bereaved of their children, and be
And let their men be put to death; [widows;
Let their young men be slain by the sword in battle.
22 Let a cry be heard from their houses,
When thou shalt bring a troop suddenly upon them:
For they have digged a pit to take me,
And hid snares for my feet.
23 Yet, LORD, thou knowest all their counsel against me to Forgive not their iniquity, [slay me:
Neither blot out their sin from thy sight,
But let them be overthrown before thee;
Deal thus with them in the time of thine anger.

The prophet here, as sometimes before, brings in his own affairs, but very much for instruction to us.

First. See here what are the common methods of the persecutors. We may see this in Jeremiah's enemies, ver. 18.

1. They laid their heads together, to consult what they should do against him, both to be revenged on him for what he had said and to stop his mouth for the future. "They said, Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah." The enemies of God's people and ministers have been often very crafty themselves, and confederate with one another to do them mischief. What they cannot act to the prejudice of religion separately they will try to do in concert. "The wicked plotteth against the just." Caiaphas, and the chief priests and elders, did so against our blessed Saviour himself. The opposition which the gates of hell give to the kingdom of heaven is carried on with a great deal of cursed policy. God had said, ver. 11, "I devise a device against you;" and now, as if they resolved to be quits with him, and to outwit Infinite Wisdom itself, they resolve to devise devices against God's prophet, not only against his person, but against the word he delivered to them, which they thought, by their subtle management, to defeat. O the prodigious madness of those that hope to disannul God's counsel!

2. Herein they pretended a mighty zeal for the church, which they suggested was in danger if Jeremiah was tolerated to preach as he did. "Come," say they, let us silence and crush him, for "the law shall not perish from the priest;" the law of truth is in their mouths, Mal. ii. 6, and there we will seek it; the administration of ordinances according to the law is in their hands, and neither the one nor the other shall be wrested from them. "Counsel shall not perish from the wise;" the administration of public affairs shall always be lodged with the privy counsellors, and ministers of state, to whom it belongs. Nor shall the word perish from the prophets; they mean those of their own choosing, that prophesied to them smooth things, and flattered them with visions of peace. Two things they insinuated: 1st. That Jeremiah could not be himself a true prophet, but was a pretender, and an usurper; because he was neither commissioned by the priests nor concurred with the other prophets, whose authority therefore will be despised if he be suffered to go on. If Jeremiah be regarded as an oracle, farewell the reputation of our priests, our wise men, and prophets; but that must be supported, which is reason enough why he must be suppressed. 2nd. That the matter of his prophecies could not be from God, because it reflected sometimes upon the prophets and priests. He charged them with being the ringleaders of all the mischief, ch. v. 31; and deceiving the people, ch. xiv. 14; he had foretold that their heart should perish, and be astonished, ch. iv. 9; that "the wise men should be dismayed," ch. viii. 9, 10; that the priests and prophets should be intoxicated, ch. xiii. 13. Now this galled them more than anything else. Presuming upon the promise of God's presence with their priests and prophets, they could not believe he would ever leave them. The guides of the church must needs be infallible, and therefore he who foretold their being infatuated must be condemned as a false prophet. Thus, under colour of zeal for the church, have its best friends been run down.

3. They agreed to do all they could do to blast his reputation; "Come, let us smite him with the tongue," put him into an ill name, fasten an ill character upon him, represent him to some as despicable, and fit to be slighted; to others as dangerous, and fit to be prosecuted; to all as odious, and not fit to be tolerated. This was their device, fortiter calumniari, aliquid adhærebit,—'to throw the vilest calumnies at him, in hopes that some would stick;' to dress him up in bears' skins, otherwise they could not bait him. They who projected this, it is likely, were men of figure, whose tongue was no small slander, whose representations, though never so false, would be credited both by princes and people, to make him obnoxious to the justice of the one, and fury of the other. The scourge of such tongues will give not only smart lashes, but deep wounds; it is a great mercy therefore to be hid from it, Job v. 21.

4. To set others an example, they resolved they would not themselves regard any thing he said, though it appeared never so weighty, and never so well confirmed as a message from God; "Let us not give heed to any of his words;" for, right or wrong, they will look upon them to be his words, and not the words of God. What good can be done with those who hear the word of God with a resolution not to heed it or believe it? Nay,

5. That they may effectually silence him, they resolve to be the death of him; ver. 23, "All their counsel against me is to slay me." They hunt for the precious life; and a precious life indeed it was that they hunted for. Long was this Jerusalem's wretched character, Thou that killedst many of the prophets, and wouldest have killed them all.

Secondly. See here what is the common relief of the persecuted. This we may see in the course that Jeremiah took when he met with this hard usage; he presently applied himself to his God by prayer, and so gave himself ease.

1. He referred himself and his cause to God's cognizance, ver. 19. They would not regard a word he said, would not admit his complaints, or take any notice of his grievances, but "Lord," saith he, "do thou give heed to me." It is matter of comfort to faithful ministers that, if men will not give heed to their preaching, yet God will give heed to their praying. He appeals to God as an impartial judge that will hear both sides, as every judge ought to do. Do not only give heed to me, but "hearken to the voice of them that contend with me," hear what they have to say against me, and for themselves, and then make it to appear that thou sittest in the throne judging right. "Hear the voice of my contenders," how noisy and clamorous they are, how false and malicious all they say is, and let them be "judged out of their own mouth; cause their own tongues to fall upon them."

2. He complains of their base ingratitude to him; ver. 20, "Shall evil be recompensed for good?" And shall it go unpunished? Wilt not thou recompense me good for that evil? 2 Sam. xvi. 12. To render good for good is human, evil for evil is brutish, good for evil is Christian, but evil for good is devilish. It is so very absurd and wicked a thing that we cannot think but God will avenge it. See how great the evil was they did against him; they digged a pit for his soul; they aimed to take away his life, no less would satisfy them, and that not in a generous way, by an open assault, against which he might have an opportunity of defending himself, but in a base cowardly clandestine way they digged pits for him, which there was no fence against, Ps. cxix. 85. But see how great the good was which he had done for them; "Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them." He had been an intercessor with God for them, had used his interest in heaven on their behalf, which was the greatest kindness they could expect from one of his character; Gen. xx. 7, "He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee." This Moses often did for Israel, and yet they quarrelled with him, and sometimes spoke of stoning him. He did them this kindness when they were in imminent danger of destruction, and most needed it. They had themselves provoked God's wrath against them, and it was ready to break in upon them, but he stood in the gap, as Moses, Ps. cvi. 23, and turned away that wrath. Now, 1st. This was very base in them. Call a man ungrateful, and you can call him no worse. But it was not strange that they who had forgotten their God did not know their best friends. 2nd. It was very grievous to him, as the like was to David, Ps. xxxv. 13; cix. 4, "For my love they are my adversaries." And thus disingenuously do sinners deal with the great Intercessor, crucifying him afresh, and speaking against him on earth, while his blood is speaking for them in heaven: see Jno. x. 32. But, 3rd. It was a comfort to the prophet that, when they were so spiteful against him, he had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had done his duty to them; and the same will be our rejoicing in such a day of evil. "The bloodthirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul," Pr. xxix. 10.

3. He imprecates the judgments of God upon them, not from a revengeful disposition, but in a prophetical indignation against their horrid wickedness, ver. 21—23. He prays, 1st. That their families might be starved for want of bread; "Deliver up the children to the famine," to the famine in the country for want of rain, and that in the city through the straitness of the siege. Thus let this iniquity of the fathers be visited upon the children. 2nd. That they might be cut off by the sword of war, which, whatever it was in the enemies' hand, would be in God's hand a sword of justice. 'Pour them out,' so the word is, 'by the hands of the sword,' let their blood be shed as profusely as water, "that their wives may be left childless and widows, their husbands being taken away by death," or, as some understand it, by the pestilence. Let "their young men," that are the strength of this generation, and the hopes of the next, "be slain by the sword in battle." 3rd. That the terrors and desolations of war might seize them suddenly, and by surprise, that thus their punishment might answer their sin; ver. 22, "Let a cry be heard from their houses," loud shrieks, "when thou shalt bring a troop of the Chaldeans suddenly upon them," to seize them and all they have, to make them prisoners, and their estates a prey; for thus they would have done by Jeremiah. They aimed to ruin him at once, ere he was aware; "They have digged a pit for me," as for a wild beast, and have hid snares for me as for some ravenous, noxious fowl. Note, They that think to ensnare others will justly be themselves ensnared in an evil time. 4th. That they may be dealt with according to the desert of this sin, which was without excuse; "Forgive not their iniquity, neither blot out their sin from thy sight;" that is, let them not escape the just punishment of it. Let them lie under all the miseries of those whose sins are unpardoned. 5th. That God's wrath against them might be their ruin; "Let them be overthrown before thee." This intimates that justice is in pursuit of them, that they endeavour to make escape from it, but in vain; they shall be made to stumble in their flight, and being overthrown they will certainly be overtaken. And then, Lord, in the time of thine anger do to them, (he doth not say what he would have done to them, but) do to them as thou thinkest fit, as thou usest to do with those whom thou art angry with; "Deal thus with them."

Now this is not written for our imitation. Jeremiah was a prophet, and by the impulse of the spirit of prophecy, in the foresight of the ruin certainly coming upon his persecutors, might pray such prayers as we may not; and if we think by his example to justify ourselves in such imprecations we know not what manner of spirit we are of. Our Master has taught us by his precept and pattern to bless them that curse us, and pray for them that despitefully use us; yet it is written for our instruction, and is of use to teach us, 1. That those who have forfeited the benefit of the prayers of God's prophets for them, may justly expect to have their prayers against them. 2. That persecution is a sin that fills the measure of a people's iniquity very fast, and will bring as sure and sore a destruction upon them as any other. 3. Those that will not be won upon by the kindness of God and his prophets will certainly at length feel the just resentments of both.

CHAPTER XIX.

The same melancholy theme is the subject of this chapter that was of those foregoing; the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins: this Jeremiah had often foretold; here he has particularly full orders to do it again. I. He must set their sins in order before them, as he had often done, especially their idolatry, ver. 4, 5. II. He must describe the particular judgments which were now coming apace upon them for these sins, ver. 6—9. III. He must do this in the valley of Tophet, with great solemnity, and for some particular reasons, ver. 2, 3. IV. He must summon a company of the elders together to be witnesses of this, ver. 1. V. He must confirm this, and endeavour to affect his hearers with it, by a sign, which was the breaking of an earthen bottle, signifying that they should be dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel, ver. 10—13. VI. When he had done this in the valley of Tophet, he ratified it in the court of the temple, ver. 14, 15. Thus were all likely means tried to awaken this stupid senseless people to repentance, that their ruin might be prevented, but all in vain.

THUS saith the LORD, Go and get a potter's earthen bottle, and take of the ancients of the people, and of the ancients of the priests; 2 And go forth unto the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the east gate, and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee, 3 And say, Hear ye the word of the LORD, O kings of Judah, and inhabitants of Jerusalem; Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring evil upon this place, the which whosoever heareth, his ears shall tingle. 4 Because they have forsaken me, and have estranged this place, and have burned incense in it unto other gods, whom neither they nor their fathers have known, nor the kings of Judah, and have filled this place with the blood of innocents; 5 They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt offerings unto Baal, which I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into my mind: 6 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that this place shall no more be called Tophet, nor The valley of the son of Hinnom, but The valley of slaughter. 7 And I will make void the counsel of Judah and Jerusalem in this place; and I will cause them to fall by the sword before their enemies, and by the hands of them that seek their lives: and their carcases will I give to be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth. 8 And I will make this city desolate, and an hissing; every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished and hiss because of all the plagues thereof. 9 And I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and they shall eat every one the flesh of his friend in the siege and straitness, wherewith their enemies, and they that seek their lives, shall straiten them.

HUMAN SACRIFICE—FROM AN ETRUSCAN TOMB.—ver. 5.

The corruption of man having made it necessary that precept should be upon precept, and line upon line, so unapt are we to receive, and so very apt to let slip, the things of God, the grace of God has provided that there shall be accordingly precept upon precept, and line upon line; that those who are irreclaimable may be inexcusable. For this reason the prophet here is sent with a message to the same purpose with what he had often delivered, but with some circumstances that might make it the more taken notice of, a thing which ministers should study, for a little circumstance may sometimes be a great advantage, and they that would win souls must be wise.

First. He must take of the elders and chief men, both in church and state, to be his auditors and witnesses to what he said. "The ancients of the people, and the ancients of the priests," the most eminent men, both in the magistracy and in the ministry, that they might be faithful witnesses to record, as those, Isa. viii. 2. It is strange that these great men would be at the beck of a poor prophet, and obey his summons to attend him out of the city, they knew not whither, and they knew not why. But though the generality of the elders were disaffected to him, yet it is likely there were some few among them who looked upon him as a prophet of the Lord, and would pay this respect to the heavenly vision. Note, Persons of rank and figure have an opportunity of honouring God, by a diligent attendance on the ministry of the word and other Divine institutions, and they ought to think it an honour, and no disparagement to themselves, yea, though the circumstances be mean and despicable. It is certain the greatest of men are less than the least of the ordinances of God.

Secondly. He must go to the valley of the son of Hinnom, and deliver this message there; for the word of the Lord is not bound to any one place. As good a sermon may be preached in the valley of Tophet, as in the gate of the temple. Christ preached on a mountain, and out of a ship. This valley lay partly on the south side of Jerusalem; but the prophet's way to it was "by the entry of the east gate," ver. 2. The sun gate, so some render it, and suppose it to look not towards the sunrising, but the noon sun; the potter's gate, so some. This sermon must be preached in that place, in the valley of the son of Hinnom, 1. Because there they had been guilty of the vilest of their idolatries, the sacrificing of their children to Moloch, a horrid piece of impiety, which the sight of the place might serve to mind them of, and upbraid them with. 2. Because there they should feel the sorest of their calamities. There the greatest slaughter should be made among them; and, it being the common sink of the city, let them look upon it, and see what a miserable spectacle this magnificent city should be, when it should be all like the valley of Tophet. God bids him go thither, "and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee" when thou comest thither; whereby it appears (as Mr. Gataker well observes) that God's messages many times were not revealed to the prophets before the very instant of time wherein they were to deliver them.

Thirdly. He must give general notice of a general ruin now shortly coming upon Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 3. He must, as those that make proclamation, begin with an 'Oyez,' "Hear ye the word of the Lord," though it be a terrible word, for you may thank yourselves if it be so. Both rulers and ruled must attend to it at their peril. The kings of Judah, that is, the king and his sons, the king and his princes and privy counsellors, they must hear the word of the King of kings, for, as high as they are, he is above them. The inhabitants of Jerusalem also must hear what God hath to say to them. Both princes and people have contributed to the national guilt, and must concur in the national repentance, or they will both share in the national ruin. Let them all know that the Lord of hosts, who is therefore able to do what he threatens, though he is the God of Israel; nay, because he is so, will therefore punish them in the first place for their iniquities, Am. iii. 2; he "will bring evil upon this place," that is, upon Judah and Jerusalem, so surprising and so dreadful, that whosoever hears it his ears shall tingle, hears the prediction of it, hears the report and representation of it; it shall make such an impression of terror upon him, that he shall still think he hears it sounding in his ears, and shall not be able to get it out of his mind. The ruin of Eli's house is thus described, 1 Sam. iii. 11; and of Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxi. 12.

Fourthly. He must plainly tell them what their sins were for which God had this controversy with them, ver. 4, 5. Apostacy from God; "They have forsaken me." Abuse of the privileges of the visible church with which they had been dignified; they "have estranged this place." Jerusalem the holy city, the temple, the holy house, which were designed for the honour of God, and the support of his kingdom among men, they had alienated from those purposes, and (as some render the word) they had strangely abused. They had so polluted both with their wickedness that God had disowned both, and abandoned them to ruin. He chargeth them with an affection for, and the adoration of, false gods, such as "neither they nor their fathers have known," such as never had recommended themselves to their belief and esteem, by any acts of power or goodness done for them or their ancestors, as that God had abundantly done whom they forsook, yet they took them at a venture for their gods. Nay, being fond of change and novelty, they liked them the better for their being upstarts; and new fashions in religion were as graceful to their fancies as in other things. They also stand charged with murder, wilful murder, from malice prepense; They "have filled this place with the blood of innocents." It was Manasseh's sin, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4, "which the Lord would not pardon;" nay, as if idolatry and murder committed separately were not bad enough, and affront enough to God and man, they have put them together, have consolidated them into one complicated crime, that of burning their children in the fire to Baal, ver. 5; which was the most insolent defiance to all the laws both of natural and revealed religion that ever mankind was guilty of; and by it they openly declared, they loved their new gods better than ever they loved the true God, though they were such cruel taskmasters, that they required human sacrifices, inhuman I should call them, which the Lord Jehovah, whose all lives and souls are, never demanded from his worshippers, never spake of such a thing, nor came it into his mind: see ch. vii. 31.

Fifthly. He must endeavour to affect them with the greatness of the desolation that was coming upon them. He must tell them, as he had done before, ch. vii. 32, that this "valley of the son of Hinnom" shall acquire a new name, "the valley of slaughter," ver. 6; for, ver. 7, multitudes shall fall there by the sword, when either they sally out upon the besiegers and are repulsed, or attempt to make their escape and are seized. They shall fall before their enemies, who not only endeavour to make themselves masters of their houses and estates, but have such an implacable enmity to them that they seek their lives. They thirst after their blood, and when they are dead will not allow a cartel for the burying of the slain; but their carcases shall "be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth." What a dismal place will the valley of Tophet be then! and as for those that remain within the city, and will not capitulate with the besiegers, they shall perish for want of food, when first they have eaten the flesh of their sons and daughters, and dearest friends, through the straitness wherewith their enemies shall straiten them, ver. 9. This was threatened in the law, as an instance of the extremity to which the judgments of God should reduce them, Lev. xxvi. 29; Deu. xxviii. 23; and was accomplished, Lam. iv. 10. And lastly, the whole city shall be desolate, the houses laid in ashes, the inhabitants slain, or taken prisoners; there shall be no resort to it, nor any thing in it but what looks rueful and horrid; so "that every one that passeth by shall be astonished," ver. 8; as he had said before, ch. xviii. 16. That place which holiness had made the joy of the whole earth, sin had made the reproach and shame of the whole earth.

Sixthly. He must assure them, that all their attempts to prevent and avoid this ruin, so long as they continued impenitent and unreformed, would be fruitless and vain; ver. 7, "I will make void the counsel of Judah and Jerusalem," that is, of the princes and senators of Judah and Jerusalem, "in this place," in the royal palace which lay on the south side of the city, not far from the place where the prophet now stood. Note, There is no fleeing from God's justice but by fleeing to his mercy. They that will not make good God's counsel, by humbling themselves under his mighty hand, God will make void their counsel, and blast their projects, which they think never so well concerted for their own preservation. There is no counsel or strength against the Lord.

10 Then shalt thou break the bottle in the sight of the men that go with thee, 11 And shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Even so will I break this people and this city, as one breaketh a potter's vessel, that cannot be made whole again: and they shall bury them in Tophet, till there be no place to bury. 12 Thus will I do unto this place, saith the LORD, and to the inhabitants thereof, and even make this city as Tophet: 13 And the houses of Jerusalem, and the houses of the kings of Judah, shall be defiled as the place of Tophet, because of all the houses upon whose roofs they have burned incense unto all the host of heaven, and have poured out drink offerings unto other gods. 14 Then came Jeremiah from Tophet, whither the LORD had sent him to prophesy; and he stood in the court of the LORD'S house; and said to all the people, 15 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring upon this city and upon all her towns all the evil that I have pronounced against it, because they have hardened their necks, that they might not hear my words.

The message of wrath delivered in the foregoing verses is here enforced, that it might gain credit two ways:

First. By a visible sign. The prophet was to take along with him an earthen bottle, ver. 1; and when he had delivered his message, he was to break the bottle to pieces, ver. 10; and the same that were auditors of the sermon must be spectators of the sign. He compared this people in the chapter before to the potter's clay, which is easily marred in the making; but some might say, It is passed that with us, we have been made and hardened long since. And what though you be, saith he; the potter's vessel is as soon broken in the hand of any man as the vessel while it is soft clay is marred in the potter's hand; and its case in this respect much worse, that the vessel while it is soft clay, though it be marred, may be moulded again; but, after it is hardened, when it is broken, it can never be pieced again. Perhaps what they see will affect them more than what they only hear talk of; that is the intention of sacramental signs, and teaching by symbols was anciently used. In the explication of this sign, he must inculcate what he had before said, with a farther reference to the place where this was done, in the valley of Tophet.

1. As the bottle was easily, irresistibly, and irrecoverably broken, so shall Judah and Jerusalem be broken by the Chaldean army, ver. 11. They depended much upon the firmness of their constitution, and fixedness of their courage, which they thought hardened them like a vessel of brass; but the prophet shews all that did but harden them like a vessel of earth, which, though hard, is brittle, and sooner broken than that which is not so hard. Though they were made vessels of honour, still they were vessels of earth; and so they shall be made to know, if they dishonour God and themselves, and serve not the purposes for which they were made. It is God himself, who made them, that resolves to unmake them; "I will break this people, and this city," dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel, the doom of the heathen, Ps. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27; but now Jerusalem's doom, Isa. xxx. 14. A potter's vessel, when once broken, "cannot be made whole again," cannot be cured, so the word is. The ruin of Jerusalem shall be an utter ruin; no hand can repair it but his that broke it; and if they return to him, though he has torn, he will heal.

2. This was done in Tophet, to signify two things: 1st. That Tophet should be the receptacle of the slain; 'They shall bury in Tophet, for want of room to bury elsewhere;' so some read it; and if they had had conveniences any where else, they would not have buried there, where all the filth of the city was carried. Or, as we read it, "They shall bury in Tophet, till there be no place to bury" any more there. They shall jostle for room to lay their dead; and a very little room will then serve those who, while they lived, laid house to house, and field to field. They that would be placed alone in the midst of the earth, while they were above ground, and obliged all about them to keep their distance, must lie with the multitude when they are under ground, for there are innumerable before them. 2nd. That Tophet should be a resemblance of the whole city; ver. 12, "I will make this city as Tophet." As they had filled the valley of Tophet with the slain, which they sacrificed to their idols; so God will fill the whole city with the slain, that shall fall as sacrifices to the justice of God. We read, 2 Kin. xxiii. 19, of Josiah's defiling Tophet, because it had been abused to idolatry; which he did, as should seem, ver. 14, by filling it with the bones of men; and, whatever it was before, from thenceforward it was looked upon as a detestable place. Dead carcases and other filth of the city was carried thither, and a fire continually kept there for the burning of it. This was the posture of that valley, when Jeremiah was sent thither to prophesy; and so execrable a place was it looked upon to be that, in the language of our Saviour's time, hell was called in allusion to it, Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom. Now, saith God, since that blessed reformation, when Tophet was defiled, did not proceed as it ought to have done, nor prove a thorough reformation; but, though the idols in Tophet were abolished and made odious, those in Jerusalem remained; therefore will I do with the city as Josiah did by Tophet, fill it with the bodies of men, and make it a heap of rubbish. Even the houses of Jerusalem, and those of the kings of Judah, the royal palaces not excepted, shall be defiled as the place of Tophet, ver. 13; and for the same reason, because of the idolatries that have been committed there. Since they will not defile them by a reformation, God will defile them by a destruction, because upon "the roofs of their houses they have burnt incense unto the host of heaven." The flat roofs of their houses were sometimes used by devout people as convenient places for prayer, Acts x. 9; and by idolaters they were used as high places, on which they sacrificed to strange gods, especially to the host of heaven,—the sun, moon, and stars, that there they might be so much nearer to them, and have a clearer and fuller view of them. We read of those that "worshipped the host of heaven upon the housetops," Zep. i. 5; and of "altars on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz," 2 Kin. xxiii. 12. This sin upon the housetops brought a curse into the house, which consumed it, and made it a dunghill like Tophet.

Secondly. By a solemn recognition and ratification of what he had said, "in the court of the Lord's house," ver. 14, 15. The prophet returned from Tophet to the temple, which stood upon the hill over that valley, and there confirmed, and probably repeated, what he had said in the valley of Tophet, for the benefit of those who had heard it. What he had said he would stand to. Here, as often before, he both assures them of judgments coming upon them, and assigns the cause of them, which was their sin. Both these are here put together in a little compass, with a reference to all that had gone before. 1. The accomplishment of the prophecies is here the judgment threatened. The people flattered themselves with a conceit, that God would be better than his word, the threatening was but to frighten them, and keep them in awe a little; but the prophet tells them, they deceive themselves if they think so; for "thus saith the Lord of hosts," that is able to make his words good, "I will bring upon this city, and upon all her towns," all the lesser cities that belong to Jerusalem the metropolis, "all the evil that I have pronounced against it." Note, Whatever men may think to the contrary, the executions of providence will fully answer the predictions of the word; and God will appear as terrible against sin and sinners, as the Scripture makes him; nor shall the unbelief of men make either his promise or his threatening of none effect, or of less effect than it was thought to be of. 2. The contempt of the prophecies is here the sin charged upon them, as the procuring cause of this judgment. It is "because they have hardened their necks," and would not bow and bend them to the yoke of God's commands, would "not hear my words," that he would not heed them, and yield obedience to them. Note, The obstinacy of sinners in their sinful ways is altogether long of themselves. If their necks are hardened, it is their own act and deed, they have hardened them; if they are deaf to the word of God, it is because they have stopped their own ear. We have need therefore to pray, that God by his grace would deliver us 'from hardness of heart, and contempt of his word and commandment.'

CHAPTER XX.

Such plain dealing as Jeremiah used in the foregoing chapter, one might easily foresee, if it did not convince and humble men, it would provoke and exasperate them; and so it did, for here we find, I. Jeremiah persecuted by Pashur, for preaching that sermon, ver. 1, 2. II. Pashur threatened for so doing, and the word which Jeremiah had preached confirmed, ver. 3—6. III. Jeremiah complaining to God concerning it, and the other instances of hard measure that he had since he began to be a prophet; and the grievous temptations he had struggled with, ver. 7—10; encouraging himself in God, lodging his appeal with him, not doubting but that he shall yet praise him, by which it appears he had much grace, ver. 11—13; and yet peevishly cursing the day of his birth, ver. 14—18; by which it appears he had sad remainders of corruption in him too, and was a man subject to like passions as we are.

NOW Pashur the son of Immer the priest, who was also chief governor in the house of the LORD, heard that Jeremiah prophesied these things. 2 Then Pashur smote Jeremiah the prophet, and put him in the stocks that were in the high gate of Benjamin, which was by the house of the LORD. 3 And it came to pass on the morrow, that Pashur brought forth Jeremiah out of the stocks. Then said Jeremiah unto him, The LORD hath not called thy name Pashur, but Magor-missabib. 4 For thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will make thee a terror to thyself, and to all thy friends: and they shall fall by the sword of their enemies, and thine eyes shall behold it: and I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall carry them captive into Babylon, and shall slay them with the sword. 5 Moreover I will deliver all the strength of this city, and all the labours thereof, and all the precious things thereof, and all the treasures of the kings of Judah will I give into the hand of their enemies, which shall spoil them, and take them, and carry them to Babylon. 6 And thou, Pashur, and all that dwell in thine house shall go into captivity: and thou shalt come to Babylon, and there thou shalt die, and shalt be buried there, thou, and all thy friends, to whom thou hast prophesied lies.

Here is, First. Pashur's unjust displeasure against Jeremiah, and the fruits of that displeasure, ver. 1, 2. This Pashur was a priest, and therefore one would think should have protected Jeremiah, who was of his own order, a priest too, and the more because he was a prophet of the Lord, whose interests the priests his ministers ought to consult. But this priest was a persecutor of him whom he should have patronised. He was the son of Immer; that is, he was of the sixteenth course of the priests, of which Immer, when these courses were first settled by David, was father, 1 Chr. xxiv. 14; as Zechariah was of the order of Abiah, Lu. i. 5. Thus this Pashur is distinguished from another of the same name, mentioned ch. xxi. 4, that was of the fifth course. This Pashur was chief governor in the temple; perhaps he was only so pro tempore,—'for a short period,' the course he was head of being now in waiting; or, he was suffragan to the high priest; or, perhaps captain of the temple, or of the guards about it, Acts iv. 1. This was Jeremiah's great enemy. The greatest malignity to God's prophets was found among those that professed sanctity, and concern for God and the church.

We cannot suppose that Pashur was any of those ancients of the priests that went with Jeremiah to the valley of Tophet, to hear him prophesy, unless it were with a malicious design to take advantage against him. But when he came into the courts of the Lord's house, it is probable he was himself a witness of what he said; and so it may be read, ver. 1, 'He heard Jeremiah prophesying these things.' As we read it, the information was brought him by others, whose examinations he took; he "heard that Jeremiah prophesied these things," and could not bear it; especially that he should dare to preach in the courts of the Lord's house, where he was chief governor, without his leave. When power in the church is abused, it is the most dangerous power of all other against it. Being incensed at Jeremiah, 1. He smote him, struck him with his hand, or staff of authority. Perhaps it was a blow intended only to disgrace him, like that which the high priest ordered to be given Paul, Acts xxiii. 2. He struck him on the mouth, and bade him hold his prating. Or, perhaps he gave him many blows, intended to hurt him; he beat him soundly, as a malefactor. It is charged upon the husbandmen, Mat. xxi. 35, that they beat the servants. The method of proceeding here was illegal. The high priest and the rest of the priests ought to have been consulted, Jeremiah's credentials examined, and the matter inquired into, whether he had an authority to say what he said. But these rules of justice are set aside, and despised as mere formalities; right or wrong Jeremiah must be run down. The enemies of piety would never suffer themselves to be bound by the laws of equity. 2. He "put him in the stocks." Some make it only a place of confinement; he imprisoned him. It rather seems to be an instrument of closer restraint than so, and intended to put him both to pain and shame. Some think it was a pillory for his neck and arms; others, as we, a pair of stocks for his legs. Whatever engine it was, he continued in it all night, and in a public place too, 'in the high gate of Benjamin, which was' in or 'by the house of the Lord;' probably a gate through which they passed between the city and the temple. Pashur intended thus to chastise him, that he might deter him from prophesying; and thus to expose him to contempt, and render him odious, that he might not be regarded if he did prophesy. Thus have the best men met with the worst treatment from this ungracious, ungrateful world; and the greatest blessings of their age have been counted as the offscouring of all things. Would it not raise a pious indignation to see such a man as Pashur upon the bench, and such a man as Jeremiah in the stocks? It is well there is another life after this, when persons and things will appear with another face.

Secondly. God's just displeasure against Pashur, and the tokens of that. On the morrow Pashur gave Jeremiah his discharge, brought him out of the stocks, ver. 3; it is likely he continued him there, in little-ease, as long as was usual to continue any in that punishment; and now Jeremiah has a message from God to him. We do not find that when he put him into the stocks he gave him any check for what he did, but quietly and silently submitted to the abuse; "when he suffered, he threatened not;" but when he brought him out of the stocks, then God put a word into the prophet's mouth, which would awaken his conscience, if he had any. For when the prophet of the Lord was bound the word of the Lord was not. What can we think Pashur aimed at in smiting and abusing Jeremiah? Whatever it is, we shall see, by what God saith to him, he is disappointed.

1. Did he aim to establish himself, and make himself easy, by silencing one that told him of his faults, and would be likely to lessen his reputation with the people? He shall not gain this point; for, 1st. Though the prophet should be silent, his own conscience shall fly in his face, and make him always uneasy. To confirm this he shall have a name given him, "Magor-missabib,"—'Terror round about,' or 'Fear on every side.' God himself shall give him this name, whose calling him so will make him so. It seems to be a proverbial expression, bespeaking a man not only in distress but in despair; not only in danger on every side, (that a man may be, and yet by faith may be in no terror, as David, Ps. iii. 6, xxvii. 3,) but in fear on every side; and that a man may be when there appears no danger. "The wicked flee when no man pursues," are in great fear where no fear is. This shall be Pashur's case; ver. 4, "Behold, I will make thee a terror to thyself;" that is, thou shalt be subject to continual frights, and thy own fancy and imagination shall create thee a constant uneasiness. Note, God can make the most daring sinner a terror to himself; and will find out a way to frighten those that frighten his people from doing their duty. And those that will not hear of their faults from God's prophets, that are reprovers in the gate, shall be made to hear of them from conscience, which is a reprover in their own bosoms that will not be daunted or silenced. And miserable is the man that is thus made a terror to himself. Yet this is not all; some are very much a terror to themselves, but they conceal it, and seem to others to be pleasant; but I will make thee a terror "to all thy friends;" thou shalt upon all occasions express thyself with so much horror and amazement that all thy friends shall be afraid of conversing with thee, and shall choose to stand aloof from thy torment. Persons in deep melancholy and distraction are a terror to themselves and all about them; which is a good reason why we should be very thankful so long as God continues to us the use of our reason and the peace of our consciences. 2nd. His friends whom he put a confidence in, and perhaps studied to oblige in what he did against Jeremiah, shall all fail him. God doth not presently strike him dead for what he did against Jeremiah, but lets him live miserably, like Cain in the land of shaking; in such a continual consternation as that wherever he goes he shall be a monument of Divine justice; and when it is asked, What makes this man in such a continual terror? it shall be answered, It is God's hand upon him for putting Jeremiah in the stocks. His friends, that should encourage him, shall all be cut off; they shall fall by the sword of the enemy, and his eyes shall behold it; which dreadful sight will increase his terror. 3rd. He shall find in the issue his terror is not causeless, but that Divine vengeance is waiting for him, ver. 6. He and his family shall go into captivity, even to Babylon; he shall neither die before the evil comes, as Josiah, nor live to survive it, as some did, but he shall die a captive, and shall in effect be buried in his chains, he and all his friends. Thus far is the doom of Pashur. Let persecutors read it and tremble; tremble to repentance before they be made to tremble to their ruin.

2. Did he aim to keep the people easy, to prevent the destruction that Jeremiah prophesied of, and by sinking his reputation to make his words fall to the ground? It is probable he did; for it appears by ver. 6 he did himself set up for a prophet, and told the people they should have peace; he prophesied lies to them, and because Jeremiah's prophecy contradicted his, and tended to awaken those whom he endeavoured to rock asleep in their sins, therefore he set himself against him. But could he gain this point? No; Jeremiah stands to what he hath said against Judah and Jerusalem, and God by his mouth repeats it. Men get nothing by silencing those who reprove and warn them, for the word will have its course; so it had here. 1st. The country shall be ruined; ver. 4, "I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon." It had long been God's own land; but he will now transfer his title to it to Nebuchadnezzar, he shall be master of the country, and dispose of the inhabitants; some to the sword, and some to captivity, as he pleaseth; but none shall escape him. 2nd. The city shall be ruined too, ver. 5. The king of Babylon shall spoil that, and carry all that is valuable in it to Babylon. First. He shall seize their magazines and military stores, here called the strength of this city, and turn those against them. These they trusted to as their strength; but what stead could they stand them in when they had thrown themselves out of God's protection, and he who was indeed their strength was departed from them? Secondly. He shall carry off all their stock in trade, their wares and merchandises, here called their labours, because it was what they laboured about, and got by their labour. Thirdly. He shall plunder their fine houses, and take away their rich furniture, here called their precious things, because they valued them, and set their hearts upon them so much. Happy they who have secured to themselves precious things in God's precious promises, which are out of the reach of soldiers. Fourthly. He shall rifle the exchequer, and take away the jewels of the crown, "and all the treasures of the kings of Judah." This was that instance of the calamity which was first of all threatened to Hezekiah long ago, as his punishment for shewing his treasures to the king of Babylon's ambassadors, Isa. xxxix. 6. The treasury they thought was their defence; but that betrayed them, and became an easy prey to the enemy.

7 O LORD, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived:
Thou art stronger than I, and hast prevailed:
I am in derision daily, every one mocketh me.
8 For since I spake,
I cried out, I cried violence and spoil;
Because the word of the LORD was made
A reproach unto me, and a derision, daily.
9 Then I said, I will not make mention of him,
Nor speak any more in his name.
But his word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones,
And I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay.
10 For I heard the defaming of many, fear on every side.
Report, say they, and we will report it.
All my familiars watched for my halting, saying,
Peradventure he will be enticed, and we shall prevail against him,
And we shall take our revenge on him.
11 But the LORD is with me as a mighty terrible one:
Therefore my persecutors shall stumble, and they shall not prevail:

They shall be greatly ashamed; for they shall not prosper:
Their everlasting confusion shall never be forgotten.
12 But, O LORD of hosts, that triest the righteous, and seest the reins and the heart,
Let me see thy vengeance on them:
For unto thee have I opened my cause.
13 Sing unto the LORD, praise ye the LORD:
For he hath delivered the soul of the poor from the hand of evildoers.

Pashur's doom was to be a terror to himself. Jeremiah, even now, in this hour of temptation, is far from being so; and yet it cannot be denied but that he is here, through the infirmity of the flesh, at a mighty toss within himself. Good men are but men at the best; God is not extreme to mark what they say and do amiss, and therefore we must not be so, but make the best of it. In these verses it appears that upon occasion of the great indignity and injury that Pashur did to Jeremiah, there was a struggle in his breast between his graces and his corruptions. His discourse with himself and with his God upon this occasion was somewhat perplexed; let us try to methodize it.

First. Here is a sad representation of the wrong that was done him, and the affronts that were put upon him; and this representation no doubt was according to truth, and deserves no blame, but was very justly and very fitly made to him that sent him, and no doubt would bear him out. He complains,

1. That he was ridiculed and laughed at. They made a jest of every thing he said and did: and this cannot but be a great grievance to an ingenuous mind; ver. 7, 8, "I am in derision, I am mocked." They played upon him, and made themselves and one another merry with him, as if he had been a fool, good for nothing but to make sport. Thus he was continually, "I was in derision daily;" thus he was universally, "Every one mocks me;" the greatest so far forget their own gravity, and the meanest so far forget mine. Thus our Lord Jesus on the cross was reviled both by priests and people, and the revilings of each had their peculiar aggravation. And what was it that thus exposed him to contempt and scorn? It was nothing but his faithful and zealous discharge of his office, ver. 8. They could find nothing for which to deride him but his preaching; it was "the word of the Lord" that "was made a reproach." That for which they should have honoured and respected him, that he was intrusted to deliver the word of the Lord to them, was the very thing for which they reproached and reviled him. He never preached a sermon but, though he kept as close as possible to his instructions, they found something or other in it for which to banter and abuse him. Note, It is sad to think that, though Divine revelation be one of the greatest blessings and honours that ever was bestowed upon the world, yet it has been turned very much to the reproach of the most zealous preachers and believers of it. Two things they derided him for: 1st. The manner of his preaching. Since he spake he cried out. He had always been a lively, affectionate preacher, and since he began to speak in God's name he always spake as a man in earnest; he cried aloud, and did not spare, neither spared himself nor spared them to whom he preached; and this was enough for them to laugh at who hated to be serious. It is common for these that are unaffected with, and disaffected to, the things of God themselves, to ridicule those that are much affected with them. Lively preachers are the scorn of careless, unbelieving hearers. 2nd. The matter of his preaching. He cried, Violence and spoil. He reproved them for the violence and spoil which they were guilty of towards one another; and he prophesied of the violence and spoil which should be brought upon them as the punishment of that sin; for the former they ridiculed him as over precise, for the latter as over credulous; in both he was provoking to them, and therefore they resolved to run him down. This was bad enough, yet he complains farther,

2. That he was plotted against, and his ruin contrived. He was not only ridiculed as a weak man, but reproached and misrepresented as an ill man, and dangerous to the government. This he laments as his grievance, ver. 10. Being laughed at, though it touches a man in a point of honour, yet it is a thing that may be easily laughed at again; for, as it has been well observed, it is no shame to be laughed at, but to deserve to be so. But there were those that acted a more spiteful part, and with more subtlety. 1st. They spoke ill of him behind his back, when he had no opportunity of clearing himself, and were industrious to spread false reports concerning him. "I heard" at second hand "the defaming of many, fear on every side," 'of many Magor-missabibs,' so some read it, of many such men as Pashur was, and who may therefore expect his doom. Or, this was the matter of their defamation, they represented Jeremiah as a man that instilled fears and jealousies on every side into the minds of the people, and so made them uneasy under the government, and disposed them to a rebellion. Or, he perceived them so malicious against him, that he could not but be afraid on every side,—wherever he was he had reason to fear informers; so that they made him almost a Magor-missabib. These words are found in the original, verbatim,—'the same,' Ps. xxxi. 13, "I have heard the slander," or defaming, "of many; fear on every side." Jeremiah in his complaint chooseth to make use of the same words that David had made use of before him; that it might be a comfort to him to think that other good men had suffered the like abuses before him, and to teach us to make use of David's psalms with application to ourselves as there is occasion. Whatever we have to say we may from thence take with us words. See how Jeremiah's enemies contrived the matter; "Report, say they, and we will report it." They resolve to cast an odium upon him, and this is the method they take: let some very ill thing be said of him, which may render him obnoxious to the government, and though it be never so false we will second it, and spread it, and add to it; for the reproaches of good men lose nothing by the carriage. Do you that frame a story plausibly, or you that can pretend to some acquaintance with him, report it once, and we will all report it from you, in all companies that we come into. Do you say it, and we will swear it; do you set it a going, and we will follow it. And thus both are equally guilty, they that raise and they that propagate the false report. The receiver is as bad as the thief. 2nd. They flattered him to his face, that they might get something from him on which to ground an accusation; as the spies that came to Christ, feigning themselves to be just men, Lu. xx. 20; xi. 53, 54. His familiars, that he conversed freely with, and put a confidence in, watched for his halting, observed what he said,—which they could by any strained innuendo put an ill construction upon,—and carried it to his enemies. His case was very sad when those betrayed him whom he took to be his friends. They said among themselves, If we speak him fair and insinuate ourselves into his acquaintance, "peradventure he will be enticed" to own that he is in confederacy with the enemy, and a pensioner to the king of Babylon; or we shall wheedle him to speak some treasonable words, and then "we shall prevail against him, and take our revenge on him," for telling us of our faults, and threatening us with the judgments of God. Note, Neither the innocence of the dove, no, nor the prudence of the serpent to help it, can secure men from unjust censure and false accusation.

Secondly. Here is an account of the temptation he was in under this affliction; his feet were almost gone, as the psalmist's, Ps. lxxiii. 2. And this is that which is most to be dreaded in affliction, being driven by it to sin, Neh. vi. 13.

1. He was tempted to quarrel with God for making him a prophet. This he begins with, ver. 7, "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived;" this, as we read it, sounds very harsh. God's servants have always been ready to own that he is a faithful Master, and never cheated them; and therefore this is the language of Jeremiah's folly and corruption. If when God called him to be a prophet, and told him he would set him over the kingdoms, ch. i. 10, and make him a defenced city, he flattered himself with an expectation of having universal respect paid him as a messenger from heaven, and living safe and easy, and afterwards it proved otherwise, he must not say God had deceived him, but he had deceived himself, for he knew how the prophets before him had been persecuted, and had no reason to expect any better treatment. Nay, God had expressly told him, that all the princes, priests, and people of the land would fight against him, ch. i. 19; which he had forgot, else he would not have laid the blame on God thus. Christ thus told his disciples what opposition they should meet with, that they might not be offended, Jno. xvi. 1, 2. But the words may very well be read thus, 'Thou hast persuaded me, and I was persuaded;' it is the same word that is used, Gen. ix. 27, marg., 'God shall persuade Japheth;' and Pr. xxv. 15, "By much forbearance is a prince persuaded;" and Hos. ii. 14, "I will allure her." And this agrees best with what follows, "Thou art stronger than I," didst overpersuade me with argument; nay, didst overpower me by the influence of thy Spirit upon me, "and hast prevailed." Jeremiah was very backward to undertake the prophetical office; he pleaded that he was under age, and unfit for the service; but God overruled his pleas, and told him he must go, ch. i. 6, 7. Now, Lord, saith he, since thou didst put this office upon me, why dost thou not stand by me in it? Had I thrust myself upon it, I might justly have been in derision; but why am I so, when thou didst thrust me into it? It was Jeremiah's infirmity to complain thus of God, as putting a hardship upon him in calling him to be a prophet; which he would not have done had he considered the lasting honour thereby done him sufficient to balance the present contempt he was under. Note, As long as we see ourselves in the way of God and duty, it is weakness and folly, when we meet with difficulties and discouragements in it, to wish we had never set out in it.

2. He was tempted to quit his work, and give it over, partly because he himself met with so much hardship in it; and partly because those to whom he was sent, instead of being edified and made better, were exasperated and made worse; ver. 9, "Then I said," since by prophesying in the name of the Lord, I gain nothing to him or myself but dishonour and disgrace, "I will not make mention of him;" as my author for any thing I say, "nor speak any more in his name;" since my enemies do all they can to silence me, I will even silence myself, and speak no more, since I had as good speak to the stones as to them. Note, It is a strong temptation to poor ministers, to resolve they will preach no more, when they see their preaching slighted, and wholly ineffectual. But let people dread putting their ministers into this temptation. Let not their labour be in vain with us, lest we provoke them to say, They will take no more pains with us; and provoke God to say, They shall take no more. Yet let not ministers hearken to this temptation, but go on in their duty notwithstanding their discouragements, for this is the more thankworthy; and though Israel be not gathered, yet they shall be glorious.

Thirdly. Here is an account of his faithful adherence to his work, and cheerful dependence on his God notwithstanding.

1. He found the grace of God mighty in him to keep him to his business, notwithstanding the temptation he was in to throw it up. "I said" in my haste "I will speak no more in his name;" what I have in my heart to deliver I will stifle and suppress. But I soon found it "was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones," which glowed inwardly, and must have vent; it was impossible to smother it. I was like a man in a burning fever, uneasy, and in a continual toss; "while I kept silence from good, my heart was hot within me;" it was pain and grief to me, and "I must speak that I may be refreshed," Job xxxii. 20; Ps. xxxix. 2, 3. "While I kept silence my bones waxed old," Ps. xxxii. 3. See the power of the spirit of prophecy in those that were acted by it; and thus will a holy zeal for God even eat men up, and make them forget themselves; "I believed, therefore have I spoken." Jeremiah was soon weary with forbearing to preach, and could not contain himself; nothing puts faithful ministers to so much pain as being silenced, nor to so much terror as silencing themselves. Their convictions will soon triumph over temptations of that kind; for "woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel" whatever it cost me, 1 Cor. ix. 16. And it is really a mercy to have the word of God thus mighty in us to overpower our corruptions.

2. He was assured of God's presence with him; which would be sufficient to baffle all the attempts of his enemies against him, ver. 11. They say, "We shall prevail against him," the day will undoubtedly be our own; but I am sure "they shall not prevail, they shall not prosper," I can safely set them all at defiance, for "the Lord is with me," is on my side, to take my part against them, (Rom. viii. 31,) to protect me from all their malicious designs upon me; he is with me to support me, and bear me up under the burthen which now presseth me down; he is with me to make the word I preach answer the end he designs, though not the end I desire; he "is with me as a mighty terrible one," to strike a terror upon them, and so overcome them. Note, Even that in God which is terrible is really comfortable to his servants that trust in him, for it shall be turned against those that seek to terrify his people. God's being a mighty God speaks him a terrible God to all those that take up arms against him, or any that like Jeremiah was commissioned by him. How terrible will the wrath of God be to those that think to daunt all about them, and will themselves be daunted by nothing! The most formidable enemies that act against us appear despicable when we see the Lord for us as a mighty terrible one, Neh. iv. 14. Jeremiah speaks now with a good assurance; If the Lord be with me, my persecutors shall stumble, so that when they pursue me they shall not overtake me, Ps. xxvii. 2; and then they shall be greatly ashamed of their impotent malice, and fruitless attempts. Nay, their everlasting confusion and infamy shall never be forgotten; they shall not forget it themselves, but it shall be to them a constant and lasting vexation, whenever they think of it; others shall not forget it, but it shall leave upon them an indelible reproach.

3. He appeals to God against them as a righteous Judge, and prays judgment upon his cause, ver. 12. He looks upon God as the God that tries the righteous, takes cognizance of them, and of every cause that they are interested in. He doth not judge in favour of them with partiality, but tries them; and finding they have right on their side, and their persecutors wrong them, and are injurious to them, he gives sentence for them. He that tries the righteous tries the unrighteous too, and he is very well qualified to do both; for he sees the reins and the heart, he certainly knows men's thoughts and affections, their aims and intentions, and therefore can pass an unerring judgment on their words and actions. Now this is the God, 1st. To whom the prophet here refers himself, and in whose court he lodgeth his appeal; "Unto thee have I opened my cause." Not but that God perfectly knew his cause, and all the merits of it without his opening; but the cause we commit to God we must spread before him: he knows it, but he will know it from us; and allows us to be particular in the opening of it, not to affect him, but to affect ourselves. Note, It will be an ease to our spirits, when we are oppressed and burthened, to open our cause to God, and pour out our complaint before him. 2nd. By whom he expects to be righted. "Let me see thy vengeance on them," such vengeance as thou thinkest fit to take for their conviction and my vindication; the vengeance thou usest to take on persecutors. Note, Whatever injuries are done us, we must not study to avenge ourselves, but must leave it to that God to do it to whom vengeance belongs, and who hath said, I will repay.

4. He greatly rejoiceth and praiseth God, in a full confidence that God would appear for his deliverance, ver. 13; so full is he of the comfort of God's presence with him, and the Divine protection he is under, and the Divine promise he has to depend upon, that in a transport of joy he stirs up himself and others to give God the glory of it; "Sing unto the Lord, praise ye the Lord." Here appears a great change with him, since he began this discourse; the clouds are blown over, his complaints all silenced, and turned into thanksgivings. He has now an entire confidence in that God whom, ver. 7, he was distrusting; stirs up himself to praise that name which, ver. 9, he was resolving no more to make mention of. It was the lively exercise of faith that made this happy change, that turned his sighs into songs, and his tremblings into triumphs. It is proper to express our hope in God by our praising him, and our praising of God by our singing to him. That which is the matter of the praise is, "He hath delivered the soul of the poor from the hands of the evil-doers;" he means especially himself, his own poor soul. He hath delivered me formerly, when I was in distress, and now of late out of the hand of Pashur, and he will continue to deliver me, 2 Cor. i. 10. He will deliver my soul from the sin that I am in danger of falling into, when I am thus persecuted; he hath delivered me from the hand of evil-doers, so that they have not gained their point, nor had their will. Note, Those that are faithful in well-doing need not fear those that are spiteful in evil-doing, for they have a God to trust to, who has well-doers under the hand of his protection, and evil-doers under the hand of his restraint.

14 Cursed be the day wherein I was born:
Let not the day wherein my mother bare me be blessed.
15 Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father,
Saying, A man child is born unto thee;
Making him very glad.
16 And let that man be as the cities
Which the LORD overthrew, and repented not:
And let him hear the cry in the morning,
And the shouting at noontide;
17 Because he slew me not from the womb;
Or that my mother might have been my grave,
And her womb to be always great with me.
18 Wherefore came I forth out of the womb
To see labour and sorrow,
That my days should be consumed with shame?

What is the meaning of this? Doth there proceed out of the same mouth blessing and cursing? Could he that said so cheerfully, ver. 13, "Sing unto the Lord, praise ye the Lord," say so passionately, ver. 14, "Cursed be the day wherein I was born?" How shall we reconcile these? What we have in these verses, I suppose the prophet records to his own shame, as he had recorded that in the foregoing verses to God's glory. It seems to be a relation of the toss he had been in while he was in the stocks, out of which by faith and hope he had recovered himself, rather than a new temptation which he afterwards fell into; and it should come in like that of David, Ps. xxxi. 22, "I said in my haste, I am cut off;" which is also implied, Ps. lxxvii. 7. When grace has got the victory, it is good to remember the struggles of corruption, that we may be ashamed of ourselves and our own folly; may admire the goodness of God in not taking us at our word, and may be warned by it to double our guard upon our spirits another time. See here how strong the temptation was which the prophet by Divine assistance got the victory over, and how far he yielded to it, that we may not despair, if we through the weakness of the flesh be at any time thus tempted. Let us see here,

First. What the prophet's language was in this temptation. 1. He fastened a brand of infamy upon his birthday, as Job did in a heat; ch. iii. 1, "Cursed be the day wherein I was born." It was an ill day to me, ver. 14, because it was the beginning of sorrows, and an inlet to all this misery. It is a wish that he had never been born; Judas in hell has reason to wish so, Mat. xxvi. 24. But no man on earth has reason to wish so, because he knows not but he may yet become a vessel of mercy, much less has any good man reason to wish so. Whereas some keep their birthday in the return of the year with gladness, he will look upon his birthday as a melancholy day, and will solemnize it with sorrow, and will have it looked upon as an ominous day. 2. He wished ill to the messenger that brought his father the news of his birth, ver. 15. It made his father very glad to hear that he had a child born, (perhaps it was his first-born,) especially that it was a manchild, for then, being of the family of the priests, he might live to have the honour of serving God's altar; and yet he is ready to curse the man that brought the tidings, when perhaps the father to whom they were brought gave him a gratuity for it. Here Mr. Gataker well observes, 'That parents are often much rejoiced at the birth of their children, when, if they did foresee what misery they are born to, they would rather lament over them than rejoice in them.' He is very free and very fierce in the curses he pronounces upon the messenger of his birth; ver. 16, "Let him be as the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, which the Lord utterly overthrew, and repented not;" that is, did not in the least mitigate or alleviate their misery. "Let him hear the cry" of the invading, besieging enemy "in the morning," as soon as he is stirring; then let him take the alarm, and by noon let him hear their shouting for victory; and thus let him live in constant terror. 3. He is angry that the fate of the Hebrews' children in Egypt was not his, that he was not slain from the womb, that his first breath was not made his last, and that he was not strangled as soon as he came into the world, ver. 17. He wisheth the messenger of his birth had been better employed, and had been his murderer; nay, that his mother of whom he was born, had been to her great misery always with child of him; and so the womb in which he was conceived would have served without more ado as a grave for him to be buried in; and Job intimates a near alliance and resemblance between the womb and the grave, Job i. 21, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither." 4. He thinks his present calamities sufficient to justify these passionate wishes; ver. 18, "Wherefore came I forth out of the womb" where I lay hid, was not seen, was not hated, where I lay safe and knew no evil, "to see" all this "labour and sorrow;" nay, to have my days consumed with shame, to be continually vexed and abused; not only to have my life spent in trouble, but wasted and worn away by trouble?

Secondly. What use we may make of this. It is not recorded for our imitation, and yet we may learn good lessons from it. 1. See the vanity of human life, and the vexation of spirit that attends it; if there were not another life after this, we should be tempted many a time to wish we had never known this, for our few days here are full of trouble. 2. See the folly and absurdity of sinful passion, how unreasonably it talks when it is suffered to ramble. What nonsense is it to curse a day—to curse a messenger for the sake of his message! What a brutish, barbarous thing for a child to wish his own mother had never been delivered of him! see Isa. xlv. 10. We can easily see the folly of it in others, and should take warning from thence to suppress all such intemperate heats and passions in ourselves, to stifle them at first, and not suffer these evil spirits to speak. When the heart is hot, let the tongue be bridled, Ps. xxxix. 1, 2. 3. See the weakness even of good men, who are but men at the best; see how much those who think they stand are concerned to take heed lest they fall; and to pray daily, Father in heaven, "lead us not into temptation."

CHAPTER XXI.

It is plain the prophecies of this book are not placed here in the same order that they were preached; for there are chapters after this which concern Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Jeconiah, who all reigned before Zedekiah, in whose reign the prophecy of this chapter bears date. Here is, I. The message which Zedekiah sent to the prophet, to desire him to inquire of the Lord for them, ver. 1, 2. II. The answer which Jeremiah in God's name sent to that message, in which he, 1. Foretells the certain and inevitable ruin of the city, and the fruitlessness of their attempts for its preservation, ver. 3—7; 2. He adviseth the people to make the best of bad, by going over to the king of Babylon, ver. 8—10; 3. He adviseth the king and his family to repent and reform, ver. 11, 12, and not to trust to the strength of their city, and grow secure, ver. 13, 14.

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, when king Zedekiah sent unto him Pashur the son of Melchiah, and Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest, saying, 2 Enquire, I pray thee, of the LORD for us; for Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon maketh war against us; if so be that the LORD will deal with us according to all his wondrous works, that he may go up from us. 3 Then said Jeremiah unto them, Thus shall ye say to Zedekiah: 4 Thus saith the LORD God of Israel; Behold, I will turn back the weapons of war that are in your hands, wherewith ye fight against the king of Babylon, and against the Chaldeans, which besiege you without the walls, and I will assemble them into the midst of this city. 5 And I myself will fight against you with an outstretched hand and with a strong arm, even in anger, and in fury, and in great wrath. 6 And I will smite the inhabitants of this city, both man and beast: they shall die of a great pestilence. 7 And afterward, saith the LORD, I will deliver Zedekiah king of Judah, and his servants, and the people, and such as are left in this city from the pestilence, from the sword, and from the famine, into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of those that seek their life: and he shall smite them with the edge of the sword; he shall not spare them, neither have pity, nor have mercy.

Here is, First. A very humble decent message which king Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah the prophet when he was in distress. It is indeed charged upon this Zedekiah that he "humbled not himself before Jeremiah the prophet, speaking from the mouth of the Lord," 2 Chr. xxxvi. 12; he did not always humble himself as he did sometimes, never humbled himself till necessity forced him to it; he humbled himself so far as to desire the prophet's assistance, but not so far as to take his advice or be ruled by him. Observe,

1. The distress which king Zedekiah was now in. Nebuchadrezzar made war upon him, not only invaded the land, but besieged the city, and had now actually invested it. Note, Those that put the evil day far from them, will be the more terrified when it comes upon them. And they who before slighted God's ministers may then perhaps be glad to court an acquaintance with them.

2. The messengers he sent, Pashur and Zephaniah, one of the fifth course of the priests, the other of the twenty-fourth, 1 Chr. xxiv. 9, 18. It was well that he sent persons of rank, but it had been better if he had desired a personal conference with the prophet, which no doubt he might easily have had if he would so far have humbled himself. Perhaps these priests were no better than the rest, and yet, when they were commanded by the king, they must carry a respectful message to the prophet, which was both a mortification to them, and an honour to Jeremiah. He had rashly said, ch. xx. 18, "My days are consumed with shame," and yet here we find that he lived to see better days than those were when he made that complaint; now he appears in reputation. Note, It is folly to say when things are bad with us, they will be always so. It is possible that those that are despised may come to be respected, and it is promised that those who honour God he will honour, and those who have afflicted his people shall bow to them, Isa. lx. 14.

3. The message itself; "Inquire, I pray thee, of the Lord for us," ver. 2. Now the Chaldean army was got into their borders, into their bowels, they were at length convinced that Jeremiah was a true prophet, though loath to own it, and brought too late to it; under this conviction they desire him to stand their friend with God, believing him to have that interest in heaven which none of their other prophets had, that had flattered them with hopes of peace. They now employ Jeremiah, 1st. To consult the mind of God for them; "Inquire of the Lord for us," ask him what course we shall take in our present strait; for the measures we have hitherto taken are all broken. Note, Those that will not take the direction of God's grace how to get clear of their sins, would yet be glad of the directions of his providence, how to get clear of their troubles. 2nd. To seek the favour of God for them. So some read it, Entreat the Lord for us; be an intercessor for us with God. Note, Those that slight the prayers of God's people and ministers when they are in prosperity may perhaps be glad of an interest in them when they come to be in distress: "Give us of your oil." The benefit they promise themselves is, "It may be the Lord will deal with us now according to the wondrous works he wrought for our fathers, that the enemy may raise the siege, and go up from us." Observe, First. All their care is to get rid of their trouble, not to make their peace with God, and be reconciled to him; that our enemy may go up from us, not that our God may return to us. Thus Pharaoh, Ex. x. 17, "Entreat the Lord that he may take away this death." Secondly. All their hope is that God hath done wondrous works formerly, in the deliverance of Jerusalem, when Sennacherib besieged it, at the prayer of Isaiah, so we are told, 2 Chr. xxxii. 20, 21. And who can tell but he may destroy these besiegers (as he did those) at the prayer of Jeremiah? But they did not consider how different the character of Zedekiah and his people was from that of Hezekiah and his people. Those were days of general reformation and piety; these, of general corruption and apostacy. Jerusalem is now the reverse of what it was then. Note, It is folly to think that God should do for us while we hold fast our iniquity as he did for those that held fast their integrity.

Secondly. A very startling, cutting reply, which God, by the prophet, sent to that message. If Jeremiah had been to have answered the message of himself, we have reason to think he would have returned a comfortable answer, in hopes their sending such a message was an indication of some good purposes in them, which he would be glad to make the best of, for he did not desire the woful day. But God knows their hearts better than Jeremiah doth, and sends them an answer which hath scarce one word of comfort in it. He sends it them in the name of "the Lord God of Israel," ver. 4, to intimate to them that, though God allowed himself to be called the God of Israel, and had done great things for Israel formerly, and had still great things in store for Israel, pursuant to his covenants with them, yet this should stand the present generation in no stead, who were Israelites in name only, and not indeed, any more than God's dealings with them should cut off his relation to Israel as their God. It is here foretold,

1. That God will render all their endeavours for their own security fruitless and ineffectual, ver. 4. I will be so far from teaching your hands to war, and putting an edge upon your swords, that I will "turn back the weapons of war that are in your hand," when you sally out upon the besiegers to beat them off, so that they shall not give the stroke you design; nay, they shall recoil into your own faces, and be turned upon yourselves. Nothing can make for those who have God against them.

2. That the besiegers shall in a little time make themselves masters of Jerusalem, and of all its wealth and strength. "I will assemble them in the midst of this city," that are now surrounding it. Note, If that place which should have been a centre of devotion be made a centre of wickedness, it is not strange if God make it a rendezvous of destroyers.

3. That God himself will be their enemy, and then I know not who can befriend them, no, not Jeremiah himself; ver. 5, I will be so far from protecting you, as I have done formerly in a like case, that "I myself will fight against you." Note, Those who rebel against God may justly expect that he will make war upon them. And that, 1st. With the power of a God, which is irresistibly victorious. I will fight against you "with an outstretched hand," which will reach far, and "with a strong arm," which will strike home, and wound deep. 2nd. With the displeasure of a God, which is indisputably righteous. It is not a correction in love, but an execution in anger, and in fury, and in great wrath; it is upon a sentence sworn in wrath, against which there will lie no exception. And it will soon be found what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God.

4. That those who for their own safety decline sallying out upon the besiegers, and so avoid their sword, yet shall not escape the sword of God's justice; ver. 6, I will smite those that abide in the city, (so it may be read,) both man and beast; both the beasts that are for food and those that are for service in war, foot and horse, they shall die of a great pestilence, which shall rage within the walls, while the enemies are encamped about them. Though Jerusalem's gates and walls may for a time keep out the Chaldeans, they cannot keep out God's judgments. His arrows of pestilence can reach those that think themselves safe from other arrows.

5. That the king himself, and all the people that escape the sword, famine and pestilence, shall fall into the hands of the Chaldeans, who shall cut them off in cold blood, ver. 7. They shall not spare them, nor have pity on them. Let not them expect to find mercy with men that have forfeited God's compassions, and shut themselves out from his mercy. Thus was the decree gone forth, and then to what purpose was it for Jeremiah to inquire of the Lord for them?

8 And unto this people thou shalt say, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I set before you the way of life, and the way of death. 9 He that abideth in this city shall die by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth out, and falleth to the Chaldeans that besiege you, he shall live, and his life shall be unto him for a prey. 10 For I have set my face against this city for evil, and not for good, saith the LORD: it shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire. 11 And touching the house of the king of Judah, say, Hear ye the word of the LORD; 12 O house of David, thus saith the LORD; Execute judgment in the morning, and deliver him that is spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor, lest my fury go out like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings. 13 Behold, I am against thee, O inhabitant of the valley, and rock of the plain, saith the LORD; which say, Who shall come down against us? or who shall enter into our habitations? 14 But I will punish you according to the fruit of your doings, saith the LORD: and I will kindle a fire in the forest thereof, and it shall devour all things round about it.

FIRE IN THE PRAIRIES.

By the civil message which the king sent to Jeremiah, it appeared that both he and the people began to have a respect for him, which it had been Jeremiah's policy to make some advantage of for himself; but the reply which God obligeth him to make is enough to crush that little respect they begin to have for him, and to exasperate them against him more than ever. Not only the predictions in the foregoing verses were provoking, but the prescriptions in these verses. For here,

First. He adviseth the people to surrender, and desert to the Chaldeans, as the only means left them to save their lives, ver. 8—10. This counsel was very displeasing to those who were flattered by their false prophets into a desperate resolution to hold out to the last extremity, trusting to the strength of their walls and courage of their soldiery to keep out the enemy, or to their foreign aids to raise the siege. The prophet assures them the city "shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon," and he shall not only plunder it, but "burn it with fire,"—for God himself hath "set his face against this city for evil, and not for good;" to lay it waste, and not to protect it; for evil which shall have no good mixed with it, no mitigation or merciful alloy,—and therefore, if you would make the best of bad, you must beg quarter of the Chaldeans, and surrender prisoners of war. In vain did Rabshakeh persuade the Jews to do this while they had God for them, Isa. xxxvi. 16; but it was the best course they could take now God was against them. Both the law and the prophets had often set before them life and death in another sense; life, if they obey the voice of God; death, if they persist in disobedience, Deu. xxx. 19. But they had slighted that life which would have made them truly happy, to upbraid them with which the prophet here useth the same expression, ver. 8. "Behold, I set before you the way of life, and the way of death," which speaks not as that, a fair proposal, but a melancholy dilemma, advising them of two evils to choose the least; and that lesser evil, a shameful and wretched captivity, is all the life now left for them to propose to themselves. He that abides in the city, and trusts to that to secure him, shall certainly die either by the sword without the walls or famine or pestilence within. But he that can so far bring down his spirit, and quit his vain hopes, as to go out and fall to the Chaldeans, his "life shall be given him for a prey," that is, he shall save his life, but with much difficulty and hazard, as a prey is taken from the mighty. It is an expression like that, "He shall be saved, yet so as by fire." He shall escape but very narrowly. Or, he shall have such a surprising joy and satisfaction, in escaping with his life from such a universal destruction, as shall equal theirs that divide the spoil. They thought to have made a prey of the camp of the Chaldeans, as their ancestors did of that of the Assyrians, Isa. xxxiii. 23, but they will be sadly disappointed; if by yielding at discretion they can but save their lives, that is all the prey they must promise themselves. Now one would think this advice from a prophet in God's name should have gained some credit with them, and been universally followed; but, for aught appears, there were few or none that took it: so wretchedly were their hearts hardened to their destruction.

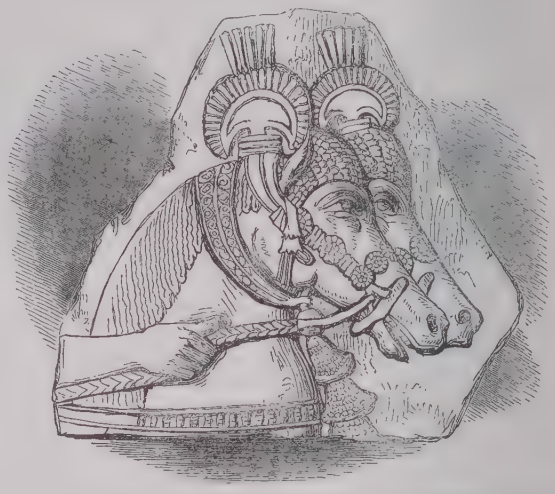
Secondly. He adviseth the king and princes to reform and make conscience of the duty of their place. Because it was the king that sent the message to him, in the reply there shall be a particular word for the house of the king, not to compliment or court them, that was no part of a prophet's business, no, not when they did him the honour to send to him, but to give them wholesome counsel; ver. 11, 12, "Execute judgment in the morning," do it carefully and diligently. Those magistrates that would fill up their place with duty had need rise betimes. Do it quickly, and do not delay to do justice upon appeals made to you, and tire out poor petitioners, as you have done. Do not lie in your beds in a morning, to sleep away the debauch of the night before; nor spend the morning in pampering the body, as those princes, Eccl. x. 16, but spend it in the despatch of business. You would be delivered out of the hand of those that distress you, and expect that therein God should do you justice; see then that you do justice to those that apply themselves to you, and "deliver them out of the hand of their oppressors, lest my fury go out like fire" against you in a particular manner, and you fare worst, who think to escape best, because of the evil of your doings. Now, 1. This intimates that it was their neglect to do their duty that brought all this desolation upon the people. It was the evil of their doings that kindled the fire of God's wrath. Thus plainly doth he deal even with the house of the king; for those that would have the benefit of a prophet's prayers must thankfully take a prophet's reproofs. 2. This directs them to take the right method for a national reformation. The princes must begin and set a good example, and then the people will be invited to reform. They must use their power for the punishment of wrong, and then the people will be obliged to reform. He minds them that they are the house of David, and therefore should tread in his steps, who executed judgment and justice to his people. 3. This gives them some encouragement to hope that there may yet be a lengthening of their tranquillity, Dan. iv. 27. If any thing will recover their state from the brink of ruin this will.

Thirdly. He shews them the vanity of all their hopes, so long as they continued unreformed, ver. 13, 14. Jerusalem is an inhabitant of the valley, guarded with mountains on all sides, which were their natural fortifications, making it difficult for an army to approach them; it is a rock of the plain, which made it difficult for an enemy to undermine them. These advantages of their situation they trusted to more than to the power and promise of God. And thinking their city by these means to be impregnable, they set the judgments of God at defiance, saying, "Who shall come down against us?" None of our neighbours dare make a descent upon us; or, if they do, "Who shall enter into our habitations?" They had some colour for this confidence, for it appears to have been the sense of all their neighbours that no enemy could force his way into Jerusalem, Lam. iv. 12. But those are least safe that are most secure. God soon shews the vanity of that challenge, "Who shall come down against us?" when he saith, ver. 13, "Behold, I am against thee." They had indeed by their wickedness driven God out of their city, when he would have tarried with them as a friend; but they could not by their bulwarks keep him out of their city when he came against them as an enemy. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" but if he be against us, who can be for us to stand us in any stead? Nay, he comes against them not as an enemy, that may lawfully, and with some hope of success, be resisted; but as a judge, that cannot be resisted, for he saith, ver. 14, "I will punish you," by due course of law, "according to the fruit of your doings," that is, according to the merit of them, and the direct tendency of them. That shall be brought upon you which is the natural product of sin. Nay, he will not only come with the anger of an enemy, and the justice of a judge, but with the force of a consuming fire, which has no compassion, as a judge sometimes has, nor spares any thing combustible that comes in its way. Jerusalem is become a forest, in which God will kindle a fire that shall consume all before it; for our God is himself a consuming fire, and who is able to stand in his sight when once he is angry?

CHAPTER XXII.

Upon occasion of the message sent in the foregoing chapter to the house of the king, we have here recorded some sermons which Jeremiah preached at court, in some preceding reigns, that it might appear they had had fair warning long before that fatal sentence was pronounced upon them, and were yet in a way to have prevented it. Here is, I. A message sent to the royal family, as it should seem in the reign of Jehoiakim, relating partly to Jehoahaz, who was carried away captive into Egypt, and partly to Jehoiakim, who succeeded him, and was now upon the throne. The king and princes are exhorted to execute judgment, and are assured that if they did so, the royal family should flourish, but otherwise it should be ruined, ver. 1—10; Jehoahaz, called here Shallum, is lamented, ver. 10—12; Jehoiakim is reproved and threatened, ver. 13—19. II. Another message sent them in the reign of Jehoiakim, alias Jeconiah, the son of Jehoiakim; he is charged with an obstinate refusal to hear, threatened with destruction, and it is foretold that in him Solomon's house should fail, ver. 20—30.

THUS saith the LORD; Go down to the house of the king of Judah, and speak there this word,
2 And say,
Hear the word of the LORD, O king of Judah,
That sittest upon the throne of David,
Thou, and thy servants, and thy people
That enter in by these gates:
3 Thus saith the LORD;
Execute ye judgment and righteousness,
And deliver the spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor:
And do no wrong, do no violence
To the stranger, the fatherless, nor the widow,
Neither shed innocent blood in this place.
4 For if ye do this thing indeed,
Then shall there enter in by the gates of this house
Kings sitting upon the throne of David,
Riding in chariots and on horses,
He, and his servants, and his people



HEADS AND TRAPPINGS OF ROYAL HORSES—FROM THE ASSYRIAN MARBLES.

5 But if ye will not hear these words,
I swear by myself, saith the LORD,
That this house shall become a desolation.
6 For thus saith the LORD unto the king's house of Judah;
Thou art Gilead unto me, and the head of Lebanon:
Yet surely I will make thee a wilderness,
And cities which are not inhabited.
7 And I will prepare destroyers against thee,
Every one with his weapons:
And they shall cut down thy choice cedars,
And cast them into the fire.
8 And many nations shall pass by this city,
And they shall say every man to his neighbour,
Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this great city?
9 Then they shall answer,
Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD their God,
And worshipped other gods, and served them.

Here is, First. Orders given to Jeremiah to go preach before the king. In the chapter before, Zedekiah sent messengers to the prophet, but here the prophet is bidden to go in his own proper person to the house of the king, and demand his attention to the word of the King of kings; ver. 2, "Hear the word of the Lord, O king of Judah." Subjects must own that where the word of a king is there is power over them; but kings must own that where the word of the Lord is there is power over them. The king of Judah is here spoken to as sitting upon the throne of David, who was a man after God's own heart, as holding their dignity and power by the covenant made with him; let them, therefore, conform to his example, that they may have the benefit of the promises made to him. With the king his servants are spoken to, because a good government depends upon a good ministry as well as a good king.

Secondly. Instructions given him what to preach.

1. He must tell them what was their duty, what was the good which the Lord their God required of them, ver. 3. They must take care, 1st. That they do all the good they can with the power they have. They must do justice in defence of those that were injured, and must "deliver the spoiled out of the hand of their oppressors;" this was the duty of their place, Ps. lxxxii. 3. Herein they must be ministers of God for good. 2nd. That they do no hurt with it, no wrong, no violence. That is the greatest wrong and violence which is done under colour of law and justice, and by those whose business it is to punish and protect from wrong and violence. They must do no wrong to the stranger, fatherless, and widow, for these God doth in a particular manner patronise and take under his tuition, Ex. xxii. 21, 22.

2. He must assure them that the faithful discharge of their duty would advance and secure their prosperity, ver. 4. There shall then be a succession of kings, an uninterrupted succession upon the throne of David and of his line; these enjoying a perfect tranquillity, and living in great state and dignity, riding on chariots and horses, as before, ch. xvii. 25. Note, The most effectual way to preserve the dignity of the government is to do the duty of it.

3. He must likewise assure them that the iniquity of their family, if they persisted in it, would be the ruin of their family, though it was a royal family;

ver. 5, "If ye will not hear," will not obey, "this house shall become a desolation," the palace of the kings of Judah shall fare no better than other habitations in Jerusalem. Sin has often been the ruin of royal palaces, though never so stately, never so strong. This sentence is ratified by an oath; "I swear by myself,"—and God can swear by no greater, Heb. vi. 12,—that this house shall be laid in ruins. Note, Sin will be the ruin of the houses of princes as well as of mean men.

4. He must shew how fatal their wickedness would be to their kingdom as well as to themselves, to Jerusalem especially, the royal city, ver. 6—9. 1st. It is confessed that Judah and Jerusalem had been valuable in God's eyes, and considerable in their own; "Thou art Gilead unto me, and the head of Lebanon." Their lot was cast in a place that was rich and pleasant as Gilead; Zion was a stronghold, as stately as Lebanon; this they trusted to as their security. But, 2nd. This shall not protect them. The country that is now fruitful as Gilead shall be made a wilderness; the cities that are now strong as Lebanon shall be cities not inhabited; and when the country is laid waste the cities must be dispeopled. See how easily God's judgments can ruin a nation, and how certainly sin will do it.

When this desolating work is to be done, First. There shall be those that shall do it effectually; ver. 7, "I will prepare destroyers against thee," I will 'sanctify' them, (so the word is,) I will appoint them to this service, and use them in it. Note, When destruction is designed, destroyers are prepared, and perhaps are in the preparing, and things are working towards the designed destruction, and are getting ready for it long before. And who can contend with destroyers of God's preparing? They shall destroy cities as easily as men fell trees in a forest. "They shall cut down thy choice cedars," and yet when they are down shall value them no more than thorns and briars, they shall "cast them into the fire," for their choicest cedars are become rotten ones, and good for nothing else. Secondly. There shall be those who shall be ready to justify God in the doing of it, ver. 8, 9. Persons of many nations, when they pass by the ruins of this city in their travels will ask, "Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this city?" How came so strong a city to be overpowered? so rich a city to be impoverished? so populous a city to be depopulated? so holy a city to be profaned? and a city that had been so dear to God to be abandoned by him? And the reason is so obvious that it shall be ready in every man's mouth; "Ask them that go by the way," Job xxi. 29; ask the next man you meet, and he will tell you it was because they changed their gods, which other nations never used to do; they forsook the covenant of Jehovah, their own God, revolted from their allegiance to him, and from the duty which their covenant with him bound them to, and they worshipped other gods, and served them in contempt of him, and therefore he gave them up to this destruction. Note, God never casts any off till they first cast him off. Go, saith God to the prophet, and preach this to the royal family.

10 Weep ye not for the dead,
Neither bemoan him:
But weep sore for him that goeth away·
For he shall return no more,
Nor see his native country.
11 For thus saith the LORD
Touching Shallum the son of Josiah king of Judah,
Which reigned instead of Josiah his father,
Which went forth out of this place;
He shall not return thither any more:
12 But he shall die in the place whither they have led him
And shall see this land no more. [captive,
13 Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness,
And his chambers by wrong;
That useth his neighbour's service without wages,
And giveth him not for his work;
14 That saith,
I will build me a wide house and large chambers,
And cutteth him out windows;
And it is cieled with cedar, and painted with vermilion.
15 Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar?
Did not thy father eat and drink,
And do judgment and justice,
And then it was well with him?
16 He judged the cause of the poor and needy;
Then it was well with him:
Was not this to know me? saith the LORD.
17 But thine eyes and thine heart are not
But for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood,
And for oppression, and for violence, to do it.
18 Therefore thus saith the LORD
Concerning Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah;
They shall not lament for him, saying,
Ah my brother! or, Ah sister!
They shall not lament for him, saying,
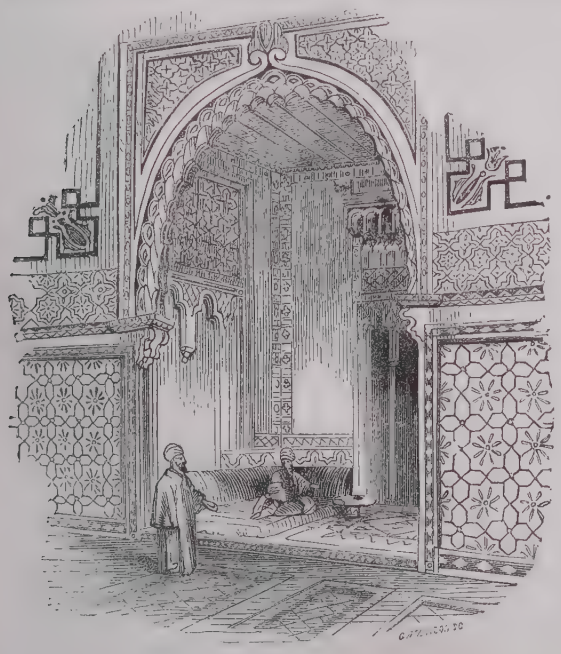
Ah lord! or, Ah his glory!
19 He shall be buried with the burial of an ass,
Drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.



PAINTED ARABESQUE HALL.—ver. 14.

Kings, though they are gods to us, they are men to God, and shall die like men; so it appears in those verses, where we have a sentence of death passed upon two kings that reigned successively in Jerusalem, two brothers, and both the ungracious sons of a very pious father.

First. Here is the doom of Shallum, who doubtless is the same with Jehoahaz, for he is that "son of Josiah, king of Judah, who reigned in the stead of Josiah his father," ver. 11, which Jehoahaz did by the act of the people, who made him king though he was not the eldest son, 2 Kin. xxiii. 30; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 1. Among the sons of Josiah, 1 Chr. iii. 15, there is one Shallum mentioned, and not Jehoahaz. Perhaps the people preferred him before his elder brother because they thought him a more active, daring young man, and fitter to rule; but God soon shewed them the folly of their injustice, and that it could not prosper, for within three months the king of Egypt came upon him, deposed him, and carried him away prisoner into Egypt, as God had threatened, Deu. xxviii. 68. It doth not appear that any of the people were taken into captivity with him, but himself only. We have the story, 2 Kin. xxiii. 34; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 4. Now here,

1. The people are directed to lament him rather than his father Josiah; "Weep not for the dead," weep not any more for Josiah. Jeremiah had been himself a true mourner for him, and had stirred up the people to mourn for him, 2 Chr. xxxv. 25; yet now he will have them to go out of mourning for him, though it was but three months after his death, and to turn their tears into another channel: they must weep sore for Jehoahaz that is gone into Egypt; not that there was any great loss of him to the public, as there was of his father, but that his case was much more deplorable. Josiah went to the grave in peace and honour, was prevented from seeing the evil to come in this world, and removed to see the good to come in the other world; and therefore weep not for him, but for his unhappy son, that is likely to live and die in disgrace and misery, a wretched captive. Note, Dying saints may be justly envied, whilst living sinners are justly pitied. And so dismal perhaps the prospects of the times may be, that tears even for a Josiah, even for a Jesus, must be restrained, that they may be reserved for ourselves and for our children, Lu. xxiii. 28.

2. The reason given is, because he shall never return out of captivity, as he and his people expected, but shall die there. They were loath to believe this, therefore it is here repeated again and again, he shall return no more, ver. 10. He shall never have the pleasure of seeing his native country, but shall have the continual grief of hearing of the desolations of it. He is gone forth out of this place, and shall never return, ver. 11; "He shall die in the place whither they have led him captive," ver. 12. This came of his forsaking the good example of his father, and usurping the right of his elder brother. In Ezekiel's lamentation for the princes of Israel this Jehoahaz is represented as a young lion, that soon learned to catch the prey, but was taken and brought in chains to Egypt, and was long expected to return, but in vain: see Eze. xix. 3—5.

Secondly. Here is the doom of Jehoiakim, who succeeded him. Whether he had any better right to the crown than Shallum we know not, for, though he was elder than his predecessor, there seems to be another son of Josiah elder than he, called Johanan, 1 Chr. iii. 15; but this we know, he ruled no better, and fared no better at last. Here is,

1. His sins faithfully reproved. It is not fit for a private person to say to a king, Thou art wicked; but a prophet, that has a message from God, betrays his trust if he do not deliver it, be it never so unpleasing, even to kings themselves. Jehoiakim is not here charged with idolatry, and probably he had not yet put Urijah the prophet to death, as we find afterwards he did, ch. xxvi. 22, 23, for then he would have been told of it here; but the crimes for which he is here reproved are,

1st. Pride and affectation of pomp and splendour, as if all the business of a king were to look great, and to do good were to be the least of his care. He must build him a stately palace, a wide house, and large chambers, ver. 14. He must have windows cut out after the newest fashion, perhaps like sash windows with us; the rooms must be ceiled with cedar, the richest sort of wood. His house must be as well-roofed and wainscoted as the temple itself, or else it will not please him, 1 Kin. vi. 15, 16; nay, it must exceed that, for it must be painted with minium, or vermilion, which dyes red, or, as some read it, with indigo, which dyes blue. No doubt it is lawful for princes and great men to build, and beautify, and furnish their houses, so as is agreeable to their dignity; but he that knows what is in man knew that Jehoiakim did this in the pride of his heart, which makes that to be sinful, exceeding sinful, which is in itself lawful. Those, therefore, that are enlarging their houses, and making them more sumptuous, have need to look well to the frame of their own spirits in the doing of it, and carefully to watch against all the workings of vainglory. But that which was particularly amiss in Jehoiakim's case was, that he did this when he could not but perceive, both by the word of God and by his providence, that Divine judgments were breaking in upon him. He reigned his first three years by the permission and allowance of the king of Egypt, and all the rest by the permission and allowance of the king of Babylon; and yet he that was no better than a viceroy will covet to vie with the greatest monarch in buildings and furniture. Observe how peremptory he is in this resolution, "I will build me a wide house," I am resolved I will, whoever advises me to the contrary. Note, It is the common folly of those that are sinking in their estates to covet to make a fair show. Many have unhumbled hearts under humbling providences, and look most haughty then when God is bringing them down. This is striving with our Maker.

2nd. Carnal security and confidence in his wealth, depending upon the continuance of his prosperity, as if his mountain now stood so strong that it could never be moved. He thought he must reign without any disturbance or interruption, because he had closed himself in cedar, ver. 15, as if that were too fine to be assaulted, and too strong to be broken through, and as if God himself could not for pity give up such a stately house as that to be burned. Thus, when Christ spoke of the destruction of the temple, his disciples came to him to shew him what a magnificent structure it was, Mat. xxiii. 38; xxiv. 1. Note, Those wretchedly deceive themselves that think their present prosperity is a lasting security, and dream of reigning, because they are enclosed in cedar. It is but in his own conceit that the rich man's wealth is his strong city.

3rd. Some think he is here charged with sacrilege, and robbing the house of God to beautify and adorn his own house. He 'cuts him out my windows,' so it is in the margin, which some understand as if he had taken windows out of the temple, to put into his own palace, and then painted them (as it follows) with vermilion, that it might not be discovered, but might look of a piece with his own building. Note, Those cheat themselves and ruin themselves at last, that think to enrich themselves by robbing God and his house; and, however they may disguise it, God discovers it.

4th. He is here charged with extortion and oppression, violence and injustice. He built his house by unrighteousness, that is, with money unjustly got, and materials which were not honestly come by, and perhaps upon ground obtained, as Ahab obtained Naboth's vineyard. And, because he went beyond what he could afford, he defrauded his workmen of their wages, which is one of the sins that cries in the ears of the Lord of hosts, Jas. v. 4. God takes notice of the wrong done by the greatest of men to their poor servants and labourers, and will repay them in justice that will not in justice pay those whom they employ, but use their neighbours' service without wages. Observe, The greatest of men must look upon the meanest as their neighbours, and be just to them accordingly, and love them as themselves. Jehoiakim was oppressive not only in his buildings, but in the administration of his government; he did not do justice, made no conscience of shedding innocent blood, when it was to serve the purposes of his ambition, avarice, and revenge. He was all for oppression and violence,—not to threaten it only, but to do it,—and when he was set upon any act of injustice, nothing should stop him, but he would go through with it; and that which was at the bottom of all was covetousness, that love of money which is the root of all evil. "Thine eyes and thine heart are not but for covetousness;" they were for that and for nothing else. Observe, In covetousness the heart walks after the eyes; it is therefore called the lust of the eye, 1 Jno. ii. 15; Job xxxi. 7; it is setting the eyes upon that which is not, Pr. xxiii. 5. The eyes and the heart are then for covetousness, when the aims and affections are wholly set upon the wealth of this world, and where they are so the temptation is strong to murder, oppression, and all manner of violence and villany.

5th. That which aggravated all his sins was, that he was the son of a good father, that had left him a good example, if he would but have followed it, ver. 15, 16, "Did not thy father eat and drink?" When Jehoiakim enlarged and enlightened his house it is probable he spoke scornfully of his father, for contenting himself with such a mean and inconvenient dwelling, below the grandeur of a sovereign prince, and ridiculed him as one that had a dull fancy, a low spirit, and could not find in his heart to lay out his money, nor cared for what was fashionable; that should not serve him which served his father. But God, by the prophet, tells him that his father, though he had not the spirit of building, was a man of an excellent spirit, a better man than he, and did better for himself and his family. Those children that despise their parents' old fashions commonly come short of their real excellences. Jeremiah tells him, First. That he was directed to do his duty by his father's practice. He did judgment and justice, he never did wrong to any of his subjects, never oppressed them or put any hardship upon them, but was careful to preserve all their just rights and properties. Nay, he not only did not abuse his power for the support of wrong, but he used it for the maintaining of right; he judged the cause of the poor and needy, was ready to hear the cause of the meanest of his subjects, and do them justice. Notice, The care of magistrates must be not to support their grandeur and take their ease, but to do good; not only not to oppress the poor themselves, but to defend those that are oppressed. Secondly. That he was encouraged to do his duty by his father's prosperity. 1st. God accepted him; "Was not this to know me? saith the Lord." Did he not hereby make it to appear that he rightly knew his God and worshipped him, and consequently was known and owned of him? Note, The right knowledge of God consists in doing our duty, particularly that which is the duty of our place and station in the world. 2nd. He himself had the comfort of it; "Did he not eat and drink" soberly and cheerfully, so as to fit himself for his business, "for strength, and not for drunkenness?" Eccl. x. 17; he did eat, and drink, and do judgment, not as perhaps Jehoiakim and his princes did, "drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of the afflicted," Pr. xxxi. 5. He did eat and drink, that is, God blessed him with great plenty, and he had the comfortable enjoyment of it himself, and gave handsome entertainments to his friends, was very hospitable and very charitable. It was Jehoiakim's pride that he had built a fine house, but Josiah's true praise that he kept a good house. Many times those have least in them of true generosity that have the greatest affection for pomp and grandeur, for, to support the extravagant expense of that, hospitality, bounty to the poor, yea, and justice itself, will be pinched. It is better to live with Josiah in an old-fashioned house and do good, than live with Jehoiakim in a stately house and leave debts unpaid. Josiah did justice and judgment, and then it was well with him, ver. 15, and it is repeated again, ver. 16. He lived very comfortably, his own subjects and all his neighbours respected him, and whatever he put his hand to prospered. Note, While we do well we may expect it will be well with us. This Jehoiakim knew, that his father found the way of duty to be the way of comfort, and yet would not tread in his steps. Note, It should engage us to keep up religion in our day that our godly parents kept it up in theirs, and recommended it to us from their own experience of the benefit of it. They told us that they had found the promises which godliness has of the life that now is made good to them, and that religion and piety is a friend to outward prosperity; so that we are inexcusable if we turn aside from that good way.

2. Here we have Jehoiakim's doom faithfully read, ver. 18, 19. We may suppose it was in the utmost peril of his own life that Jeremiah here foretold the shameful death of Jehoiakim, but, Thus saith the Lord concerning him, and therefore thus saith he. 1st. He shall die unlamented. He shall make himself so odious by his oppression and cruelty, that all about him shall be glad to part with him, and none shall do him the honour of dropping one tear for him, whereas his father, who did judgment and justice, was universally lamented; and it is promised to Zedekiah, that he should be lamented at his death, for he carried himself better than Jehoiakim had done, ch. xxxiv. 5. His relations shall not lament him, no, not with the common expressions of grief used at the funeral of the meanest, where they cried, "Ah, my brother! or, Ah, sister!" His subjects shall not lament him, nor cry out as they used to do at the graves of their princes, "Ah, Lord! or, Ah, his glory!" It is sad for any to live so that when they die none will be sorry to part with them. Nay, 2nd. He shall lie unburied. This is worse than the former. Even those that have no tears to grace the funerals of the dead with would willingly have them buried out of their sight; but Jehoiakim shall be "buried with the burial of an ass," that is, he shall have no burial at all, but his dead body shall be cast into a ditch, or upon a dunghill; it shall be drawn or dragged ignominiously, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem. It is said in the story of Jehoiakim, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6, that "Nebuchadnezzar bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon;" and Eze. xix. 9, that he was brought in chains to the king of Babylon. But it is very probable that he died a prisoner before he was carried away to Babylon as was intended; perhaps, died for grief, or in the pride of his heart hastened his own end, and for that reason was denied a decent burial, as self-murderers usually are with us. Josephus saith, that Nebuchadnezzar slew him at Jerusalem, and left his body thus exposed, somewhere at a great distance from the gates of Jerusalem. And it is said, 2 Kin. xxiv. 6, he slept with his fathers. When he built himself a stately house, no doubt he designed himself a stately sepulchre, but see how he was disappointed. Note, Those that are lifted up with great pride are commonly reserved for some great disgrace, in life or death.

20 Go up to Lebanon, and cry; [sages:
And lift up thy voice in Bashan, and cry from the pas-
For all thy lovers are destroyed.
21 I spake unto thee in thy prosperity;
But thou saidst, I will not hear.
This hath been thy manner from thy youth,
That thou obeyedst not my voice.
22 The wind shall eat up all thy pastors,
And thy lovers shall go into captivity:
Surely then shalt thou be ashamed and confounded
For all thy wickedness. [cedars,
23 O inhabitant of Lebanon, that makest thy nest in the
How gracious shalt thou be when pangs come upon thee,
The pain as of a woman in travail!
24 As I live, saith the LORD,
Though Coniah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah
Were the signet upon my right hand,
Yet would I pluck thee thence; [life,
25 And I will give thee into the hand of them that seek thy
And into the hand of them whose face thou fearest,
Even into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon,
And into the hand of the Chaldeans.
26 And I will cast thee out,
And thy mother that bare thee,
Into another country, where ye were not born;
And there shall ye die.
27 But to the land whereunto they desire to return,
Thither shall they not return.
28 Is this man Coniah a despised broken idol?
Is he a vessel wherein is no pleasure?
Wherefore are they cast out, he and his seed,
And are cast into a land which they know not?
29 O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the LORD.
30 Thus saith the LORD,
Write ye this man childless,
A man that shall not prosper in his days:
For no man of his seed shall prosper,
Sitting upon the throne of David,
And ruling any more in Judah.

This prophecy seems to have been calculated for the ungracious, inglorious reign of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim, who succeeded him in the government, reigned but three months, and was then carried captive to Babylon, where he lived many years, ch. lii. 31. We have in these verses a prophecy,

First. Of the desolations of the kingdom, which were now hastening on apace, ver. 20—23. Jerusalem and Judah are here spoken to, or the Jewish state, as a single person; and we have it here under a threefold character:

1. Very haughty in a day of peace and safety, ver. 21; "I spake unto thee in thy prosperity," spake by my servants the prophets, reproofs, admonitions, counsels, "but thou saidst, I will not hear," I will not heed; "Thou obeyedst not my voice," and wast resolved thou wouldst not, and hadst the front to tell me so. It is common for those that live at ease to live in contempt of the word of God. "Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked." This was so much the worse, that they had it by kind; "This has been thy manner from thy youth." They were called transgressors from the womb, Isa. xlix. 8.

2. Very timorous upon the alarms of trouble; ver. 20, When thou seest all thy lovers destroyed, when thou findest thine idols unable to help thee, and thy foreign alliances failing thee, thou wilt then go up to Lebanon, and cry, as one undone, and giving up all for lost, cry with a bitter cry; thou wilt cry, Help, help, or we are lost; thou wilt lift up thy voice in fearful shrieks upon Lebanon and Bashan, two high hills, in hope to be heard from thence by the advantage of the rising ground. Thou wilt cry from the passages, from the roads, where thou wilt ever and anon be in distress. Thou wilt cry from Abarim, so some read it, as a proper name, a famous mountain in the border of Moab. Thou wilt cry as those that are in great consternation use to do, to all about thee; but in vain, for, ver. 22, "The wind shall eat up all thy pastors or rulers," that should protect and lead thee, and provide for thy safety. They shall be blasted, and withered, and brought to nothing, as buds and blossoms are by a bleak or freezing wind. They shall be devoured suddenly, insensibly, and irresistibly, as fruits by the wind. "Thy lovers," that thou dependest upon, and hast an affection for, "shall go into captivity," and shall be so far from saving thee, that they shall not be able to save themselves.

3. Very tame under the heavy and lasting pressures of trouble. When there appears no relief from any of thy confederates, and thy own priests are at a loss, "then shalt thou be ashamed and confounded for all thy wickedness," ver. 22. Note, Many will never be ashamed of their sins, till they are brought by them to the last extremity: and it is well if we get this good by our straits, by them to be brought to confusion for our sins. The Jewish state is here called an inhabitant of Lebanon, because that famous forest was within their border, ver. 23, and all their country was wealthy and well guarded, as with Lebanon's natural fastnesses; but so proud and haughty were they, that they are said to make their nest in the cedars, where they thought themselves out of the reach of all danger, and whence they looked with contempt upon all about them. But "how gracious wilt thou be when pangs come upon thee!" Then thou wilt humble thyself before God, and promise amendment. When thou art overthrown in stony places, thou wilt be glad to hear those words which in thy prosperity thou wouldst not hear, Ps. cxli. 6. Then thou wilt endeavour to make thyself acceptable with that God whom before thou madest light of. Note, Many have their pangs of piety, who, when the pangs are over, shew they have no true piety. Some give another sense of it: What will all thy pomp, and state, and wealth avail thee? What will become of it all, or what comfort shalt thou have of it, when thou shalt be in these distresses? No more than a woman in travail, full of pains and fears, can take comfort in her ornaments, while she is in that condition; so Mr. Gataker. Note, Those that are proud of their worldly advantages would do well to consider how they will look when pangs come upon them, and how they will then have lost all their beauty.

Secondly. Here is a prophecy of the disgrace of the king. His name was Jeconiah, but he is here once again called Coniah, in contempt; the prophet shortens, or nicks his name, and gives him, as we say, a nick-name, perhaps to note that he should be despoiled of his dignity, that his reign should be shortened, and the number of his months cut off in the midst. Two instances of dishonour are here put upon him:

1. He shall be carried away into captivity, and shall spend and end his days in bondage. He was born to a crown, but it should quickly fall from his head, and he should exchange it for fetters. Observe the steps of this judgment.

1st God will abandon him, ver. 24. The God of truth saith it, and confirms it with an oath; "Though he were the signet upon my right hand," his predecessors have been so, and he might have been so, if he had carried himself well, but he being degenerated, "I will pluck him thence." The godly kings of Judah had been as signets on God's right hand, near and dear to him,—he had gloried in them, and made use of them as instruments of his government, as the prince doth of his signet ring, or sign manual; but Coniah has made himself utterly unworthy of the honour, and therefore the privilege of his birth shall be no security to him; notwithstanding that he shall be thrown off. Answering to this threatening against Jeconiah is God's promise to Zerubbabel, when he made him his people's guide in their return out of captivity, Hag. ii. 23, "I will take thee, O Zerubbabel, my servant, and make thee as a signet." Those that think themselves as signets on God's right hand must not be secure, but fear lest they be plucked thence.

2nd. The king of Babylon shall seize him. Those know not what enemies and mischiefs they lie exposed to, who have thrown themselves out of God's protection, ver. 25. The Chaldeans are here said to be such as had a spite to Coniah, they sought his life, no less than that they thought would satisfy their rage; and such as he had a dread of, they are those whose face thou fearest; which would make it the more terrible to him to fall into their hands, especially when it was God himself that gave him into their hands. And if God deliver him to them, who can deliver him from them?

3rd. He and his family shall be carried to Babylon, where they shall wear out the many tedious years of their lives in a miserable captivity; "He and his mother," ver. 26; "He and his seed," ver. 28; that is, he and all the royal family, for he had no children of his own when he went into captivity; or, he and the children in his loins; they shall all be cast out to another country, to a strange country, "a country where they were not born," nor such a country as that where they were born, "a land which they know not," in which they have no acquaintance, with whom to converse, or from whom to expect any kindness; thither they shall be carried, from a land where they were entitled to dominion, into a land where they shall be compelled to servitude. But have they no hopes of seeing their own country again? No, "to the land whereunto they desire to return, thither shall they not return," ver. 27. They carried themselves ill in it when they were in it, and therefore they shall never see it more. Jehoahaz was carried to Egypt, the land of the south, ver. 10, Jeconiah to Babylon, the land of the north, both far remote, the quite contrary way, and must never expect to meet again, nor either of them to breathe their native air again. Those that had abused the dominion they had over others were justly brought thus under the dominion of others. Those that had indulged and gratified their sinful desires by their oppression, luxury, and cruelty, were justly denied the gratification of their innocent desire to see their own native country again. We may observe something very emphatical in that part of this threatening, ver. 26; "In the country where ye were not born, there shall ye die." As there is a time to be born, and a time to die, so there is a place to be born in, and a place to die in. We know where we were born, but where we shall die we know not; it is enough that our God knows. Let it be our care that we die in Christ, and then it will be well with us wherever we die, though it should be in a far country.

4th. This shall render him very mean and despicable in the eyes of all his neighbours. They shall be ready to say, ver. 28, "Is this Coniah a despised, broken idol?" Yes, certainly he is, and much debased from what he was. First. Time was when he was dignified, nay, when he was almost deified. The people, who had seen his father lately deposed, were ready to adore him, when they saw him upon the throne; but now he is a despised, broken idol; that when it was whole was worshipped, but when it is rotten and broken is thrown by, and despised, and nobody regards it, or remembers what it has been. Note, What is idolized will first or last be despised and broken; what is unjustly honoured will be justly condemned, and rivals with God will be the scorn of man. Whatever we idolize we shall be disappointed in, and then shall despise. Secondly. Time was when he was delighted in, but now he is "a vessel in which is no pleasure," or to which there is no desire, either because grown out of fashion, or because cracked or dirtied, and so rendered unserviceable. Those whom God has no pleasure in will some time or other be so mortified, that men will have no pleasure in them.

2. He shall leave no posterity to inherit his honour. The prediction of this is ushered in with a solemn preface, ver. 29, "O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord." Let all the inhabitants of the world take notice of these judgments of God upon a nation and a family that had been near and dear to him, and from thence infer, that God is impartial in the administration of justice. Or, it is an appeal to the earth itself on which we tread, since those that dwell on earth are so deaf and careless, like that, Isa. i. 2, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth." God's word, however slighted, will be heard: the earth itself will be made to hear it, and yield to it, when it and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up. Or, it is a call to men that mind earthly things, that are swallowed up in those things, and are inordinate in the pursuit of them; such have need to be called upon again and again, and a third time, to hear the word of the Lord. Or, it is a call to men considered as mortal, of the earth, and hastening to the earth again; we all are so, earth we are, dust we are, and in consideration of that are concerned to hear and regard the word of the Lord, that, though we are earth, we may be found among those whose names are written in heaven. Now that which is here to be taken notice of is, that Jeconiah is written childless, ver. 30; that is, as it follows, "No man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David." In him the line of David was extinct as a royal line. Some think he had children born in Babylon, because mention is made of his seed being cast out there, ver. 28, and that they died before him. We read in the genealogy, 1 Chr. iii. 17, of seven sons of Jeconiah Assir, that is, Jeconiah the captive, of which Salathiel is the first. Some think they were only his adopted sons, and that when it is said, Mat. i. 12, "Jeconiah begat Salathiel," no more is meant but that he bequeathed to him what claims and pretensions he had to the government; the rather, because Salathiel is called the son of Neri, Lu. iii. 27, of the house of Nathan, ver. 31. Whether he had children begotten, or only adopted, thus far he was childless, that none of his seed ruled as kings in Judah. He was the Augustulus of that empire, in whom it determined. Whoever are childless, it is God that writes them so; and those who take no care to do good in their days cannot expect to prosper in their days.

CHAPTER XXIII.

In this chapter the prophet, in God's name, is dealing his reproofs and threatenings. I. Among the careless princes, or pastors of the people, ver. 1, 2, yet promising to take care of the flock, which they had been wanting in their duty to, ver. 3—8. II. Among the wicked prophets and priests, whose ill character is here given at large in divers instances, especially their imposing upon the people with their pretended inspirations, at which the prophet is astonished, and for which they must expect to be punished, ver. 9—32. III. Among the profane people, who ridiculed God's prophets, and bantered them, ver. 33—40. When all have thus corrupted their way, they must all expect to be told faithfully of it.

WOE be unto the pastors
That destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture!
Saith the LORD.
2 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of Israel
Against the pastors that feed my people;
Ye have scattered my flock, and driven them away,
And have not visited them:
Behold, I will visit upon you
The evil of your doings, saith the LORD.
3 And I will gather the remnant of my flock
Out of all countries whither I have driven them,
And will bring them again to their folds;
And they shall be fruitful and increase. [them:
4 And I will set up shepherds over them which shall feed
And they shall fear no more, nor be dismayed,
Neither shall they be lacking, saith the LORD.
5 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will raise unto David a righteous Branch,
And a King shall reign and prosper,
And shall execute judgment and justice in the earth.
6 In his days Judah shall be saved,
And Israel shall dwell safely:
And this is his name whereby he shall be called,
THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS.
7 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That they shall no more say, The LORD liveth,
Which brought up the children of Israel out of the land
8 But, the LORD liveth, [of Egypt;
Which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel

Out of the north country, and from all countries whither
I had driven them;
And they shall dwell in their own land.

Here is, First. A word of terror to the negligent shepherds. The day is at hand when God will reckon with them concerning the trust and charge committed to them; "Woe be to the pastors," that is, to the rulers, both in church and state, who should be to those they are set over as pastors, to lead them, feed them, protect them, and take care of them. They are not owners of the sheep; God here calls them, "The sheep of my pasture," whom I am interested in, and have provided good pasture for; woe be to those therefore that are commanded to feed God's people, and pretend to do it, but instead of that they scatter the flock, and drive them away by their violence and oppression, and have not visited them, nor taken any care for their welfare, nor concerned themselves at all to do them good. In not visiting them, and doing their duty to them, they did in effect scatter them, and drive them away; the beasts of prey scattered them, and the shepherds are in the fault that should have kept them together. Woe be to them, when God will visit upon them the evil of their doings, and deal with them as they deserve. They would not visit the flock in a way of duty, and therefore God will visit them in a way of vengeance.

Secondly. Here is a word of comfort to the neglected sheep. Though the under shepherds take no care of them, no pains with them, but betray them, the chief Shepherd will look after them; "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord taketh me up." Though the interests of God's church in the world are neglected by those who should take care of them, and postponed to their own private secular interests, yet they shall not therefore sink. God will perform his promise, though those he employs do not perform their duty.

1. The dispersed Jews shall at length return to their own land, and be happily settled there under a good government, ver. 3, 4. Though there be but a remnant of God's flock left, a little remnant, that has narrowly escaped destruction, he will gather that remnant; will find them out wherever they are, and find out ways and means to bring them back "out of all countries whither I have driven them." It was the justice of God, for the sin of their shepherds, that dispersed them; but the mercy of God shall gather in the sheep, when the shepherds that betrayed them are cut off. They shall be brought to their former habitations, as sheep to their folds, and there they shall be fruitful, and increase in numbers. And though their former shepherds took no care of them, it doth not therefore follow that they shall have no more; if some have abused a sacred office, that is no good reason why it should be deposed; they destroyed the sheep, but "I will set shepherds over them which shall make it their business to feed them." Formerly they were continually exposed, and disturbed with some alarm or other; but now "they shall fear no more, nor be dismayed;" they shall be in no danger from without, in no fright from within. Formerly some or other of them were ever and anon picked up by the beasts of prey; but now none of them shall be lacking, none of them missing. Though the times may have been long bad with the church, it doth not follow that they will be ever so. Such pastors as Zerubbabel and Nehemiah were, though they lived not in the pomp that Jehoiakim and Jeconiah did, nor made such a figure, were as great blessings to the people as the other were plagues to them. The church's peace is not bound up in the pomp of her rulers.

2. Messiah the prince, that great and good Shepherd of the sheep, shall in the latter days be raised up to bless his church, and to be the glory of his people Israel, ver. 5, 6. The house of David seemed to be quite sunk and ruined by that threatening against Jeconiah, ch. xxii. 30, that none of his seed should ever sit upon the throne of David. But here is a promise which effectually secures the honour of the covenant made with David, notwithstanding; for by it the house will be raised out of its ruins to a greater lustre than ever, and shine brighter far than it did in Solomon himself. We have not so many prophecies of Christ in this book as we had in that of the prophet Isaiah; but here we have one, and a very illustrious one; of him doubtless the prophet here speaks, of him and of no other man. The first words intimate that it would be long ere this promise should have its accomplishment: "The days come," but they are not yet. "I shall see him, but not now;" but all the rest intimate that the accomplishment of it will be glorious.

1st. Christ is here spoken of as a branch from David, the Man, the Branch, Zec. iii. 8; his appearance mean, his beginnings small, like those of a bud or sprout, and his rise seemingly out of the earth, but growing to be green, to be great, to be loaded with fruits. A Branch from David's family, when it seemed to be a root in a dry ground, buried, and not likely to revive. Christ is the root and offspring of David, Rev. xxii. 16. In him doth the horn of David bud, Ps. cxxxii. 17, 18. He is a Branch of God's raising up, he sanctified him, and sent him into the world, gave him his commission and qualifications. He is a righteous Branch, for he is righteous himself, and through him many, even all that are his, are made righteous; as an Advocate, he is Jesus Christ the righteous.

2nd. He is here spoken of as his church's King. This Branch shall be raised as high as the throne of his father David, and there he shall reign and prosper, not as the kings that now were of the house of David, that went backward in all their affairs; no, he shall set up a kingdom in the world, that shall be victorious over all opposition. In the chariot of the everlasting Gospel he shall go forth, he shall go on conquering and to conquer. If God raise him up, he will prosper him, for he will own the work of his own hands; what is the good pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in the hands of those to whom it is committed. He shall prosper, for "he shall execute judgment and justice in the earth," all the world over, Ps. xcvi. 13. The present kings of the house of David were unjust and oppressive, and therefore no wonder they did not prosper; but Christ shall, by his Gospel, break the usurped power of Satan, institute a perfect rule of holy living, and, as far as it prevails, make all the world righteous. The effect of this shall be a holy security and serenity of mind in all his faithful, loyal subjects. "In his days," under his dominion, "Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely," that is, all the spiritual seed of believing Abraham, and praying Jacob, shall be protected from the curse of Heaven and the malice of hell; shall be privileged from the arrests of God's law, and delivered from the attempts of Satan's power; shall be saved from sin, the guilt and dominion of it, and then shall dwell safely, and be quiet from the fear of all evil: see Lu. i. 74, 75. Those that shall be saved hereafter from the wrath to come may dwell safely now, for "if God be for us, who can be against us?" In the days of Christ's government in the soul, when he is uppermost there, the soul dwells at ease.

3rd. He is here spoken of as "the Lord our Righteousness." Observe, First. Who and what he is. As God, he is Jehovah, the incommunicable name of God, speaking his eternity and self-existence; as Mediator, he is our righteousness; by making satisfaction to the justice of God for the sin of man, he has brought in an everlasting righteousness, and so made it over to us in the covenant of grace, that upon our believing consent to that covenant it becomes ours. His being Jehovah, our righteousness, implies that he is so our righteousness as no creature could be; he is a sovereign, all-sufficient, eternal righteousness. All our righteousness has its being from him, and by him it subsists, and we are made the righteousness of God in him. Secondly. The profession and declaration of this; "This is the name whereby he shall be called;" not only he shall be so, but he shall be known to be so. God shall call him by this name, for he shall appoint him to be our righteousness. By this name Israel shall call him, every true believer shall call him, and call upon him. That is our righteousness by which, as an allowed plea, we are justified before God, acquitted from guilt, and accepted into favour; and nothing else have we to plead but this, "Christ has died, yea, rather is risen again," and we have taken him for our Lord.

3. This great salvation, which will come to the Jews in the latter days of their state, after their return out of Babylon, shall be so illustrious as far to outshine the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; ver. 7, 8, "They shall no more say, The Lord liveth that brought up Israel out of Egypt, but, The Lord liveth that brought them up out of the north." This we had before, ch. xvi. 14, 15; but here it seems to point more plainly than it did there to the days of the Messiah, and to compare not so much the two deliverances themselves, giving the preference to the latter, as the two states to which the church by degrees grew after those deliverances. Observe the proportions: just four hundred and eighty years after they were come out of Egypt Solomon's temple was built, 1 Kin. vi. 1, and at that time that nation, which was so wonderfully brought out of Egypt, was gradually arrived to its height, to its zenith; just four hundred and ninety years (seventy weeks) after they came out of Babylon, Messiah the prince set up the gospel temple, which was the greatest glory of that nation, that was so wonderfully brought out of Babylon: see Dan. ix. 24, 25. Now the spiritual glory of the second part of that nation, especially as transferred to the gospel church, is much more admirable and illustrious than all the temporal glory of the first part of it in the days of Solomon; for that was no glory compared with the glory which excelleth.

9 Mine heart within me is broken because of the prophets;
All my bones shake;
I am like a drunken man,
And like a man whom wine hath overcome,
Because of the LORD,
And because of the words of his holiness.
10 For the land is full of adulterers;
For because of swearing the land mourneth;
The pleasant places of the wilderness are dried up,
And their course is evil,
And their force is not right.
11 For both prophet and priest are profane;
Yea, in my house have I found their wickedness, saith the LORD.
12 Wherefore their way shall be unto them
As slippery ways in the darkness:
They shall be driven on, and fall therein:
For I will bring evil upon them,
Even the year of their visitation, saith the LORD.
13 And I have seen folly in the prophets of Samaria;
They prophesied in Baal, and caused my people Israel to err.
14 I have seen also in the prophets of Jerusalem an horrible [thing:
They commit adultery, and walk in lies:
They strengthen also the hands of evildoers,
That none doth return from his wickedness:
They are all of them unto me as Sodom,
And the inhabitants thereof as Gomorrah.
15 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts concerning the prophets;
Behold, I will feed them with wormwood,
And make them drink the water of gall:
For from the prophets of Jerusalem
Is profaneness gone forth into all the land.
16 Thus saith the LORD of hosts,
Hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophesy unto you:
They make you vain:
They speak a vision of their own heart,
And not out of the mouth of the LORD.
17 They say still unto them that despise me,
The LORD hath said, Ye shall have peace;
And they say unto every one that walketh after the imagination of his own heart,
No evil shall come upon you.
18 For who hath stood in the counsel of the LORD,
And hath perceived and heard his word?
Who hath marked his word, and heard it?

19 Behold, a whirlwind of the LORD is gone forth in fury,
Even a grievous whirlwind:
It shall fall grievously upon the head of the wicked.
20 The anger of the LORD shall not return,
Until he have executed, and till he have performed.
The thoughts of his heart:
In the latter days ye shall consider it perfectly.
21 I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran:
I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied.
22 But if they had stood in my counsel,
And had caused my people to hear my words,
Then they should have turned them from their evil way,
And from the evil of their doings.
23 Am I a God at hand, saith the LORD,
And not a God afar off?
24 Can any hide himself in secret places
That I shall not see him? saith the LORD.
Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the LORD.
25 I have heard what the prophets said,
That prophesy lies in my name,
Saying, I have dreamed, I have dreamed.
26 How long shall this be in the heart of the prophets that prophesy lies?
Yea, they are prophets of the deceit of their own heart;
27 Which think to cause my people
To forget my name by their dreams
Which they tell every man to his neighbour,
As their fathers have forgotten my name for Baal.
28 The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream;
And he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully.
What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the LORD.
29 Is not my word like as a fire? saith the LORD;
And like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?
30 Therefore, behold, I am against the prophets, saith the LORD,
That steal my words every one from his neighbour.
31 Behold, I am against the prophets, saith the LORD,
That use their tongues, and say, He saith.
32 Behold, I am against them that prophesy false dreams, saith the LORD,
And do tell them, and cause my people to err
By their lies, and by their lightness;
Yet I sent them not, nor commanded them: [LORD.
Therefore they shall not profit this people at all, saith the

Here is a long lesson for the false prophets. As none were more bitter and spiteful against God's true prophets than they, so there were none on whom the true prophets were more severe, and justly. The prophet had complained to God of those false prophets, ch. xiv. 13, and had often foretold that they should be involved in the common ruin, but here they have woes of their own.

First. He expresseth the deep concern that he was under upon this account, and what a trouble it was to him to see men, that pretended to a Divine commission and inspiration, ruining themselves, and the people among whom they dwelt, by their falsehood and treachery; ver. 9, "My heart within me is broken, I am like a drunken man." His head was in confusion with wonder and astonishment, his heart was under oppression with grief and vexation. Jeremiah was a man that laid things much to heart, and what was any way threatening to his country made a deep impression upon his spirits. He is here in trouble, 1. "Because of the prophets," and their sin, the false doctrine they preached, the wicked lives they lived; especially it filled him with horror, to hear them making use of God's name, and pretending to have their instructions from him. Never was the Lord so abused, and "the words of his holiness," as by these men. Note, The dishonour done to God's name, and the profanation of his holy word, is the greatest grief imaginable to a gracious soul. 2. "Because of the Lord," and his judgments, that by this means are brought in upon us like a deluge. He trembled to think of that ruin and desolation which was coming 'from the face of the Lord,' (so the word is,) 'and from the face of the word of his holiness,' which will be inflicted by the power of God's wrath, according to the threatenings of his word, confirmed by his holiness. Note, Those that have God for them yet cannot but tremble to think of the misery of those that have God against them.

Secondly. He laments the abounding abominable wickedness of the land, and the present tokens of God's displeasure they were under for it; ver. 10, "The land is full of adulterers," it is full both of spiritual and corporal whoredom; they go a whoring from God, and, having cast off the fear of him, no marvel that they abandon themselves to all manner of lewdness. And having dishonoured themselves and their own bodies, they dishonour God and his name by rash and false swearing, because of which "the land mourns." Both perjury and common swearing are sins for which a land must mourn in true repentance, or it will be made to mourn under the judgments of God. Their land mourned now under the judgment of famine; the pleasant places, or rather the pastures, or, as some read it, the habitations of the wilderness, are dried up for want of rain, and yet we see no signs of repentance; they answer not the end of the correction. The tenor and tendency of men's conversations is sinful, their course continues evil, as bad as ever, and they will not be diverted from it. They have a great deal of resolution, but it is turned the wrong way, are zealously affected, but not in a good thing; "their force is not right;" their heart is "fully set in them to do evil," and they are not "valiant for the truth," have not courage enough to break off their evil courses, though they see God thus contending with them.

Thirdly. He chargeth it all upon the prophets and priests, especially the prophets. They are both profane, ver. 11. The priests profane the ordinances of God they pretend to administer, the prophets profane the word of God they pretend to deliver; their converse and all their conversation are profane, and then it is not strange that the people are so debauched. They both play the hypocrite, so some read it; under sacred pretensions they carry on the vilest designs; yea, not only in their own houses, and the ill houses they frequent, but "in my house have I found their wickedness;" in the temple, where the priests ministered, where the prophets prophesied, there were they guilty both of idolatry and immorality. See a woful instance in Hophni and Phinehas, 1 Sam. ii. 21. God searcheth his house, and what wickedness is there he will find it out; and the nearer it is to him the more offensive it is. Two things are charged upon them:

1. That they taught people to sin by their examples. He compares them with the prophets of Samaria, the head city of the kingdom of the ten tribes, which had been long since laid waste. It was the folly of the prophets of Samaria, that "they prophesied in Baal," in Baal's name, so Ahab's prophets did, and so they "caused my people Israel to err," to forsake the service of the true God, and to worship Baal, ver. 13. Now the prophets of Jerusalem did not do so, they prophesied in the name of the true God, and valued themselves upon that, that they were not like the prophets of Samaria, who prophesied in Baal; but what the better, when they debauched the nation as much by their immoralities as the other had done by their idolatries? It is a "horrible thing in the prophets of Jerusalem," that they make use of the name of the holy God, and yet wallow in all manner of impurity; they make nothing of committing adultery, they make use of the name of the God of truth, and yet walk in lies; they not only prophesy lies, but in their common conversation one cannot believe a word they say. It is all either jest and banter or fraud and design. Thus they encourage sinners to go on in their wicked ways; for every one will say, Surely we may do as the prophets do; who can expect that we should be better than our teachers? By this means it is that none doth return from his wickedness; but they all say they shall have peace, though they go on, for their prophets tell them so. By this means Judah and Jerusalem are become as Sodom and Gomorrah, that were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly; and God looked upon them accordingly as fit for nothing but to be destroyed, as they were, by fire and brimstone.

2. That they encouraged people in sin, by their false prophecies. They made themselves believe there was no harm, no danger in sin, and practised accordingly, and then no marvel they made others believe so too; ver. 16, "They speak a vision of their own heart;" it is the product of their own invention, and agrees with their own inclination, but it is "not out of the mouth of the Lord;" he never dictated it to them, nor doth it agree either with the law of Moses or with what God has spoken by other prophets. They tell sinners it shall be well with them, though they persist in their sins, ver. 18. See here who they are that they encourage—those that despise God, that slight his authority, and have low and mean thoughts of his institutions, and those that "walk after the imagination of their own heart," that are worshippers of idols, and slaves to their own lusts. Those that are devoted to their pleasures put contempt upon their God. Yet see how these prophets caressed and flattered them. They should have been still saying, There is no peace to them that go on in their evil ways; those that despise God shall be lightly esteemed; woe, and a thousand woes to them; but they still said, "Ye shall have peace, no evil shall come upon you." And, which was worst of all, they told them God had said so, so making him to patronise sin, and to contradict himself. Note, Those that are resolved to go on in their evil ways will justly be given up to believe the strong delusions of those that tell them they shall have peace, though they go on.

Fourthly. God disowns all that these false prophets said to soothe people up in their sins; ver. 21, "I have not sent these prophets." They never had any mission from God, they were not only not sent by him on this errand, but they were never sent by him on any errand, he never had employed them in any service or business for him; and as to this matter, whereas they pretended to have instructions from him to assure this people of peace, he declares he never gave them any such instructions; yet they were very forward, they ran; they were very bold, they prophesied without any of that difficulty with which the true prophets sometimes struggled. They said to sinners, "You shall have peace;" but, ver. 18, "Who hath stood in the counsel of the Lord?" that is, who of you hath, that are so confident of this? You deliver this message with a great deal of assurance; but have you consulted God about it? No, you never considered whether it be agreeable to the discoveries God has made of himself, whether it will consist with the honour of his holiness and justice, to let sinners go unpunished? You have not perceived and heard his word, nor marked that, you have not compared this with the Scripture; if you had taken notice of that, and of the constant tenor of it, you would never have delivered such a message. The prophets themselves must try the spirits by the touchstone of the law and of the testimony, as well as those to whom they prophesy. But which of those did so that prophesied of peace? That they did not stand in God's counsel, nor hear his word, is proved afterwards; ver. 22, "If they had stood in my counsel," as they pretend, 1. They would have made the Scriptures their standard; "They would have caused my people to hear my words," and would have conscientiously kept close to them. But not speaking according to that rule, it is a plain evidence there is no light in them. 2. They would have made the conversion of souls their business, and would have aimed at that in all their preaching. They would have done all they could to turn people from their evil way in general, and from all the particular evil of their doings. They would have encouraged and assisted the reformation of manners, would have made this their scope in all their preaching, to part between men and their sins; but it appeared this was a thing they never aimed at, but on the contrary to encourage sinners in their sins. 3. They would have had some seals of their ministry. This sense our translation gives it, "If they had stood in my counsel," and the words they preached had been my words, "then they should have turned them from their evil way." A Divine power should have gone along with the word, for the conviction of sinners. God will own his own institutions. Yet this is no certain rule; Jeremiah himself, though God sent him, prevailed with but few to turn from their evil way.

Fifthly. God threatens to punish these prophets for their wickedness. They promised the people peace, and, to shew them the folly of that, God tells them they should have no peace themselves. They were very unfit to warrant the people, and pass their word to them that no evil shall come upon them, when all evil is coming upon themselves, and they are not aware of it, ver. 12. Because the prophets and priests are profane, "therefore their way shall be unto them as slippery ways in the darkness." They that undertake to lead others, because they mislead them, and know they do so, they shall themselves have no comfort in their way. 1. They pretend to shew others the way, but they shall themselves be in the dark, or in a mist, their light or sight shall fail, so that they shall not be able to look before them, shall have no forecast for themselves. 2. They pretend to give assurance to others, but they themselves shall find no firm footing, their ways shall be to them as slippery ways, in which they shall not go with any steadiness, safety, or satisfaction. 3. They pretend to make the people easy with their flatteries, but they shall themselves be uneasy. They shall be driven, forced forward as captives, or making their escape as those that are pursued; and they shall fall in the way by which they hoped to escape, and so fall into the enemies' hand. 4. They pretend to prevent the evil that threatens others, but God will "bring evil upon them, even the year of their visitation," the time fixed for calling them to an account; and such a time is fixed concerning all that do not judge themselves; and it will be an evil time. The year of visitation is the year of recompences. It is farther threatened, ver. 15, "I will feed them with wormwood," or poison, with that which is not only nauseous but noxious, and "make them drink waters of gall," or, as some read it, 'juice of hemlock:' see ch. ix. 15. And justly is the cup of trembling put into their hand first; for from the prophets of Jerusalem, that should have been patterns of piety, and every thing that is praiseworthy, even from them, is profaneness gone forth into all the lands. Nothing more effectually debaucheth a nation than the debauchery of ministers.

Sixthly. The people are here warned not to give any credit to these false prophets, for, though they flattered them with hopes of impunity, the judgments of God would certainly break out against them unless they repented, ver. 16. Take notice what God saith, and "hearken not to the words of these prophets;" for you will find in the issue God's word shall stand, and not theirs. God's word will make you serious, but they make you vain, feed you with vain hopes, which will fail you at last. They tell you, no evil shall come upon you; but hear what God saith, ver. 19, "Behold a whirlwind of the Lord is gone forth in fury;" they tell you, all shall be calm and serene; but God tells you, there is a storm coming, a whirlwind of the Lord, of his sending, and therefore there is no standing before it; it is a whirlwind raised by Divine wrath, it is gone forth in fury, a wind that is brought forth out of the treasuries of Divine vengeance, and therefore it is a grievous whirlwind, and shall light heavy, with rain and hail upon the head of the wicked, which they cannot avoid, nor find any shelter from. It shall fall upon the wicked prophets themselves that deceived the people, and the wicked people that suffered themselves to be deceived. A horrible temple shall be the portion of their cup, Ps. xi. 6. This sentence is bound on as irreversible; ver. 20, "The anger of the Lord shall not return," for the decree is gone forth, God will not alter his mind, nor suffer his anger to be turned away till he have executed the sentence and performed the thoughts of his heart. God's whirlwind, when it comes down from heaven, returneth not thither, but accomplisheth that for which he sent it, Isa. lv. 11. This they will not consider now, but "in the latter days ye shall consider it perfectly;" 'consider it with understanding,' so the word is, or with consideration. Note, Those that will not fear the threatenings shall feel the execution of them, and will then perfectly understand, what they will not now admit the evidence of, what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of a just and jealous God. They that will not consider in time will be made to consider when it is too late. "Son, remember."

Seventhly. Divers things are here offered to the consideration of these false prophets for their conviction, that if possible they might be brought to recant their error, and acknowledge the cheat they had put upon God's people.

1. Let them consider that, though they may impose upon men, God is too wise to be imposed upon. Men cannot see through their fallacies, but God can and doth. Here,

1st. God asserts his own omnipresence and omniscience in general, ver. 23, 24. When they told the people that no evil should befall them, though they went on in their evil ways, they went upon atheistical principles,—That the Lord doth not see their sin, that he cannot judge through the dark cloud, that he will not require it; and therefore they must be taught the first principles of their religion, and confronted with the most incontestable self-evident truths. First. That though God's throne is prepared in the heavens, and this earth seems to be at a distance from him, yet he is a God here in this lower world which seems to be afar off, as well as in the upper world which seems to be at hand, ver. 23. The eye of God is the same on earth that it is in heaven; here it runs to and fro as well as there, 2 Chr. xvi. 9. And what is in the minds of men, whose spirits are veiled in flesh, is as clearly seen by him as what is in the mind of angels, those unveiled spirits above that surround his throne. The power of God is the same on earth among the inhabitants of that that it is in heaven among the armies of that; with us nearness and distance make a great difference both in our observations and our operations: but it is not so with God; to him darkness and light, at hand and afar off, are both alike. Secondly. That how ingenious and industrious soever men are to disguise themselves, and their own characters and counsels, they cannot possibly be concealed from God's all-seeing eye; ver. 24, "Can any hide himself in the secret places" of the earth, "that I shall not see him?" Can any hide his projects and intentions in the secret places of the heart, that I shall not see them? No arts of concealment can hide men from the eye of God, nor deceive his judgment of them. Thirdly. That he is everywhere present. He doth not only rule heaven and earth, and uphold both by his universal providence, but he fills heaven and earth by his essential presence, Ps. cxxxix. 7, &c. No place can either include him or exclude him.

2nd. He applies this to these prophets, that had a notable art of disguising themselves; ver. 25, 26, "I have heard what the prophets said that prophesy lies in my name." They thought he was so wholly taken up with the other world, that he had no leisure to take cognizance of what passed in this; but God will make them know that he knows all their impostures, all the shams they have put upon the world under colour of Divine revelation. What they intended to humour the people with, they pretended to have had from God in a dream, when there was no such thing; this they could not discover. If a man tell me he dreamed so and so, I cannot contradict him, he knows I cannot; but God discovered the fraud. Perhaps the false prophets whispered what they had to say in the ears of such as were their confidants, saying, So and so I have dreamed; but God overheard them. The heart-searching eye of God traced them in all the methods they took to deceive the people, and he cries out, How long? Shall I always bear with them? 'Is it in the heart of these prophets' (so some read it) 'to be ever prophesying lies, and prophesying the deceit of their own heart?' Will they never see what an affront they put upon God, what an abuse they put upon the people, and what judgments they are preparing for themselves?

2. Let them consider that their palming upon people counterfeit revelations, and fathering their own fancies upon Divine inspiration, was the ready way to bring all religion into contempt, and make men turn atheists and infidels; and this was the thing they really intended, though they frequently made mention of the name of God, and prefaced all they said with, "Thus saith the Lord." Yet, saith God, "They think to cause my people to forget my name by their dreams;" they designed to draw people off from the worship of God, from all regard to God's laws and ordinances and the true prophets, as their fathers forgot God's name for Baal. Note, The great thing Satan aims at is to make people forget God, and all that whereby he has made himself known; and he has many subtle methods to bring them to this: sometimes he doth it by setting up false gods, (bring men in love with Baal, and they soon forget the name of God;) sometimes by misrepresenting the true God, as if he were altogether such a one as ourselves. Pretences to new revelation may prove as dangerous to religion as the denying of all revelation; and false prophets in God's name, may perhaps do more mischief to the power of godliness than false prophets in Baal's name, as being less guarded against.

3. Let them consider what a vast difference there was between their prophecies and those that were delivered by the true prophets of the Lord; ver. 28, "The prophet that has a dream," which was that way of inspiration that the false prophets most pretended to, if he has a dream, 'let him tell it as a dream,' so Mr. Gataker reads it; let him lay no more stress upon it than men men do upon their dreams, nor expect any more regard to be had to it; let them not say it is from God, nor call their foolish dreams Divine oracles; but let the true prophet that has my word speak my word faithfully, speak it as a truth, so some read it; let him keep close to his instructions, and you will soon perceive a vast difference between the dreams that the false prophets tell and the Divine dictates which the true prophets deliver. He that pretends to have a message from God, whether by dream or voice, let him declare it, and it will easily appear which is of God and which is not. Those that have spiritual senses exercised will be able to distinguish; for "what is the chaff to the wheat?" The promises of peace which these prophets make to you are no more to be compared to God's promises than chaff to wheat. Men's fancies are light, and vain, and worthless, as the chaff which the wind drives away. But the word of God hath substance in it, it is of value, is food for the soul, the bread of life. Wheat was the staple commodity of Canaan, that valley of vision, Deu. viii. 8; Eze. xxvii. 16. There is as much difference between the vain fancies of men and the pure word of God as between the chaff and the wheat. It follows, ver. 29, "Is not my word like a fire, saith the Lord?" Is their word so? Has it the power and efficacy that the word of God has? No, nothing like it; there is no more comparison than between painted fire and real fire. Theirs is like an ignis fatuus,—'a deceiving meteor,' leading men into bypaths and upon dangerous precipices. Note, The word of God is like fire. The law was a fiery law, Deu. xxxiii. 2; and of the Gospel, Christ saith, "I am come to send fire on the earth," Lu. xii. 49. Fire has different effects, according as the matter is on which it works; it hardens clay, but softens wax; it consumes the dross, but purifies the gold: so the word of God is to some "a savour of life unto life, to others of death unto death." God appeals here to the consciences of those to whom the word was sent, "Is not my word like fire?" Has it not been so to you? Zec. i. 6; speak as you have found. It is compared likewise to "a hammer, breaking the rock in pieces." The unhumbled heart of man is like a rock; if it will not be melted by the word of God as the fire, it will be broken to pieces by it as the hammer. Whatever opposition is given to the word, it will be borne down and broken to pieces.

4. Let them consider, that while they went on in this course God was against them. Three times they are told this; ver. 30—32, "Behold, I am against the prophets." They pretended to be for God, and make use of his name, but were really against him; he looks upon them as they were really, and is against them. How can they be long safe, or at all easy, that have a God of almighty power against them? While these prophets were promising peace to the people, God was proclaiming war against them. They stand indicted here,

1st. For robbery. They "steal my word every one from his neighbour." Some understand it of that word of God which the good prophets preached; they stole their sermons, their expressions, and mingled them with their own, as hucksters mingle bad wares with some good to make them vendible. Those that were strangers to the spirit of the true prophets mimicked their language, picked up some good sayings of theirs, and delivered them to the people as if they had been their own, but with an ill grace; it was not of a piece with the rest of their discourses. "The legs of the lame are not equal; so is a parable in the mouth of fools," Pr. xxvi. 7. Others understand it of the word of God, as it was received and entertained by some of the people; they stole it out of their hearts, as the wicked one in the parable is said to steal the good seed of the word, Mat. xiii. 19. By their insinuations they diminished the authority, and so weakened the efficacy, of the word of God upon the minds of those that seemed to be under convictions by it.

2nd. They stand indicted for counterfeiting the broad seal. Therefore God is against them, ver. 31, because they use their tongues at their pleasure; in their discourses to the people they say what they themselves think fit, and then father it upon God, pretend they had it from him, and say, He saith it. Some read it, 'They smooth their tongues,' they are very complaisant to the people, and say nothing but what is pleasing and plausible; they never reprove them, or threaten them, but their words are smoother than butter. Thus they ingratiate themselves with them, and get money by them; and they have the impudence and impiety to make God the patron of their lies, they say, He saith so. What greater indignity can be done to the God of truth than to lay the brats of the father of lies at his door?

3rd. They stand indicted as common cheats, ver. 32. "I am against them, for they prophesy false dreams," pretending that to be a Divine inspiration which is but an invention of their own. This is a horrid fraud; nor will it excuse them to say, Caveat emptor,—'Let the buyer take care of himself;' and Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur,—'If people will be deceived let them.' No; it is the people's fault that they err, that they take things upon trust, and do not try the spirits; but it is much more the prophets' fault that they cause God's people to err by their lies, and by their lightness, by the flatteries of their preaching, soothing them up in their sins, and by the looseness and lewdness of their conversation encouraging them to persist in them. First. God disowns their having any commission from him; "I sent them not, nor commanded them." They are not God's messengers, nor is what they say his message. Secondly. He therefore justly denies his blessing with them. "Therefore they shall not profit this people at all." All the profit they aim at is to make them easy; but they shall not so much as do that, for God's providences will at the same time be making them uneasy. They do not profit this people, so some read it; and more is implied than is expressed: they not only do them no good, but do them a great deal of hurt. Note, Those that corrupt the word of God, while they pretend to preach it, are so far from edifying the church that they do it the greatest mischief imaginable.

33 And when this people,
Or the prophet, or a priest, shall ask thee, saying,
What is the burden of the LORD?

Thou shalt then say unto them, What burden?
I will even forsake you, saith the LORD.
34 And as for the prophet, and the priest, and the people,
That shall say, The burden of the LORD,
I will even punish that man and his house.
35 Thus shall ye say every one to his neighbour,
And every one to his brother,
What hath the LORD answered?
And, What hath the LORD spoken?
36 And the burden of the LORD shall ye mention no more:
For every man's word shall be his burden;
For ye have perverted the words of the living God,
Of the LORD of hosts our God.
37 Thus shalt thou say to the prophet,
What hath the LORD answered thee?
And, What hath the LORD spoken?
38 But since ye say, The burden of the LORD;
Therefore thus saith the LORD;
Because ye say this word, The burden of the LORD,
And I have sent unto you, saying,
Ye shall not say, The burden of the LORD;
39 Therefore, behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you,
And I will forsake you,
And the city that I gave you and your fathers,
And cast you out of my presence:
40 And I will bring an everlasting reproach upon you,
And a perpetual shame, which shall not be forgotten.

The profaneness of the people, with that of the priests and prophets, is here reproved in a particular instance, which may seem of small moment in comparison with their greater crimes; but profaneness in a common discourse, and the debauching of the language of a nation, being a notorious evidence of the prevalency of wickedness in it, we are not to think it strange that this matter was so largely and warmly insisted upon here. Observe,

First. The sin here charged upon them is bantering God's prophets, and the dialect they used, and jesting with sacred things. They asked, "What is the burthen of the Lord?" ver. 33, and ver. 34, and they say, "The burthen of the Lord," ver. 38. This was the word that gave great offence to God, that whenever they spake of "the word of the Lord," they called it in scorn and derision, "the burthen of the Lord." Now, 1. This was a word that the prophets much used, and used it seriously, to shew what a weight the word of God was upon their spirits, of what importance it was, and how pressingly it should come upon those that heard it. The words of the false prophets had nothing ponderous in them; but God's words had: those were as chaff, these as wheat. Now the profane scoffers took this word and made a jest and a byword of it; they made people merry with it, that so, when the prophets used it, they might not make people serious with it. Note, It has been the artifice of Satan in all ages to obstruct the efficacy of sacred things by turning them into matter of sport and ridicule. The mocking of God's messengers was the baffling of his messages. 2. Perhaps this word was caught at and reproached by the scoffers as an improper word, newly coined by the prophets, and not used in that sense by any classic author. It was only in this and the last age that "the word of the Lord" was called "the burthen of the Lord," and it could not be found in their lexicons to have that signification. But if men take a liberty, as we see they do, to form new phrases, which they think more expressive and significant in other parts of learning, why not in divinity? But especially we must observe it as a rule, that the Spirit of God is not tied to our rules of speaking. 3. Some think that, because when the word of the Lord is called a "burthen" it signifies some word of reproof and threatening, which would lay load upon the hearers, (yet I know not whether that observation will always hold,) therefore in using this word, "the burthen of the Lord," in a canting way, they reflected upon God as always bearing hard upon them, always teazing them, always frightening them, and so making the word a perpetual uneasiness to them. They make the word of God a burthen to themselves, and then quarrel with the ministers for making it a burthen to them. Thus the scoffers of the latter days, while they slight heaven and salvation, reproach faithful ministers for preaching hell and damnation. Upon the whole we may observe that, how light soever men may make of it, the great God takes notice of, and is much displeased with, those that burlesque sacred things, and, that they may make a jest of Scripture truth and laws, put jests upon Scripture language. In such wit as this I am sure there is no wisdom, and so it will appear at last. "Be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong." Those that were here guilty of this sin were some of the false prophets, who perhaps came to steal the word of God from the true prophets; some of the priests, who perhaps came to seek occasions against them on which to ground an information; and some of the people who had learned of the profane priests and prophets to play with the things of God. The people would not have affronted the prophet and his God thus, if the priests and the prophets—those ringleaders of mischief—had not shewn them the way.

Secondly. When they are reproved for this profane way of speaking, they are directed how to express themselves more decently. We do not find that the prophets are directed to make no more use of this word; we find it used long after this, Zec. ix. 1; Mal. i. 1; Nah. i. 1; Hab. i. 1; and we do not find it once used in this sense by Jeremiah, either before or after. It is true indeed that in many cases it is advisable to make no use of such words and things as some have made an ill use of, and it may be prudence to avoid such phrases, as, though innocent enough, are in danger of being perverted and made stumblingblocks. But here God will have the prophet stick to his rule, ch. xv. 19, "Let them return unto thee, but return not thou unto them." Do not thou leave off using this word, but let them leave off abusing it. Ye "shall not mention the burthen of the Lord any more" in this profane, careless manner, ver. 36, for it is "perverting the words of the living God," and making an ill use of them, which is an impious, dangerous thing, for consider he is "the Lord of hosts our God." Note, If we will but look upon God as we ought to do in his greatness and goodness, and be but duly sensible of our relation and obligation to him, it may be hoped, we will not dare to affront him by making a jest of his words. It is an impudent thing to abuse him that is the living God, the Lord of hosts, and our God. How then must they express themselves? He tells them, ver. 37, Thus "shalt thou say to the prophet," when thou art inquiring of him, "What hath the Lord answered thee? And what hath the Lord spoken?" And, ver. 35, they must say thus when they inquire of their neighbours. Note, We must always speak of the things of God reverently and seriously, and as becomes the oracles of God. It is a commendable practice to inquire after the mind of God, to inquire of our brethren what they have heard, to inquire of our prophets what they have to say from God; but then, to shew that we do it for a right end, we must do it after a right manner. Ministers may learn here, when they reprove people for what they say and do amiss, to teach them how to say and do better.

Thirdly. Because they would not leave off this ill way of speaking, though they were admonished of it, God threatens them here with utter ruin. They would still say, "The burthen of the Lord," though God had sent to them to forbid them, ver. 38. What little regard have those to the Divine authority that will not be persuaded by it to leave an idle word. But see what will come of it:

1. Those shall be severely reckoned with that thus pervert the words of God, that put a wrong construction on them, and make an ill use of them; and it shall be made to appear what a great provocation it is to God to mock his messengers. "I will even punish that man and his house;" whether he be prophet or priest, or one of the common people, it shall be visited upon him, ver. 34. Perverting God's word, and ridiculing the preachers of it, is a sin that brings ruining judgments upon families, and entails a curse upon a house. Another threatening we have, ver. 36, "Every man's word shall be his own burthen," that is, the guilt of this sin shall be so heavy upon him as to sink him into the pit of destruction. "God shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves," Ps. lxiv. 8. God will give them enough of their jest, so that "the burthen of the Lord" they shall have no heart to mention any more, it will be too heavy to make a jest of. They are as the madman that casteth firebrands, arrows, and death, while they pretend to be in sport.

2. The words of God, though thus perverted, shall be accomplished. Do they ask, "What is the burthen of the Lord?" Let the prophet ask them what burthen they mean. Is it this, "I will even forsake you?" ver. 33. This is the burthen that shall be laid and bound upon them, ver. 39, 40, "Behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you, and I will forsake you." I will leave you, and have no thoughts of returning to you. Those are miserable indeed that are forsaken and forgotten of God, and men's bantering God's judgments will not baffle them. Jerusalem was the city God had taken to himself as a holy city, and then given to them and their fathers; but that shall now be forsaken and forgotten. God had taken them to be a people near to him, but they shall now be cast out of his presence. They had been great and honourable among the nations, but now God will bring upon them an everlasting reproach, and a perpetual shame; both their sin and their punishment shall be their lasting disgrace. It is here upon record to their infamy, and will remain so to the world's end. Note, God's word will be magnified and made honourable when those that mock at it shall be vilified and made contemptible. They that despise me shall be lightly esteemed.

CHAPTER XXIV.

In the close of the foregoing chapter we had a general prediction of the utter ruin of Jerusalem, that it should be forsaken and forgotten; which, whatever effects it had upon others, we have reason to think made the prophet himself very melancholy; now in this chapter God encourageth him, by shewing him that, though the desolation seemed to be universal, yet all were not equally involved in it, but God knew how to distinguish, how to separate between the precious and the vile. Some were gone into captivity already with Jeconiah,—over them Jeremiah lamented, but God tells him it should turn to their good; others yet remained hardened in their sins, against whom Jeremiah had a just indignation, but those God tells him should go into captivity, and it should prove to their hurt. To inform the prophet of this, and affect him with it, here is, I. A vision of two baskets of figs, one very good and the other very bad, ver. 1—3. II. The explication of this vision, applying the good figs to those that were already sent into captivity for their good, ver. 4—7; the bad figs to those that should hereafter be sent into captivity for their hurt, ver. 8—10.

THE LORD shewed me, and, behold, two baskets of figs were set before the temple of the LORD, after that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon had carried away captive Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, and the princes of Judah, with the carpenters and smiths, from Jerusalem, and had brought them to Babylon. 2 One basket had very good figs, even like the figs that are first ripe: and the other basket had very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, they were so bad. 3 Then said the LORD unto me, What seest thou, Jeremiah? And I said, Figs; the good figs, very good; and the evil, very evil, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil. 4 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

5 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel;
Like these good figs, [of Judah,
So will I acknowledge them that are carried away captive
Whom I have sent out of this place
Into the land of the Chaldeans for their good.
6 For I will set mine eyes upon them for good,
And I will bring them again to this land:

And I will build them, and not pull them down;
And I will plant them, and not pluck them up. [LORD:
7 And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the
And they shall be my people, and I will be their God:
For they shall return unto me with their whole heart.
8 And as the evil figs, which cannot be eaten, they are so evil;
Surely thus saith the LORD,
So will I give Zedekiah the king of Judah, and his princes,
And the residue of Jerusalem, that remain in this land,
And them that dwell in the land of Egypt:
9 And I will deliver them to be removed
Into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt,
To be a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse,
In all places whither I shall drive them.
10 And I will send the sword, the famine, and the pestilence,
among them,
Till they be consumed from off the land
That I gave unto them and to their fathers.

This short chapter helps us to put a very comfortable construction upon a great many long ones, by shewing us that the same providence which to some is a savour of death unto death may, by the grace and blessing of God, be made to others a savour of life unto life; and that, though God's people share with others in the same calamity, yet it is not the same to them that it is to others, but is designed for their good, and shall issue in their good; to them it is a correcting rod in the hand of a tender father, while to others it is an avenging sword in the hand of a righteous judge. Observe,

First. The date of this sermon. It was after, a little after, Jeconiah's captivity, ver. 1. Jeconiah was himself a despised, broken vessel, but with him were carried away some very valuable persons, Ezekiel for one, Eze. i. 3; many of the princes of Judah then went into captivity, Daniel and his fellows were carried off a little before. Of the people, only the carpenters and the smiths were forced away, either because the Chaldeans needed some ingenious men of those trades, (they had a great plenty of astrologers and stargazers, but a great scarcity of smiths and carpenters,) or because the Jews would have a great loss of them, and would for want of them be unable to fortify their cities, and furnish themselves with weapons of war. Now it should seem there were many good people carried away in that captivity, which the pious prophet laid much to heart, while there were those that triumphed in it, and insulted over those to whose lot it fell to go into captivity. Note, We must not conclude concerning the first and greatest sufferers that they were the worst and greatest sinners; for perhaps it may appear quite otherwise, as it did here.

Secondly. The vision by which this distinction of the captives was represented to the prophet's mind. He saw "two baskets of figs set before the temple," there ready to be offered as first fruits, to the honour of God. Perhaps the priests, being remiss in their duty, were not ready to receive them, and dispose of them according to the law, and therefore Jeremiah sees them standing before the temple. But that which was the significancy of the vision was, that the figs in one basket were extraordinarily good, those in the other basket extremely bad. The children of men are all as the fruits of the fig-tree, capable of being made serviceable to God and man, Jud. ix. 11. But some are as good figs, than which nothing more pleasant; others as damaged, rotten figs, than which nothing more nauseous. What creature viler than a wicked man, and what more valuable than a godly man? The good figs were like those that are first ripe, which are most acceptable (Mic. vii. 1) and most prized when newly come into season. The bad figs are such as could not be eaten, they were so evil; they could not answer the end of their creation, were neither pleasant nor good for food, and what then were they good for? If God has no honour from men, nor their generation any service, they are even like the bad figs, that cannot be eaten, that will not answer any good purpose. If the salt have lost its savour, it is thenceforth fit for nothing but the dunghill. Of the persons that are presented to the Lord at the door of his tabernacle, some are sincere, and they are very good; others dissemble with God, and they are very bad. Sinners are the worst of men, hypocrites the worst of sinners. Corruptio optimi est pessima,—'That which is best becomes, when corrupted, the worst.'

Thirdly. The exposition and application of this vision. God intended by it to raise the dejected spirits of those that were gone into captivity, by assuring them of a happy return, and to humble and awaken the proud and secure spirits of those who continued yet in Jerusalem, by assuring them of a miserable captivity.

1. Here is the moral of the good figs, that were very good, the first ripe. Those represented the pious captives, that seemed first ripe for ruin, for they went first into captivity, but should prove first ripe for mercy, and their captivity should help to ripen them; these are pleasing to God, as good figs are to us, and shall be carefully preserved for use. Now observe here,

1st. Those that were already carried into captivity were the good figs, that God would own. This shews, First. That we cannot determine of God's love or hatred by all that is before us. When God's judgments are abroad, they are not always the worst that are first seized by them. Secondly. That early suffering sometimes proves for the best to us. The sooner the child is corrected the better effect the correction is likely to have. Those that went first into captivity were as the son whom the father loves and chastens betimes, chastens while there is hope, and it did well; but those that staid behind were like a child long left to himself, who, when afterwards corrected, is stubborn and made worse by it, Lam iii. 27.

2nd. God owns their captivity to be his doing. Whoever were the instruments of it, he ordered and directed it; ver. 5, "I have sent them out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans." It is God that puts his gold into the furnace to be tried; his hand is in a special manner to be eyed in the afflictions of good people. The judge orders the malefactor into the hand of an executioner, but the father corrects the child with his own hand.

3rd. Even this disgraceful, uncomfortable captivity God intended for their benefit, and we are sure his intentions are never frustrated; "I have sent them into the land of the Chaldeans for their good." It seemed to be every way for their hurt, not only as it was the ruin of their estates, honours, and liberties, parted them from their relations and friends, and put them under the power of their enemies and oppressors, but as it sunk their spirits, discouraged their faith, deprived them of the benefit of God's oracles and ordinances; and exposed them to temptations, and yet it was designed for their good, and proved so in the issue as to many of them: "Out of the eater came forth meat." By their afflictions they were convinced of sin, humbled under the hand of God, weaned from the world, made serious, taught to pray, and turned from their iniquity, particularly they were cured of their inclination to idolatry; and thus it was good for them that they were afflicted, Ps. cxix. 67, 71.

4th. God promiseth them that he will own them in their captivity. Though they seem abandoned they shall be acknowledged; their scornful relations they left behind will scarce own them, or their kindred to them, but God saith, "I will acknowledge them." Note, The Lord knows them that are his, and will own them in all conditions; nakedness and sword shall not separate them from his love.

5th. God assures them of his protection in their trouble, and a glorious deliverance out of it in due time, ver. 6. Being sent into captivity for their good, they shall not be lost there; but, as when the refiner puts his gold into the furnace, First. He has his eye upon it while it is there, and it is a careful eye, to see that it sustain no damage; so "I will set mine eyes upon them for good," to order every thing for the best, that all the circumstances of the affliction may concur to the answering of the great intention of it. Secondly. He will be sure to take it out of the furnace again, as soon as the work designed upon it is done; "I will bring them again to this land." They were sent abroad for improvement a while, under a severe discipline; but they shall be fetched back, when they have gone through their trial there, to their father's house. Thirdly. He will fashion his gold when he has refined it, will make it a vessel of honour fit for his use; so, when God has brought them back from their trial, he will build them, and make them a habitation for himself; will plant them, and make them a vineyard for himself. Their captivity was to square the rough stones, and make them fit for his building; to prune up the young trees, and make them fit for his planting.

6th. He engageth to prepare them for those temporal mercies he designed for them, by bestowing spiritual mercies upon them, ver. 7. It is this that will make their captivity be for their good; this shall be both the improvement of their affliction and their qualification for deliverance. When our troubles are sanctified to us, then we may be sure they will end well. Now that which is promised is, First. That they should be better acquainted with God; they should learn more of God by his providences in Babylon than they had learned by all his oracles and ordinances in Jerusalem; thanks to Divine grace, for, if that had not wrought mightily upon them in Babylon, they would for ever have forgotten God. It is here promised, "I will give them" not so much a head to know me, but "a heart to know me;" for the right knowledge of God consists not in notion and speculation, but in the convictions of the practical judgment, directing and governing the will and affections. "A good understanding have all they that do his commandments," Ps. cxi. 10. Where God gives a sincere desire and inclination to know him, he will give that knowledge. It is God himself that gives a heart to know him, else we should perish for ever in our ignorance. Secondly. That they should be entirely converted to God; to his will as their rule, his service as their business, and his glory as their end; "They shall return to me with their whole heart." God himself undertakes for them that they shall; and if he turn us we shall be turned. This follows upon the former; for those that have a heart to know God aright will not only turn to him, but turn with their whole heart; for those that are either obstinate in their rebellion or hypocritical in their religion may truly be said to be ignorant of God. Thirdly. That thus they should be again taken into covenant with God, as much to their comfort as ever. "They shall be my people, and I will be their God." God will own them as formerly for his people, both in the discoveries of himself to them, his acceptance of their services, and his gracious appearances on their behalf; and they shall have liberty to own him for their God, in their prayers to him, and their expectations from him. Note, Those that have backslidden from God, if they do in sincerity return to him, are admitted as freely as any to all the privileges and comforts of the everlasting covenant, which is herein well ordered, that every transgression in the covenant doth not throw us out of covenant, and that afflictions are not only consistent with, but flowing from, covenant love.

2. Here is the moral of the bad figs. Zedekiah and his princes and partizans yet remain in the land, proud and secure enough, Eze. xi. 3. Many were fled into Egypt for shelter, and they thought they had shifted well for themselves and their own safety, and boasted that, though therein they had gone contrary to the command of God, yet they had acted prudently for themselves. Now, as to both these, that looked so scornfully upon those that were gone into captivity, it is here threatened, 1st. That, whereas those that were already carried away were settled in one country, where they had the comfort of one another's society, though in captivity, these should be dispersed, and "removed into all the kingdoms of the earth," where they should have no joy one of another. 2nd. That, whereas those were carried captives for their good, these should be removed into all countries for their hurt. Their afflictions should be so far from humbling them that they should harden them; not bring them nearer to God, but set them at a greater distance from him. 3rd. That, whereas those should have the honour of being owned of God in their troubles, these should have the shame of being abandoned by all mankind; "In all places whither I shall drive them, they shall be a reproach and a proverb;" Such a one is as false and proud as a Jew; Such a one is poor and miserable as a Jew. All their neighbours shall make a jest of them, and of the calamities brought upon them. 4th. That, whereas those should return to their own land, these shall be consumed from that land, never to see it more, and it shall be of no avail to them to plead it was "the land God gave to their fathers," for they had it from God, and he gave it them upon condition of obedience. 5th. That, whereas those were reserved for better times, these were reserved for worse; wherever they are removed, "the sword, and famine, and pestilence," shall be sent after them, shall soon overtake them, and, coming with commission so to do, shall overcome them. God has variety of judgments wherewith to prosecute those that fly from justice, and those that have escaped one may expect another, till they are brought to repent and reform.

Doubtless this prophecy had its accomplishment in the men of that generation; yet, because we read not of any such remarkable difference between those of Jeconiah's captivity and those of Zedekiah's, it is probable this has a typical reference to the last destruction of the Jews by the Romans, in which those of them that believed were taken care of; but those that continued obstinate in unbelief were driven into all countries for "a taunt and a curse," and so they remain to this day.

CHAPTER XXV.

The prophecy of this chapter bears date some time before those prophecies in the chapters next foregoing, for they are not placed in the exact order of time in which they were delivered. This is dated in the first year of Nebuchadrezzar, that remarkable year, when the sword of the Lord began to be drawn and furbished. Here is, I. A review of the prophecies that had been delivered to Judah and Jerusalem for many years last past, by Jeremiah himself and other prophets, with the little regard given to them, and the little success of them, ver. 1—7. II. A very express threatening of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, by the king of Babylon, for their contempt of God, and their continuance in sin, ver. 8—11. To which is annexed a promise of the deliverance out of their captivity in Babylon, after seventy years, ver. 12—14. III. A prediction of the devastation of divers other nations about, by Nebuchadrezzar, represented by a cup of fury put into their hands, ver. 15—28; by a sword sent among them, ver. 29—33; and a desolation made among the shepherds, and their flocks and pastures, ver. 34—38; so that we have here judgment beginning at the house of God, but not ending there.

THE word that came to Jeremiah concerning all the people of Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, that was the first year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon; 2 The which Jeremiah the prophet spake unto all the people of Judah, and to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, saying, 3 From the thirteenth year of Josiah the son of Amon king of Judah, even unto this day, that is the three and twentieth year, the word of the LORD hath come unto me, and I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking; but ye have not hearkened. 4 And the LORD hath sent unto you all his servants the prophets, rising early and sending them; but ye have not hearkened, nor inclined your ear to hear. 5 They said, Turn ye again now every one from his evil way, and from the evil of your doings, and dwell in the land that the LORD hath given unto you and to your fathers for ever and ever: 6 And go not after other gods to serve them, and to worship them, and provoke me not to anger with the works of your hands; and I will do you no hurt. 7 Yet ye have not hearkened unto me, saith the LORD; that ye might provoke me to anger with the works of your hands to your own hurt.

We have here a message from God concerning all the people of Judah, ver. 1, which Jeremiah delivered in his name unto all the people of Judah, ver. 2. Note, That which is of universal concern ought to be of universal cognizance; it is fit the word that is concerning all the people, as the word of God is, the word of the Gospel particularly, should be divulged to all in general, and, as far as may be, addressed to each in particular. Jeremiah had been sent to the house of the king, ch. xxii. 1, and he took the courage to deliver his message there; here he is sent to all the people, and he takes the pains to deliver his message to them, probably when they were all come up to Jerusalem to worship at some of the solemn fasts; then he had them together, and it was to be hoped then, if ever, they would be well disposed to hear counsel, and receive instruction. This prophecy is dated in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and first of Nebuchadnezzar. It was in the latter end of Jehoiakim's third year that Nebuchadnezzar began to reign himself alone, (having reigned some time before in conjunction with his father,) as appears Dan. i. 1; but Jehoiakim's fourth year was began before Nebuchadnezzar's first was completed. Now that active, daring, martial prince began to set up for the world's master, God by his prophet gives notice that he is his servant, and what work he intends to employ him in, that his growing greatness, which was so formidable to the nations, might not be construed as any reflection upon the power and providence of God in the government of the world. Nebuchadnezzar should not bid so fair for a universal monarchy, (I should have said, a universal tyranny,) but that God had purposes of his own to serve by him; in the execution of which the world shall see the meaning of God's permitting and ordering a thing that seemed such a reflection on his sovereignty and goodness. Now in this message we may observe,

First. The great pains that had been taken with this people to bring them to repentance, which they are here put in mind of, as an aggravation of their sin, and justification of God in his proceedings against them.

1. Jeremiah for his part had been a constant preacher among them twenty-three years. He began in the thirteenth year of Josiah, who reigned thirty-one years, so that he prophesied about eighteen or nineteen years in his reign, then in the reign of Jehoahaz, and now four years of Jehoiakim's reign. Note, God keeps an account, whether we do or no, how long we have enjoyed the means of grace; and the longer we have enjoyed them the heavier will our account be, if we have not improved them. "These three years" (these three-and-twenty years) "have I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree." All this while, 1st. God had been constant in sending messages to them, as there was occasion for them. From that time to this very day "the word of the Lord has come unto me," for your use. Though they had the substance of the warning sent them already in the books of Moses, yet, because those were not duly regarded as applied, God sent to enforce them, and to make them more particular, that they might be without excuse. Thus God's Spirit was striving with them, as with the old world, Gen. vi. 3. 2nd. Jeremiah had been faithful and industrious in delivering those messages. He could appeal to themselves as well as to God and his own conscience concerning this; "I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking." He had declared to them the whole counsel of God; he had taken a great deal of care and pains to discharge his trust in such a manner as might be most likely to win and work upon them. What men are solicitous about, and intent upon, they rise up early to prosecute. It intimates that his head was so full of thoughts about it, and his heart so intent upon doing good, that it broke his sleep, and made him get up betimes to project which way he might take that would be most likely to do them good. He rose early both because he would lose no time and because he would lay hold on and improve the best time to work upon them, when, if ever, they were sober and sedate. Christ came early in the morning to preach in the temple, and the people as early to hear him, Lu. xxi. 38. Morning lectures have their advantages. "My voice shalt thou hear in the morning."

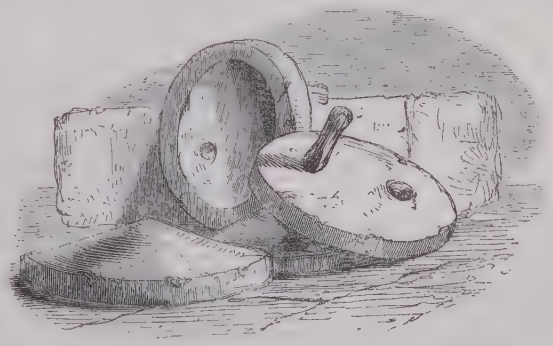
2. Besides him God had sent them other prophets on the same errand, ver. 4. Of the writing prophets, Micah, Nahum, and Habakkuk were a little before him, and Zephaniah contemporary with him. But, besides those, there were many other of God's servants the prophets that preached awakening sermons which were never published. And here God himself is said to rise early and send them; intimating how much his heart also was upon it, that his people should turn and live, and not to go on and die, Eze. xxxiii. 11.

3. All the messages sent them were to the purpose, and much to the same purpose, ver. 5, 6. 1st. They all told them of their faults, their evil way, and the evil of their doings. Those were not of God's sending who flattered them as if there were nothing amiss among them. 2nd. They all reproved them particularly for their idolatry, as a sin that was in a special manner provoking to God; their going after other gods to serve them, and worship them; gods that were the work of their own hands. 3rd. They all called to them to repent of their sins, and reform their lives. This was the burthen of every song, "Turn ye now every one from his evil way." Note, Personal and particular reformation must be insisted on as necessary to a national deliverance. Every one must turn from his own evil way. The street will not be clean unless every one sweep before his own door. 4th. They all assured them that if they did so it would certainly be the lengthening out of their tranquillity. The mercies they enjoyed should be continued to them; "You shall dwell in the land," dwell at ease, dwell in peace in this good land which "the Lord has given you and your fathers." Nothing but sin will turn you out of it, and that shall not if you turn from it. The judgments they feared should be prevented; "Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt." Note, We should never receive from God the evil of punishment if we did not provoke him by the evil of sin. God deals fairly with us, never corrects his children without cause, nor causeth grief to us unless we give offence to him.

Secondly. Yet all was to no purpose. They were not wrought upon to take the right and only method to turn away the wrath of God. Jeremiah was a lively, affectionate preacher, yet they hearkened not to him, ver. 3. The other prophets dealt faithfully with them, but neither did they hearken to them nor incline their ear, ver. 4. That very particular sin which they were told of all other was most offensive to God, and made them obnoxious to his justice, they wilfully persisted in. You "provoke me with the works of your hands to your own hurt." Note, What is a provocation to God will prove in the end hurt to ourselves, and we must bear the blame of it. "O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself."

8 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts; Because ye have not heard my words, 9 Behold, I will send and take all the families of the north, saith the LORD, and Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, my servant, and will bring them against this land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and against all these nations round about, and will utterly destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and perpetual desolations.

10 Moreover I will take from them
The voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride,
The sound of the millstones, and the light of the candle.



EASTERN MILLSTONES.

11 And this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment; and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years. 12 And it shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished, that I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation, saith the LORD, for their iniquity, and the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolations. 13 And I will bring upon that land all my words which I have pronounced against it, even all that is written in this book, which Jeremiah hath prophesied against all the nations. 14 For many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of them also: and I will recompense them according to their deeds, and according to the works of their own hands.

Here is the sentence grounded upon the foregoing charge; "Because you have not heard my words" I must take another course with you, ver. 8. Note, When men will not regard the judgments of God's mouth they may expect to feel the judgments of his hands; to hear the rod, since they would not hear the word; for the sinner must either be parted from his sin or perish in it. Wrath comes without remedy against those only that sin without repentance. It is not so much men's turning aside that ruins them, as their not returning.

First. The ruin of the land of Judah, by the king of Babylon's armies, is here decreed, ver. 9. God sent his servants the prophets, and they were not heeded, and therefore God will send for his servant the king of Babylon, whom they cannot mock, and despise, and persecute, as they did his servants the prophets. Note, The messengers of God's wrath will be sent against those that would not receive the messengers of his mercy. One way or other God will be heeded, and will make men know that he is the Lord. Nebuchadnezzar, though a stranger to the true God, the God of Israel, nay, and an enemy to him, and afterwards a rival with him, yet in the descent he made upon this country was God's servant, accomplished his purpose, was employed by him, and was an instrument in his hand for the correction of his people. He was really serving God's designs when he thought he was serving his own ends. Justly therefore doth God here call himself the Lord of hosts, ver. 8; for here is an instance of his sovereign dominion not only over the inhabitants, but over the armies of this earth, of which he makes what use he pleaseth. He hath them all at his command: the most potent and absolute monarchs are his servants; Nebuchadnezzar, that is an instrument of his wrath, is as truly his servant as Cyrus that is an instrument of his mercy. The land of Judah being to be made desolate, God here musters his army that is to do it, gathers them together, takes "all the families of the north," if there be occasion for them, leads them on as their commander-in-chief, "brings them against this land," gives them success, not only against Judah and Jerusalem, but "against all the nations round about," that there might be no dependence upon them as allies or assistants against that threatening force. The utter destruction of this and all the neighbouring lands is here described, ver. 9—11. It shall be total; "The whole land shall be a desolation;" not only desolate, but a desolation itself, both city and country shall be laid waste, and all the wealth of both made a prey of. It shall be lasting, even perpetual desolations; they shall continue so long in ruins, and after long waiting there shall appear so little prospect of relief, that every one shall call it perpetual. This desolation shall be the ruin of all their credit among their neighbours; it shall bury their honour in the dust, shall "make them an astonishment and an hissing." Every one will be amazed at them, and hiss them off the stage of action with a just disgrace, for deserting a God that would have been their protection, for impostors that would certainly be their destruction. It will likewise be the ruin of all their comfort among themselves; it shall be a final period of all their joy; "I will take from them the voice of mirth," hang their harps on the willow-trees, and put them out of tune for songs; "I will take from them the voice of mirth," they shall neither have cause for it nor hearts for it. They would not hear the voice of God's word, and therefore "the voice of mirth" shall no more be heard among them. They shall be deprived of food; "the sound of the millstones" shall not be heard, for when the enemy hath seized their stores the sound of the grinding must needs be low, Eccl. xii. 4. An end shall be put to all business; there shall not be seen "the light of a candle," for there shall be no work to be done worth candlelight. And, lastly, they shall be deprived of their liberty; "Those nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years." The fixing of the time how long the captivity shall last would be of great use not only for the confirmation of the prophecy, when the event (which in this particular could by no human sagacity be foreseen) should exactly answer the prediction, but for the comfort of the people of God in their calamity, and the encouragement of faith and prayer. Daniel, who was himself a prophet, had an eye to it, Dan. ix. 2. Nay, God himself had an eye to it, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 22; for therefore he stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, that the word spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah might be accomplished. "Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world," which appears by this, that, when he has thought fit, some of them have been made known to his servants the prophets, and by them to his church.

Secondly. The ruin of Babylon at last is here likewise foretold, as it had been long before by Isaiah, ver. 12—14. The destroyers must themselves be destroyed, and the rod thrown into the fire when the correcting work is done with it. This shall be done when seventy years are accomplished, for the destruction of Babylon must make way for the deliverance of the captives. It is a great doubt when these seventy years commence: some date them from the captivity in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and first of Nebuchadnezzar; others from the captivity of Jehoiakim eight years after. I rather incline to the former, because then these nations began to serve the king of Babylon, and because usually God has taken the earliest time from which to reckon the accomplishment of a promise of mercy, as will appear in computing the four hundred years' servitude in Egypt. And if so, eighteen or nineteen years of the seventy were run out before Jerusalem and the temple were quite destroyed in the eleventh year of Zedekiah. However that be, when the time, the set time to favour Zion, is come, the king of Babylon must be visited, and all the instances of his tyranny reckoned for. Then that nation shall be punished for their iniquity, as the other nations have been punished for theirs. That land must then be a perpetual desolation, such as they had made other lands; for the Judge of all the earth will both do right and avenge wrong, as king of nations, and king of saints. Let proud conquerors and oppressors be moderate in the use of their power and success; for it will come at last to their own turn to suffer; their day will come to fall. In this destruction of Babylon, which was to be brought about by the Medes and Persians, reference shall be had, 1. To what God had said; "I will bring upon that land all my words:" for all the wealth and honour of Babylon shall be sacrificed to the truth of the Divine predictions, and all its power broken, rather than one iota or tittle of God's word shall fall to the ground. The same Jeremiah that prophesied the destruction of other nations by the Chaldeans foretold also the destruction of the Chaldeans themselves; and this must be brought upon them, ver. 13. It is with reference to this very event that God saith, ver. 26, He will "confirm the word of his servant, and perform the counsel of his messengers," Isa. xliv. 26. 2. To what they had done; ver. 14, "I will recompense them according to their deeds," by which they transgressed the law of God, even then when they were made to serve his purposes. They had made many nations to serve them, and trampled upon them with the greatest insolence imaginable; but, now the measure of their iniquity is full, many nations and great kings that are in alliance with, and come in to the assistance of, Cyrus king of Persia shall serve themselves of them also; shall make themselves masters of their country, and enrich themselves with their spoils, and make them the footstool by which to mount the throne of a universal monarchy. They shall make use of them for servants and soldiers; "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity."

15 For thus saith the LORD God of Israel unto me; Take the wine cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations, to whom I send thee, to drink it. 16 And they shall drink, and be moved, and be mad, because of the sword that I will send among them. 17 Then took I the cup at the LORD's hand, and made all the nations to drink, unto whom the LORD had sent me: 18 To wit, Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, and the kings thereof, and the princes thereof, to make them a desolation, an astonishment, an hissing, and a curse; as it is this day; 19 Pharaoh king of Egypt, and his servants, and his princes, and all his people; 20 And all the mingled people, and all the kings of the land of Uz, and all the kings of the land of the Philistines, and Ashkelon, and Azzah, and Ekron, and the remnant of Ashdod, 21 Edom, and Moab, and the children of Ammon, 22 And all the kings of Tyrus, and all the kings of Zidon, and the kings of the isles which are beyond the sea, 23 Dedan, and Tema, and Buz, and all that are in the utmost corners, 24 And all the kings of Arabia, and all the kings of the mingled people that dwell in the desert, 25 And all the kings of Zimri, and all the kings of Elam, and all the kings of the Medes, 26 And all the kings of the north, far and near, one with another, and all the kingdoms of the world, which are upon the face of the earth: and the king of Sheshach shall drink after them. 27 Therefore thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Drink ye, and be drunken, and spue, and fall, and rise no more, because of the sword which I will send among you. 28 And it shall be, if they refuse to take the cup at thine hand to drink, then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Ye shall certainly drink. 29 For, lo, I begin to bring evil on the city which is called by my name, and should ye be utterly unpunished? Ye shall not be unpunished: for I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the LORD of hosts.

TAKING THE CUP—FROM THE ASSYRIAN MARBLES.

Under the similitude of a cup going round, which all the company must drink of, is here represented the universal desolation that was now coming upon that part of the world, which Nebuchadnezzar, who had just now began to reign and act, was to be the instrument of, and which should at length recoil upon his own country. The cup in the vision is to be a sword in the accomplishment of it. So it is explained, ver. 16, It is "the sword that I will send among them," the sword of war, that should be irresistibly strong, and implacably cruel. Observe,

First. Whence this destroying sword should come. From the hand of God; it is the sword of Lord, ch. xlvii. 6; bathed in heaven, Isa. xxxiv. 5; wicked men are made use of as his sword, Ps. xvii. 13. It is the wine cup of his fury. It is the just anger of God that sends this judgment. The nations have provoked him by their sins, and they must fall under the tokens of his wrath. These are compared to some intoxicating liquor, which they shall be forced to drink of; as formerly condemned malefactors were sometimes executed by being compelled to drink poison. The wicked are said to drink the wrath of the Almighty, Job xxi. 20; Rev. xiv. 10. Their share of troubles in this world is represented by the dregs of a cup of red wine full of mixture, Ps. lxxv. 8: see Ps. xi. 6. The wrath of God in this world is but as a cup, in comparison with the full streams of it in the other world.

Secondly. By whose hand it should be sent them. By the hand of Jeremiah, as the judge set over the nations, (ch. i. 10,) to pass this sentence upon them; and by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, as the executioner. What a much greater figure then doth the poor prophet make than what the potent prince makes, if we look upon their relation to God, though in the eye of the world it was the reverse of it. Jeremiah must take the cup at God's hand, and compel the nations to drink it. He foretells no hurt to them, but what God appoints him to foretell; and what is foretold by a Divine authority will certainly be fulfilled by a Divine power.

Thirdly. On whom it should be sent. On all the nations within the verge of Israel's acquaintance, and the lines of their communication. Jeremiah took the cup, and made all the nations to drink of it; that is, he prophesied concerning each of the nations here mentioned, that they should share in this great desolation that was coming. "Jerusalem and the cities of Judah" are put first, ver. 18; for "judgment begins at the house of God," 1 Pet. iv. 17; at the sanctuary, Eze. ix. 6. Whether Nebuchadnezzar had his eye principally upon Jerusalem and Judah in his expedition or no, doth not appear; probably he had, for it was as considerable as any of the nations here mentioned; however, God had his eye principally to them. And this part of the prophecy was already begun to be accomplished, which that melancholy parenthesis speaks, ("as it is this day,") for in the fourth year of Jehoiakim things were come into a very ill posture, and all the foundations were out of course. "Pharaoh king of Egypt," comes next; because the Jews trusted to that broken reed, ver. 9. The remains of them fled to Egypt; and there Jeremiah particularly foretold the destruction of that country, ch. xliii. 10, 11. All the other nations that bordered on Canaan must pledge Jerusalem in this bitter cup, this cup of trembling. The "mingled people," the Arabians, so some; some rovers of divers nations that lived by rapine, so others; "the kings of the land of Uz," joined to the country of the Edomites. The Philistines had been vexatious to Israel; but now their cities and their lords become a prey to this mighty conqueror. "Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon," are places well known to border upon Israel. "The isles beyond or beside the sea," are supposed to be those parts of Phœnicia and Syria that lay on the coast of the Mediterranean sea. Dedan, and the other countries mentioned, ver. 23, 24, seem to have lain upon the confines of Idumea and Arabia the desert. Those of Elam are the Persians, with whom the Medes are joined; now looked upon as inconsiderable, and yet afterwards able to make reprisals upon Babylon for themselves and all their neighbours. "The kings of the north," that lay nearer to Babylon, and others that lay at some distance, will be sure to be seized on, and made a prey of by the victorious sword of Nebuchadnezzar. Nay, He shall push on his victories with such incredible fury and success, that "all the kingdoms of the world" that were then and there known, should become sacrifices to his ambition. Thus Alexander is said to have conquered the world; and the Roman empire is called the world, Lu. ii. 1. Or, it may be taken as reading the doom of all the kingdoms of this earth; one time or other they shall feel the direful effects of war. The world has been, and will be, a great cockpit, while men's lusts war as they do in their members, Jas. iv. 1; but, that the conquerors may see their fate with the conquered, it concludes, "The king of Sheshach shall drink after them," that is, the king of Babylon, himself, that has given his neighbours all this trouble and vexation, shall at length have it return upon own head. That by Sheshach is meant Babylon is plain from ch. li. 41; but whether it was another name of the same city, or the name of another city of the same kingdom, is uncertain. Babylon's ruin was foretold, ver. 12, 13; and upon this prophecy of its being the author of the ruin of so many nations it is very fitly repeated here again.

Fourthly. What should be the effect of it. The desolations which the sword should make in all these kingdoms are represented by the consequences of excessive drinking; ver. 16, "They shall drink, and be moved, and be mad;" and, ver. 27, "They shall be drunken, and spue, and fall, and rise no more." Now this may serve, 1. To make us loath the sin of drunkenness, that the consequences of it are made use of to set forth a most woful and miserable condition. Drunkenness deprives men for the present of the use of their reason, makes them mad. It takes from them, likewise, that which next to reason is the most valuable blessing, and that is health; it makes them sick, and endangers the bones and the life. Men in drink often fall and rise no more. It is a sin that is its own punishment. How wretchedly are they intoxicated and besotted that suffer themselves at any time to be intoxicated, especially to be by the frequent commission of this sin besotted with wine or strong drink! 2. To make us dread the judgment of war. When God sends the sword upon a nation, with warrant to make it desolate, it soon becomes like a drunken man; filled with confusion at the alarms of war; put into a hurry; its counsellors mad, and at their wits' end, staggering in all the measures they take, all the motions they make; sick at heart with continual vexation; vomiting up the riches they have greedily swallowed down, Job xx. 15; falling down before the enemy, and as unable to get up again, or do any thing to help themselves, as a man dead drunk is, Hab. ii. 16.

Fifthly. The undoubted certainty of it, with the reason given for it; ver. 28, 29, They will refuse to take the cup at thy hand; not only they will be loath that the judgment shall come, but they will be loath to believe that ever it will come. They will not give credit to the prediction of so despicable a man as Jeremiah; but tell them, it is the word of the Lord of hosts: he hath said it, and it is in vain for them to struggle with Omnipotence, "Ye shall certainly drink;" and give them this reason,—it is a time of visitation, it is a reckoning day, and Jerusalem has been called to an account already, "I begin to bring evil on the city that is called by my name;" its relation to me will not exempt it from punishment, "and should ye be utterly unpunished?" No, "If this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If they that have some good in them smart so severely for the evil that is found in them, can they expect to escape that have worse evils, and no good found among them? If Jerusalem be punished for learning idolatry of the nations, shall not the nations be punished of whom they learned it? No doubt they shall; "I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth," for they have helped to debauch the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

Upon this whole matter we may observe, 1. That there is a God that judgeth in the earth, to whom all the nations of the earth are accountable, and by whose judgment they must abide. 2. That God can easily bring to ruin the greatest nations, the most numerous and powerful, and such as have been most secure. 3. That those who have been vexatious and mischievous to the people of God will be reckoned with for it at last. Many of these nations had, in their turns, given disturbance to Israel, but now comes destruction on them. The year of the Redeemer will come, even the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. 4. That "the burthen of the word of the Lord" will at last become the burthen of his judgments. Isaiah had prophesied long since against most of these nations, ch. xiii., &c.; and now at length all his prophecies will have their complete fulfilling. 5. That those who are ambitious of power and dominion commonly become the troublers of the earth, and the plagues of their generation; so Nebuchadnezzar was, so proud of his might that he had no sense of right. These are the men that turn the world upside down, and yet expect to be admired and adored. Alexander thought himself a great prince, when others thought him no better than a great pirate. 6. That the greatest pomp and power in this world is of very uncertain continuance. Before Nebuchadnezzar's greater force kings themselves must yield, and become captives.

30 Therefore prophesy thou against them all these words, and say unto them,
The LORD shall roar from on high,
And utter his voice from his holy habitation;
He shall mightily roar upon his habitation;
He shall give a shout, as they that tread the grapes,
Against all the inhabitants of the earth.
31 A noise shall come even to the ends of the earth;
For the LORD hath a controversy with the nations,
He will plead with all flesh; [LORD.

We have in these verses a farther description of those terrible desolations which the king of Babylon, with his armies, should make in all the countries and nations round about Jerusalem. In Jerusalem God hath erected his temple, there were his oracles and ordinances, which the neighbouring nations should have attended to, and might have received benefit by; thither they should have applied themselves for knowledge of God and their duty, and then they might have had reason to bless God for their neighbourhood to Jerusalem; but they, instead of that, taking all opportunities either to debauch or to disturb that holy city, when God came to reckon with Jerusalem, because it learned so much of the way of the nations, he reckoned with the nations, because they learned so little of the way of Jerusalem. They will soon be aware of Nebuchadnezzar's making war upon them; but the prophet is here bidden to tell them that it is God himself that makes war upon them, a God with whom there is no contending.

First. The war is here proclaimed; ver. 30, "The Lord shall war from on high;" not from mount Zion and Jerusalem, (as Joel iii. 16, Am. i. 2,) but from heaven, from his holy habitation there; for now Jerusalem is one of the places against which he roars, "He shall mightily roar upon his habitation" on earth from that above. He has been long silent, and seemed not to take notice of the wickedness of the nations. The times of this ignorance God winked at; but now "he shall give a shout" as the assailants in battle do "against all the inhabitants of the earth," to whom it shall be a shout of terror, and yet a shout of joy in heaven, as theirs that treads the grapes; for, when God is reckoning with the proud enemies of his kingdom among men, there is a "great voice of much people heard in heaven, saying, Hallelujah," Rev. ix. 1; "He roars as a lion," Am. iii. 4, 8; as a lion that has "forsaken his covert, ver. 38; and is going abroad to seek his prey, upon which he roars, that he may the more easily seize it.

Secondly. The manifesto is here published, shewing the causes and reasons why God proclaims this war; ver. 31, "The Lord hath a controversy with the nations," he has just cause to contend with them, and he will take this way of pleading with them. His quarrel with them is, in one word, for their wickedness, their contempt of him, and his authority over them, and kindness to them, "He will give them that are wicked to the sword." They have provoked God to anger, and thence comes all this destruction; it is "because of the fierce anger of the Lord," ver. 37; and again, ver. 38, the "fierceness of the oppressor," or, as it might better be read, 'the fierceness of the oppressing sword,' (for the word is feminine,) is "because of his fierce anger;" and we are sure he is never angry without cause; but who knows the power of his anger?

Thirdly. The alarm is here given and taken. "A noise shall come even to the ends of the earth," so loud shall it roar, so far shall it reach, ver. 31. The alarm is not given by sound of trumpet, or beat of drum, but by a whirlwind, a great whirlwind, storm, or tempest, which shall be raised up from the coasts, the remote coasts of the earth, ver. 32. The Chaldean army shall be like a hurricane, raised in the north, but thence carried on with incredible fierceness and swiftness, bearing down all before it. It is like the whirlwind out of which God answered Job, which was exceeding terrible, Job xxxvii. 1; xxxviii. 1; and when the wrath of God thus roars like a lion from heaven, no marvel if it be echoed with shrieks from earth; for who can choose but tremble, when God thus speaks in displeasure: see Hos. xi. 10. Now the shepherds shall howl and cry, the kings and princes, and great ones of the earth, the principal of the flock; though they used to be the most courageous and secure, yet now their hearts shall fail them, "They shall wallow themselves in the ashes," ver. 34. Seeing themselves utterly unable to make head against the enemy, and seeing their country, which they have the charge of, and a concern for, inevitably ruined, they shall abandon themselves to sorrow. There shall be "a voice of the cry of the shepherds," and a "howling of the principal of the flock shall be heard," ver. 36. Those are great calamities indeed, that strike such a terror upon the great men, and put them into this mighty consternation. "The Lord hath spoiled their pasture," in which they fed their flock, and out of which they fed themselves; the spoiling of that makes them cry out thus. Perhaps, carrying on the metaphor of a lion roaring, it alludes to the great fright that shepherds are in, when they hear a roaring lion coming towards their flocks, and they have no way to flee, (ver. 35,) for their own security, neither can the principal of their flock escape. The enemy will be so numerous, so furious, so sedulous, and the extent of their armies so vast, that it will be impossible to avoid falling into their hands. Note, As we cannot outface, so we cannot outrun, the judgments of God. This is that for which the shepherds howl and cry.

Fourthly. The progress of this war is here described; ver. 32, "Behold evil shall go forth from nation to nation." As the cup goes round, every nation shall have its share and take its turn, because one doth not take warning by the calamities of another, to repent and reform. Nay, as if this were to be a little representation of the last and general judgment, it shall reach "from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth," ver. 33. The day of vengeance is in his heart, and now his hand shall find out all his enemies, wherever they are, Ps. xxi. 8. Note, When our neighbour's house is on fire it is time to be concerned for our own; when one nation is a seat of war every neighbour nation should hear, and fear, and make its peace with God.

Fifthly. The dismal consequences of this war are here foretold. The days of slaughter and dispersions are accomplished; that is, they are fully come, ver. 34, the time fixed in the Divine counsel for the slaughter of some and the dispersion of the rest, which will make the nations completely desolate. Multitudes shall fall by the sword of the merciless Chaldeans, so that the slain of the Lord shall be everywhere found; they are slain by commission from him, and are sacrificed to his justice. The slain for sin are the slain of the Lord; and, to complete the misery of their slaughter, they shall not be lamented in particular, so general shall the matter of lamentation be. Nay, they shall not be gathered up nor buried, for they shall have no friends left to do it, and the enemies shall not have so much humanity in them as to do it; and then they shall be as dung upon the earth, so vile and noisome. And it is well if, as dung manures the earth and makes it fruitful, so these horrid spectacles, which lie as monuments of Divine justice, might be a means to awaken the inhabitants of the earth to learn righteousness. The effect of this war will be the desolation of the whole land that is the seat of it, ver. 38, one land after another. But here are two expressions more that seem to make the case in a particular manner piteous: 1. "Ye shall fall like a pleasant vessel, ver. 34. The most desirable persons among them, that most valued themselves and were most valued, that were looked upon as vessels of honour, shall fall by the sword. Ye shall fall as a Venice glass or a China dish, which is soon broken all to pieces. Even the tender and delicate shall share in the common calamity. The sword devours one as well as another. 2. Even the peaceable habitations are cut down. Those that used to be quiet and not molested, the habitations in which ye have long dwelt in peace shall now be no longer such, but cut down by the war. Or, those that used to be quiet and not molesting any of their neighbours, those that lived in peace, easily, and gave no provocation to any, yet shall not escape. This is one of the direful effects of war, that even those who were most harmless and inoffensive yet suffer hard things. Blessed be God, there is a peaceable habitation above for all the sons of peace, which is out of the reach of fire and sword.

CHAPTER XXVI.

As in the history of the Acts of the Apostles that of their preaching and that of their suffering is interwoven, so it is in the account we have of the prophet Jeremiah; witness this chapter, where we are told, I. How faithfully he preached, ver. 1—6. II. How spitefully he was persecuted for so doing by the priests and the prophets, ver. 7—11. III. How bravely he stood to his doctrine in the face of his persecutors, ver. 12—15. IV. How wonderfully he was protected and delivered by the prudence of the princes and elders, ver. 16—19. Though Urijah, another prophet, was about the same time put to death by Jehoiakim, ver. 20—23, yet Jeremiah met with those that sheltered him, ver. 24.

IN the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah came this word from the LORD, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD; Stand in the court of the LORD's house, and speak unto all the cities of Judah, which come to worship in the LORD's house, all the words that I command thee to speak unto them; diminish not a word: 3 If so be they will hearken, and turn every man from his evil way, that I may repent me of the evil, which I purpose to do unto them because of the evil of their doings. 4 And thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD; If ye will not hearken to me, to walk in my law, which I have set before you, 5 To hearken to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you, both rising up early, and sending them, but ye have not hearkened; 6 Then will I make this house like Shiloh, and will make this city a curse to all the nations of the earth.

We have here the sermon that Jeremiah preached, which gave such offence that he was in danger of losing his life for it. It is here left upon record, as it were by way of appeal to the judgment of impartial men in all ages, whether Jeremiah was worthy to die for delivering such a message as this from God, and whether his persecutors were not very wicked and unreasonable men.

First. God directed him where to preach this sermon, and when, and to what auditory, ver. 2. Let not any censure Jeremiah as indiscreet in the choice of place and time, nor say he might have delivered his message more privately, in a corner, among his friends that he could confide in, and that he deserved to smart for not acting more cautiously; for God gave him orders to preach "in the court of the Lord's house," which was within the peculiar jurisdiction of his sworn enemies, the priests, and who would therefore take themselves to be in a particular manner affronted. He must preach this, as it should seem, at the time of one of the most solemn festivals, when persons were come from all the cities of Judah to worship in the Lord's house. These worshippers, we may suppose, had a great veneration for their priests, would credit the character they gave of men, and be exasperated against those whom they put into an ill name, and consequently side with them, and strengthen their hands against Jeremiah. But none of these things must move him or daunt him; in the face of all this danger he must preach this sermon, which, if it were not convincing, would be very provoking. And because the prophet might be in some temptation to palliate the matter, and make it better to his hearers than God had made it to him, to exchange an offensive expression for one more plausible, therefore God chargeth him particularly not to diminish a word, but to speak all the things, nay, and all the words, that he had commanded him. Note, God's ambassadors must keep close to their instructions, and not in the least vary from them, either to please men or to save themselves harmless; they must neither add nor diminish, Deu. iv. 2.

Secondly. God directed him what to preach, and it is that which could not give offence to any but such as were resolved to go on still in their trespasses.

1. He must assure them that if they would repent of their sins, and turn from them, though they were in imminent danger of ruin, and desolating judgments were just at the door, yet a stop should be put to them, and God would proceed no farther in his controversy with them, ver. 3. This was the main thing God intended in sending him to them, to try if they would return from their sins, that so God might turn from his anger, and turn away the judgments that threatened them, which he was not only willing but very desirous to do, as soon as he could do it without prejudice to the honour of his justice and holiness. See how God waits to be gracious, waits till we are duly qualified, till we are fit for him to be gracious to, and in the meantime tries a variety of methods to bring us to be so.

2. He must on the other hand assure them that, if they continue obstinate to all the calls God gave them, and would persist in their disobedience, it would certainly end in the ruin of their city and temple, ver. 4—6. 1st. That which God required of them was that they should be observant of what he had said to them, both by the written word and by his ministers; that they should walk in all his law which he set before them, the law of Moses and the ordinances and commandments of it; and that they should hearken to the words of his servants the prophets, who pressed nothing upon them but what was agreeable to the law of Moses that was set before them, as a touchstone to try the spirits by, and by this they were distinguished from the false prophets, who drew them from the law, instead of drawing them to it. The law was what God himself set before them. The prophets were his own servants, and were immediately sent by him to them, and sent with a great deal of care and concern, rising early to send them, lest they should come too late, when their prejudices had got possession and were become invincible. They had hitherto been deaf both to the law and to the prophets, "Ye have not hearkened;" all he expects now is, that at length they should heed what he said, and make his word their rule,—a reasonable demand. 2nd. That which is threatened in case of refusal is, that this city, and the temple in it, shall fare as their predecessors did, Shiloh, and the tabernacle there, for a like refusal to walk in God's laws and hearken to his prophets, then when the present dispensation of prophecy just began in Samuel. Now could a sentence be expressed more unexceptionably? Is not a rule of justice, ut parium par sit ratio,—'that those whose causes are the same be dealt with alike?' If Jerusalem be like Shiloh in respect of sin, why should it not be like Shiloh in respect of punishment? Can any other be expected? This was not the first time he had given them warning to this purpose: see ch. vii. 12—14. When the temple, which was the glory of Jerusalem, was destroyed, the city was thereby made a curse, for the temple was that which made it a blessing. If the salt lose that savour it is thenceforth good for nothing; it shall be a curse, that is, it shall be the pattern of a curse; if a man would curse any city, he would say, God make it like Jerusalem. Note, Those that will not be subject to the commands of God make themselves subject to the curse of God.

7 So the priests and the prophets and all the people heard Jeremiah speaking these words in the house of the LORD. 8 Now it came to pass, when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the LORD had commanded him to speak unto all the people, that the priests and the prophets and all the people took him, saying, Thou shalt surely die. 9 Why hast thou prophesied in the name of the LORD, saying, This house shall be like Shiloh, and this city shall be desolate without an inhabitant? And all the people were gathered against Jeremiah in the house of the LORD. 10 When the princes of Judah heard these things, then they came up from the king's house unto the house of the LORD, and sat down in the entry of the new gate of the LORD's house. 11 Then spake the priests and the prophets unto the princes and to all the people, saying, This man is worthy to die; for he hath prophesied against this city, as ye have heard with your ears. 12 Then spake Jeremiah unto all the princes and to all the people, saying, The LORD sent me to prophesy against this house and against this city all the words that ye have heard. 13 Therefore now amend your ways and your doings, and obey the voice of the LORD your God; and the LORD will repent him of the evil that he hath pronounced against you. 14 As for me, behold, I am in your hand: do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you. 15 But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof: for of a truth the LORD hath sent me unto you to speak all these words in your ears.

One would have hoped that such a sermon as that in the foregoing verses, so plain and practical, so rational and pathetical, and delivered in God's name, should have wrought upon even this people, especially meeting them now at their devotions, and should have prevailed with them to repent and reform; but, instead of awakening their convictions, it did but exasperate their corruptions, as appears by this account of the effect of it.

First. Jeremiah is charged with it as a crime that he had preached such a sermon, and is apprehended for it as a criminal. The priests, and false prophets, and people heard him speak these words, ver. 7. And it seems they had patience to hear him out, did not disturb him when he was preaching, nor give him any interruption till he had "made an end of speaking all that the Lord had commanded him to speak;" so far they were fairer with him than some of the persecutors of God's ministers have been. They let him say all he had to say, and yet perhaps with an ill design, in hopes to have something worse yet to lay to his charge; but, having no worse, this shall suffice to ground an indictment upon, he hath said, "This house shall be like Shiloh." See how unfair they are in representing his words; he had said in God's name, If ye will not hearken to me, then will I make this house like Shiloh; but they leave out God's hand in the desolation, ("I will make it so,") and their own hand in it, in not hearkening to the voice of God, and charge it upon him that he blasphemed this holy place, (the crime charged both on our Lord Jesus and on Stephen,) that he said, "This house shall be like Shiloh." Well might he complain, as David doth, Ps. lvi. 5, "Every day they wrest my words;" and we must not think it strange if we, and what we say and do, be thus misrepresented. And when the accusation was so weakly grounded, no marvel that the sentence passed upon it was unjust, "Thou shalt surely die." What he had said agreed with what God had said, when he took possession of the temple, 1 Kin. ix. 6–8, If you shall at all turn from following after me, then this house shall be abandoned; and yet he is condemned to die for saying it. It is not out of any concern for the honour of the people that they appear thus warm, but because they are resolved not to part with their sins, in which they flatter themselves with a conceit that the temple of the Lord will protect them; therefore, right or wrong, "Thou shalt surely die." This outcry of the priests and prophets raised the mob, and all the people were gathered together against Jeremiah in a popular tumult, ready to pull him to pieces; were gathered about him, so some read it; they flocked together, some crying one thing and some another. The people that were at first present were hot against him, ver. 8, but their clamours drew more together, only to see what the matter was.

Secondly. He is arraigned and indicted for it before the highest court of judicature they had. Here, 1. The princes of Judah were his judges, ver. 10; those that filled the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David, the elders of Israel. They, hearing of this tumult in the temple, came up from the king's house, where they usually sat near the court, to the house of the Lord, to inquire into this matter, and to see that nothing was done disorderly. They "sat down in the entry of the new gate of the Lord's house," and held a court, as it were, by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer. 2. The priests and prophets were his persecutors and accusers, and were violently set against him; they appealed to the princes and to all the people, to the court and the jury, whether this man be not worthy to die, ver. 11. The corrupt priests and counterfeit prophets have always been the most bitter enemies to the prophets of the Lord; they had ends of their own to serve, which they thought such preaching as this would be an obstruction to. When Jeremiah prophesied in the house of the king concerning the fall of the royal family, (ch. xxii. 1,) the court, though very corrupt, bore it patiently, and we do not find they persecuted him for it; but when he comes into the house of the Lord, and toucheth the copyhold of the priests, and contradicts the lies and flatteries of the false prophets, then he is adjudged worthy to die. For the prophets prophesied falsely, and the priests bore rule by their means, ch. v. 31. Observe, When Jeremiah is indicted before the princes, the stress of his accusation is laid upon what he had said concerning the city, because they thought the princes would be most concerned about that. But concerning the words spoken, they appeal to the people, Ye have heard what he hath said, let it be given in evidence.

Thirdly. Jeremiah makes his defence before the princes and the people. He doth not go about to deny the words, or to diminish aught from them,—what he hath said he will stand to, though it cost him his life. He owns he had prophesied against this house and this city; but,

1. He asserts that he did this by a good authority, not maliciously or seditiously, not out of any ill will to his country or any disaffection to the government in church or state, but "The Lord sent me" to prophesy thus. So he begins his apology, ver. 12, and so he concludes it, for this is that he resolves to abide by as sufficient to bear him out, ver. 15, "Of a truth the Lord hath sent me unto you, to speak all these words." As long as ministers keep close to the instructions they have from heaven, they need not fear the opposition they meet with from hell or earth. He pleads he is but a messenger, and if he faithfully deliver his message he must bear no blame; but he is a messenger from the Lord, to whom they were accountable as well as he, and therefore might demand regard. If he speak but what God appointed him to speak he is under the Divine protection, and whatever affront they offer to the ambassador will be resented by the prince that sent him.

2. He shews them that he did it with a good design, and that it was their fault if they did not make a good use of it. It was said not by way of fatal sentence, but of fair warning; if they would take the warning, they might prevent the execution of the sentence, ver. 13. Shall I take it ill of a man that tells me of my danger, while I have an opportunity of avoiding it, and not rather return him thanks for it as the greatest kindness he could do me? I have indeed, saith Jeremiah, prophesied against this city, but if you will now amend your ways and your doings, the threatened ruin shall be prevented, which was the thing I aimed at in giving you the warning. Those are very unjust who complain of ministers for preaching hell and damnation when it is only to keep them from that place of torment, and bring them to heaven and salvation.

3. He therefore warns them of their danger if they proceed against him; ver. 14, As for me, the matter is not great what becomes of me, "behold, I am in your hand;" you know I am, I neither have any power, nor can make any interest, to oppose you, neither is it so much my concern to save my own life; do with me as seemeth meet unto you, if I be led to the slaughter it shall be as a lamb. Note, It becomes God's ministers that are warm in preaching to be calm in suffering, and to carry it submissively to the powers that are over them, though they be persecuting powers. But for themselves, he tells them, it is at their peril if they put him death, "Ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves," ver. 15. They might think that killing the prophet would help to defeat the prophecy, but they would prove wretchedly deceived; it would but add to their guilt and aggravate their ruin. Their own consciences could not but tell them, that if Jeremiah was, as certainly he was, sent of God to bring them this message, it was at their utmost peril if they treated him for it as a malefactor. Those that persecute God's ministers hurt not them so much as themselves.

16 Then said the princes and all the people unto the priests and to the prophets; This man is not worthy to die: for he hath spoken to us in the name of the LORD our God. 17 Then rose up certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying, 18 Micah the Morasthite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, and spake to all the people of Judah, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Zion shall be plowed like a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of a forest. 19 Did Hezekiah king of Judah and all Judah put him at all to death? did he not fear the LORD, and besought the LORD, and the LORD repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them? Thus might we procure great evil against our souls. 20 And there was also a man that prophesied in the name of the LORD, Urijah the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, who prophesied against this city and against this land according to all the words of Jeremiah: 21 And when Jehoiakim the king, with all his mighty men, and all the princes, heard his words, the king sought to put him to death: but when Urijah heard it, he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt; 22 And Jehoiakim the king sent men into Egypt, namely, Elnathan the son of Achbor, and certain men with him into Egypt. 23 And they fetched forth Urijah out of Egypt, and brought him unto Jehoiakim the king; who slew him with the sword, and cast his dead body into the graves of the common people. 24 Nevertheless the hand of Ahikam the son of Shaphan was with Jeremiah, that they should not give him into the hand of the people to put him to death.

Here is, First. The acquitting of Jeremiah from the charge exhibited against him. He had, indeed, spoken the words as they were laid in the indictment, but they are not looked upon to be seditious, or treasonable, ill intended, or of any ill tendency, and therefore the court and country agree to find him, Not guilty. The priests and prophets, notwithstanding his rational plea for himself, continued to demand judgment against him; but the princes and all the people are clear in it, that "this man is not worthy to die," ver. 16. For, say they, "he hath spoken to us," not of himself, but "in the name of the Lord our God." And are they willing to own that he did, indeed, speak to them in the name of the Lord, and that that Lord is their God? Why then did they not amend their ways and doings, and take the method he prescribed to prevent the ruin of their country? If they say, his prophecy is from heaven, it may justly be asked, "Why did ye not then believe him?" Mat. xxi. 25. Note, It is pity that those who are so far convinced of the Divine original of gospel preaching as to protect it from the malice of others do not submit to the power and influence of it themselves.

Secondly. A precedent quoted to justify them in acquitting Jeremiah. Some of the elders of the land, either the princes before mentioned or the more intelligent men of the people, stood up, and put the assembly in mind of a former case, as is usual with us in giving judgment; for the wisdom of our predecessors is a direction to us. The case referred to is that of Micah; we have extant the book of his prophecy among the minor prophets.

1. Was it thought strange, that Jeremiah prophesied against this city and the temple? Micah did so before him, even in the reign of Hezekiah, that reign of reformation, ver. 18. Micah said it as publicly as Jeremiah had now spoken to the same purpose, "Zion shall be ploughed like a field," the building shall be all destroyed, so that nothing shall hinder but it may be ploughed; "Jerusalem shall become heaps" of ruins, and "the mountain of the house," on which the temple is built, shall be "as the high places of the forest," overrun with briars and thorns. That prophet not only spoke this, but wrote it, and left it upon record; we find it Mic. iii. 12. By this it appears, that a man may be, as Micah was, a true prophet of the Lord, and yet may prophesy the destruction of Zion and Jerusalem. When we threaten secure sinners with the taking away of the Spirit of God and the kingdom of God from them, and declining churches with the removal of the candlestick, we say no more than what has been said many a time, and what we have warrant from the word of God to say.

2. Was it thought fit by the princes to justify Jeremiah in what he had done? It was what Hezekiah did before him in a like case. Did Hezekiah, and the people of Judah, that is, the representatives of the people, the commons in parliament, did they complain of Micah the prophet? Did they impeach him, or make an act to silence him, and put him to death? No, on the contrary, they took the warning he gave them. Hezekiah, that renowned prince, of blessed memory, set a good example before his successors; for he feared the Lord, as Noah, who, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, was moved with fear. Micah's preaching drove him to his knees; he besought the Lord to turn away the judgment threatened, and to be reconciled to them. And he found it was not in vain to do so; for the Lord repented him of the evil, and returned in mercy to them, sent an angel, who routed the army of the Assyrians that threatened to have ploughed Zion like a field, ver. 19. Hezekiah got good by the preaching, and then, you may be sure, he would do no harm to the preacher. These elders conclude, that it would be of dangerous consequence to the state, if they should gratify the importunity of the priests and prophets in putting Jeremiah to death: "Thus might we procure great evil against our souls." Note, It is good to frighten ourselves from sin with the consideration of the mischief we shall certainly do to ourselves by it, and the irreparable damage it will be to our own souls.

Thirdly. Here is an instance of another prophet that was put to death by Jehoiakim, for prophesying as Jeremiah had done, ver. 20, &c. Some make this to be urged by the persecutors as a case that favoured the prosecution, a modern case, in which speaking such words as Jeremiah had spoken was adjudged treason. Others think the elders that were advocates for Jeremiah alleged this, to shew that thus they might procure great evil against their souls; for it would be adding sin to sin. Jehoiakim, the present king, had slain one prophet already, let not them fill up the measure by slaying another. Hezekiah that protected Micah, prospered; but did Jehoiakim prosper that slew Urijah? No, they all saw the contrary. As good examples, and the good consequences of them, should encourage us in that which is good, so the examples of bad men, and the bad consequences of them, should deter us from that which is evil. But some good interpreters take this narrative from the historian that penned the book, Jeremiah himself, or Baruch, who, to make Jeremiah's deliverance by means of the princes the more wonderful, takes notice of this passage that happened about the same time; for both were in the reign of Jehoiakim, and this in the beginning of his reign, ver. 1. Observe,

1. Urijah's prophecy. It was "against this city, and this land, according to all the words of Jeremiah." The prophets of the Lord agreed in their testimony; and one would have thought that out of the mouth of so many witnesses the word should have been regarded.

2. The prosecution of him for it, ver. 21. Jehoiakim and his courtiers were exasperated against him, and "sought to put him to death." In this wicked design the king was himself principally concerned.

3. His absconding thereupon. When he heard that the king was become his enemy, and sought his life, "he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt." This was certainly his fault, and an effect of the weakness of his faith, and it sped accordingly. He distrusted God, and his power to protect him, and bear him out; he was too much under the power of that fear of man which brings a snare. It looked as if he durst not stand to what he had said, or was ashamed of his Master. It was especially unbecoming him to flee into Egypt, and so in effect to abandon the land of Israel, and to throw himself quite out of the way of being useful. Note, There are many that have much grace, but they have little courage; that are very honest, but withal very timorous.

4. His execution notwithstanding. Jehoiakim's malice, one would have thought, might have contented himself with his banishment, and it might suffice to have driven him the country; but they are bloodthirsty that hate the upright, Pr. xxix. 10; it was the life, that precious life, that he hunted after, and nothing less would satisfy him. So implacable is his revenge, that he sends a party of soldiers into Egypt, some hundreds of miles, and they bring him back by force of arms. It would not sufficiently gratify him to have him slain in Egypt, but he must feed his eyes with the bloody spectacle; they brought him to Jehoiakim, and he "slew him with the sword;" for aught I know, with his own hands. Yet neither did this satisfy his insatiable malice; but he loads the dead body of the good man with infamy, would not allow it the decent respects usually and justly paid to the remains of men of distinction; but cast it into "the graves of the common people," as if he had not been a prophet of the Lord. Thus was the shield of Saul vilely cast away, as though he had not been anointed with oil. Thus Jehoiakim hoped both to ruin his reputation with the people, that no heed might be given to his predictions, and to deter others from prophesying in like manner; but in vain: Jeremiah saith the same. There is no contending with the word of God. Herod thought he had gained his point when he had cut off John Baptist's head, but he found himself deceived, when soon after he heard of Jesus Christ, and said in a fright, "This is John the Baptist."

Fourthly. Here is Jeremiah's deliverance. Though Urijah was lately put to death, and persecutors, when they have tasted the blood of saints, are apt to thirst after more, as Herod, Acts xii. 2, 3 yet God wonderfully preserved Jeremiah, though he did not flee as Urijah did, but stood his ground. Ordinary ministers may use ordinary means, provided they be lawful ones, for their own preservation; but they that had an extraordinary mission might expect an extraordinary protection. God raised up a friend for Jeremiah, whose hand was with him; he took him by the hand in a friendly way, encouraged him, assisted him, appeared for him; it was Ahikam the son of Shaphan, one that was minister of state in Josiah's time. We read of him, 2 Kin. xxii. 12. Some think Gedaliah was the son of this Ahikam. He had a great interest, it should seem, among the princes, and he used it in favour of Jeremiah, to prevent the farther designs of the priests and prophets against him, who would have had him turned over into the hand of the people; not those people, ver. 16, that had adjudged him innocent, but the rude and insolent mob, whom they could persuade by their cursed insinuations, not only to cry, Crucify him, crucify him, but to stone him to death in a popular tumult; for perhaps Jehoiakim had been so reproached by his own conscience for slaying Urijah, that they despaired of making him the tool of their malice. Note, God can, when he pleaseth, raise up great men to patronise good men; and it is an encouragement to us to trust him in the way of duty, that he has all men's hearts in his hands.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Jeremiah the prophet, since he cannot persuade people to submit to God's precept, and so to prevent the destruction of their country by the king of Babylon, is here persuading them to submit to God's providence, by yielding tamely to the king of Babylon, and becoming tributaries to him, which was the wisest course they could now take, and would be a mitigation of the calamity, and prevent the laying of their country waste by fire and sword; the sacrificing of their liberties would be the saving of their lives. I. He gives this counsel in God's name to the kings of the neighbour nations, that they might make the best of bad; assuring them that there was no remedy, but they must serve the king of Babylon; and yet in time there should be relief, for his dominion should last but seventy years, ver. 1—11. II. He gives this counsel to Zedekiah king of Judah particularly, ver. 12—14; and to his priests and people, assuring them, that the king of Babylon should still proceed against them, till things were brought to the last extremity, and a patient submission would be the only way to mitigate the calamity, and make it easy, ver. 12—22. Thus the prophet, if they would have hearkened to him, would have directed them in the paths of true policy, as well as true piety.

IN the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah came this word unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD to me; Make thee bonds and yokes, and put them upon thy neck, 3 And send them to the king of Edom, and to the king of Moab, and to the king of the Ammonites, and to the king of Tyrus, and to the king of Zidon, by the hand of the messengers which come to Jerusalem unto Zedekiah king of Judah; 4 And command them to say unto their masters, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Thus shall ye say unto your masters; 5 I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground, by my great power and by my outstretched arm, and have given it unto whom it seemed meet unto me. 6 And now have I given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, my servant; and the beasts of the field have I given him also to serve him. 7 And all nations shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son, until the very time of his land come: and then many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of him. 8 And it shall come to pass, that the nation and kingdom which will not serve the same Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, and that will not put their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, that nation will I punish, saith the LORD, with the sword, and with the famine, and with the pestilence, until I have consumed them by his hand. 9 Therefore hearken not ye to your prophets, nor to your diviners, nor to your dreamers, nor to your enchanters, nor to your sorcerers, which speak unto you, saying, Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon: 10 For they prophesy a lie unto you, to remove you far from your land; and that I should drive you out, and ye should perish. 11 But the nations that bring their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and serve him, those will I let remain still in their own land, saith the LORD; and they shall till it, and dwell therein.

Some difficulty occurs in the date of this prophecy. This word is said to come to Jeremiah, "in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim," ver. 1, and yet the messengers, to whom he is to deliver the badges of servitude, are said, ver. 3, to come to Zedekiah, king of Judah, who reigned not till eleven years after the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign. Some make it an error of the copy, and that it should be read, ver. 1, 'In the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah,' for which some negligent scribe, having his eye on the title of the foregoing chapter, wrote Jehoiakim. And if one would admit a mistake anywhere, it should be here; for Zedekiah is mentioned again, ver. 12, and the next prophecy is dated the same year, and said to be in the "beginning of the reign of Zedekiah," ch. xxviii. 1. Dr. Lightfoot solves it thus: in the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign, Jeremiah is to make these bonds and yokes, and to put them upon his own neck, in token of Judah's subjection to the king of Babylon, which began at that time; but he is to send them to the neighbouring kings afterwards in the reign of Zedekiah; of whose succession to Jehoiakim, and the ambassadors sent to him, mention is made by way of prediction.

First. Jeremiah is to prepare a sign of the general reduction of all these countries into subjection to the king of Babylon, ver. 2. "Make thee bonds and yokes;" yokes, with bonds to fasten them, that the beast may not slip his neck out of the yoke. Into these the prophet must put his own neck, to make them taken notice of as a prophetical representation; for every one would inquire what was the meaning of Jeremiah's yokes. We find him with one on, ch. xxviii. 10. Hereby he intimated, that he advised them to nothing but what he was resolved to do himself, for he was none of those that bind heavy burthens on others, which they themselves will not touch with one of their fingers. Ministers must thus lay themselves under the weight and obligation of what they preach to others.

Secondly. He is to send this, with a sermon annexed to it, to all the neighbouring princes. Those are mentioned, ver. 3, that lay next to the land of Canaan. It should seem, there was a treaty of alliance on foot between the king of Judah and all those other kings. Jerusalem was the place appointed for the treaty, thither they all send their plenipotentiaries; and it was agreed that they should bind themselves in a league, offensive and defensive, to stand by one another, in opposition to the growing threatening greatness of the king of Babylon, and to reduce his exorbitant power. A mighty confidence they had in their strength thus united, and were ready to call themselves, the high allies. But when the envoys were returning to their respective masters, with the ratification of this treaty, Jeremiah gives each of them a yoke to carry his master, to signify to him that he must either by consent or compulsion become a servant to the king of Babylon; let him choose what he will. In the sermon upon this sign,

1. God asserts his own indisputable right to dispose of kingdoms as he pleaseth, ver. 5. He is the Creator of all things; he made the earth at first, established it, and it abideth; it is still the same, though one generation passeth away, and another comes; he still, by a continued creation, produceth man and beast upon the ground, and it is by his great power and outstretched arm: his arm has an infinite strength, though it be stretched out. Upon this account he may give and convey a property and dominion to whomsoever he pleaseth. As he hath graciously given the earth to the children of men in general, Ps. cxv. 16, so he gives to each their share of it, be it more or less. Note, Whatever any have of the good things of this world it is what God sees fit to give them. We ourselves should therefore be content though we have never so little, and not envy any their share, though they have never so much.

2. He publisheth a grant of all these countries to Nebuchadnezzar. Know all men by these presents, sciant præsentes et futuri,—'let those of the present and those of the future age know,'—this is to certify to all whom it may concern, that I have "given all these lands," with all the wealth of them, into the hands of the king of Babylon, even the beasts of the field, whether tame or wild, have I given to him; parks and pastures, they are all his own. Nebuchadnezzar was a proud wicked man, an idolater, and God in his providence gives him this large dominion, these vast possessions. Note, The things of this world are not the best things; for God often gives the largest share of them to bad men, that are rivals with him, and rebels against him. He was a wicked man, and yet what he had he had by Divine grant. Note, Dominion is not founded in grace. Those that have not any colourable title to eternal happiness may yet have a justifiable title to their temporal good things. Nebuchadnezzar is a very ill man, and yet God calls him his servant, because he employed him as an instrument of his providence for the chastising of the nations, and particularly his own people, and for his service herein he thus liberally repaid him. Those whom God makes use of shall not lose by him, much more will he be found the bountiful rewarder of all those that designedly serve him.

3. He assures them that they should all be unavoidably brought under the dominion of the king of Babylon for a time; ver. 7, "All nations," all these nations, and many others, "shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son." His son was Evil-merodach, and his son's son, Belshazzar, in whom his kingdom ceased; then the time of reckoning with his land came, when the tables should be turned, and many nations and great kings incorporated in the empire of the Medes and Persians shall serve themselves of him, as before. ch. xxv. 14. Thus Adonibezek was trampled upon himself, as he had trampled on other kings.

4. He threatens those with military execution that stood out, and would not submit to the king of Babylon, ver. 8. That nation that will not put their neck under his yoke, I will punish with sword and famine, with one judgment after another, till it is consumed by his hand. Nebuchadnezzar was very unjust and barbarous in invading the rights and liberties of his neighbours thus, and forcing them into a subjection to him; yet God had just and holy ends in permitting it, to punish these nations for their idolatry and gross immoralities. They that would not serve the God that made them were justly made to serve their enemies that sought to ruin them.

5. He shews them the vanity of all the hopes they fed themselves with, that they should preserve their liberties, ver. 9, 10. These nations had their prophets too, that pretended to foretell future events by the stars, or by dreams, or enchantments; and they, to please their patrons, and because they would themselves have it so, flattered them with assurances that they should not serve the king of Babylon. Thus they designed to animate them to a vigorous resistance; and, though they had no ground for it, they hoped hereby to do them service. But he tells them it would prove to their destruction; for by resisting they would provoke the conqueror to deal severely with them, to remove them, and drive them out into a miserable captivity, in which they should all be lost, and buried in oblivion. Particular prophecies against these nations that bordered on Israel severally, the ruin of which is here foretold in the general, we shall meet with, ch. xlviii.; xlix.; Eze. xxv.; which had the same accomplishment with this here. Note, When God judgeth, he will overcome.

6. He puts them in a fair way to prevent their destruction, by a quiet and easy submission, ver. 11. The nations that will be content to serve the king of Babylon, and pay him tribute for seventy years, (ten apprenticeships,) "those will I let remain still in their own land." They that will bend shall not break. Perhaps the dominion of the king of Babylon may bear no harder upon them than that of their own kings had done. It is many times more a point of honour than true wisdom to prefer liberty before life. It is not mentioned to the disgrace of Issachar, that because he saw rest was good, and the land pleasant, that he might peaceably enjoy it, he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant to tribute, Gen. xlix. 14, 15, as these here are advised to do; Serve the king of Babylon, and you shall till the land, and dwell therein. Some would condemn this as the evidence of a mean spirit, but the prophet recommends it as that of a meek spirit that yields to necessity, and by a quiet submission to the hardest turns of providence makes the best of bad. It is better to do so than by struggling make it worse.

Many might have prevented destroying providences, by humbling themselves under humbling providences. It is better take up a lighter cross in our way than pull a heavier on our own head.

12 I spake also to Zedekiah king of Judah according to all these words, saying, Bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and serve him and his people, and live. 13 Why will ye die, thou and thy people, by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence, as the LORD hath spoken against the nation that will not serve the king of Babylon? 14 Therefore hearken not unto the words of the prophets that speak unto you, saying, Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon: for they prophesy a lie unto you. 15 For I have not sent them, saith the LORD, yet they prophesy a lie in my name; that I might drive you out, and that ye might perish, ye, and the prophets that prophesy unto you. 16 Also I spake to the priests and to all this people, saying, Thus saith the LORD; Hearken not to the words of your prophets that prophesy unto you, saying, Behold, the vessels of the LORD's house shall now shortly be brought again from Babylon: for they prophesy a lie unto you. 17 Hearken not unto them; serve the king of Babylon, and live: wherefore should this city be laid waste? 18 But if they be prophets, and if the word of the LORD be with them, let them now make intercession to the LORD of hosts, that the vessels which are left in the house of the LORD, and in the house of the king of Judah, and at Jerusalem, go not to Babylon. 19 For thus saith the LORD of hosts concerning the pillars, and concerning the sea, and concerning the bases, and concerning the residue of the vessels that remain in this city, 20 Which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took not, when he carried away captive Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah from Jerusalem to Babylon, and all the nobles of Judah and Jerusalem; 21 Yea, thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, concerning the vessels that remain in the house of the LORD, and in the house of the king of Judah and of Jerusalem; 22 They shall be carried to Babylon, and there shall they be until the day that I visit them, saith the LORD; then will I bring them up, and restore them to this place.

What was said to all the nations is here with a particular tenderness applied to the nation of the Jews, for whom Jeremiah was sensibly concerned. The case at present stood thus: Judah and Jerusalem had often contested with the king of Babylon, and still were worsted; many both of their valuable persons and their valuable goods were carried to Babylon already, and some of the vessels of the Lord's house particularly. Now how this struggle would issue, was the question. They had those among them at Jerusalem, who pretended to be prophets, that bade them hold out, and they should in a little time be too hard for the king of Babylon, and recover all they had lost. Now Jeremiah is sent to bid them yield, and knock under, for, instead of recovering what they had lost, they should otherwise lose all that remained; and to press them to this is the scope of these verses.

First. Jeremiah humbly addresseth the king of Judah, to persuade him to surrender to the king of Babylon. His act would be the people's, and would determine them; and therefore he speaks to him as to them all, ver. 12, "Bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and live." Is it their wisdom to submit to the heavy iron yoke of a cruel tyrant, that they may secure the lives of their bodies? And is it not much more our wisdom to submit to the sweet and easy yoke of our rightful Lord and Master Jesus Christ, that we may secure the lives of our souls? Bring down your spirits to repentance and faith, and that is the way to bring up your spirits to heaven and glory. And with much more cogency and compassion may we expostulate with perishing souls than Jeremiah here expostulates with a perishing people, "Why will ye die by the sword and the famine?" miserable deaths, which you inevitably run yourselves upon, under pretence of avoiding miserable lives. What God had spoken in general, of all those that would not submit to the king of Babylon, he would have them to apply to themselves, and be afraid of. It were well if sinners would in like manner be afraid of the destruction threatened against all those that will not have Christ to reign over them, and reason thus with themselves, Why should we die the second death, which is a thousand times worse than that by sword and famine, when we might submit and live?

Secondly. He addresseth himself likewise to the priests and the people, ver. 16; to persuade them to serve the king of Babylon, that they might live, and might prevent the desolation of the city, ver. 17. Wherefore should it be laid waste, as certainly it will be, if you stand it out? The priests had been Jeremiah's enemies, and had sought his life to destroy it, yet he approves himself their friend, and seeks their lives to preserve and secure them; which is an example to us to render good for evil; when the bloodthirsty hate the upright, yet the just seek his soul, and the welfare of it, Pr. xxix. 10. The matter was far gone here; they were upon the brink of ruin, which they had not been brought to if they would have taken Jeremiah's counsel, yet he continues his friendly admonitions to them, to save the last stake, and manage that wisely, and now at length in this their day to understand the things that belonged to their peace, when they had but one day to turn them in.

Thirdly. In both these addresses he warns them against giving credit to the false prophets, that rocked them asleep in their security, because they saw they loved to slumber. "Hearken not to the words of the prophets," ver. 14; "your prophets," ver. 16. They are not God's prophets, he never sent them; they do not serve him, nor seek to please him; they are yours, for they say what you would have them to say, and aim at nothing but to please you. Two things their prophets flattered them into the belief of:

1. That the power which the king of Babylon had gained over them should now shortly be broken. They said, ver. 14, "Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon." You need not submit voluntarily, for you shall not be compelled to submit. This they prophesied in the name of the Lord, ver. 15; as if God had sent them to the people on this errand, in kindness to them, that they might not disparage themselves by an inglorious surrender; but it was a lie. They said God sent them, but that was false, he disowns it; "I have not sent them, saith the Lord." They said they should never be brought into subjection to the king of Babylon; but that was false too, the event proved it so. They said, to hold out to the last would be the way to secure themselves and their city; but that was false, for it would certainly end in their being driven out, and perishing. So that it was all a lie from first to last; and the prophets that deceived the people with these lies did in the issue but deceive themselves, the blind leaders and the blind followers fell together into the ditch; That "ye might perish, ye, and the prophets that prophesy unto you;" who will be so far from warranting your security, that they cannot secure themselves. Note, They that encourage sinners to go on in their sinful ways will in the end perish with them.

2. They prophesied that the vessels of the temple, which the king of Babylon had already carried away, should now shortly be brought back, ver. 16. This they fed the priests with the hopes of, knowing how acceptable it would be to them, who loved the gold of the temple better than the temple that sanctified the gold. The vessels were taken away when Jeconiah was carried captive into Babylon, ver. 20. We have the story, and it is a melancholy one, 2 Kin. xxiv. 13—15; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 10. All the goodly vessels, that is, all the vessels of gold, that were in the house of the Lord, with all the treasures, were taken as prey, and brought to Babylon. This was grievous to them above any thing, for the temple was their pride and confidence, and the stripping of that was too plain an indication of that which the true prophet told them, that their God was departed from them. Their false prophets therefore had no other way to make them easy but by telling them that the king of Babylon should be forced to restore them in a little while. Now here,

1st. Jeremiah bids them think of preserving the vessels that remained, by their prayers, rather than of bringing back those that were gone, by their prophecies; ver. 18, "If they be prophets," as they pretend, and "if the word of the Lord be with them," if they have any intercourse with heaven, and any interest there, let them improve it, by stopping the progress of the judgment. Let them step into the gap, and stand with the censer between the living and the dead, between that which is carried away and that which remains, that the plague may be stayed. Let them make intercession with the Lord of hosts, that the vessels that are left go not after the rest. First. Instead of prophesying, let them pray. Note, Prophets must be praying men; by being much in prayer, they must make it to appear that they keep up a correspondence with heaven. We cannot think that those do as prophets ever hear thence who do not frequently by prayer send thither. By praying for the safety and prosperity of the sanctuary, they must make it appear that, as becomes prophets, they are of a public spirit; and by the success of their prayers it will appear that God favours them. Secondly. Instead of being concerned for the retrieving of what they had lost, they must bestir themselves for the securing of what was left, and take it as a great favour if they can gain that point. When God's judgments are abroad, we must not seek great things, but be thankful for a little.

2nd. He assures them that even this point should not be gained, but the brazen vessels should go after the golden ones, ver. 19—22. Nebuchadnezzar had found so good a booty once, that he would be sure to come again, and take all he could find, not only in the house of the Lord, but in the king's house. They shall all be carried to Babylon in triumph, and there shall they be. But he concludes with a gracious promise, that the time should come when they should all be returned; "Until the day that I visit them" in mercy, according to appointment, and then I will bring those vessels up again, "and restore them to this place," to their place. Surely they were under the protection of a special providence, else they had been melted down, and put to some other use; but there was to be a second temple, for which they were to be reserved. We read particularly of the return of them, Ezr. i. 8. Note, Though the return of the church's prosperity do not come in our time, we must not, therefore, despair of it, for it will come in God's time. Though they that said the vessels of the Lord's house shall shortly be brought again prophesied a lie, ver. 16, he that said, they shall at length be brought again, prophesied the truth. We are apt to set our clock before God's dial, and then to quarrel because they do not agree; but the Lord is a God of judgment, and it is fit we should wait for him.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In the foregoing chapter Jeremiah had charged those prophets with lies, who foretold the speedy breaking of the yoke of the king of Babylon, and the speedy return of the vessels of the sanctuary; now here we have his contest with a particular prophet upon those heads. I. Hananiah, a pretender to prophecy, in contradiction to Jeremiah, foretold the sinking of Nebuchadnezzar's power, and the return both of the persons and of the vessels that were carried away, ver. 1—4; and as a sign of this he broke the yoke from the neck of Jeremiah, ver. 10, 11. II. Jeremiah wished his words might prove true; but appealed to the event, whether they were so or no, not doubting but that would disprove them, ver. 5—9. III. The doom both of the deceived and of the deceiver is here read. The people that were deceived should have their yoke of wood turned into a yoke of iron, ver. 12—14. And the prophet that was the deceiver should be shortly cut off by death, and he was so accordingly within two months, ver. 15—17.

AND it came to pass the same year, in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the fourth year, and in the fifth month, that Hananiah the son of Azur the prophet, which was of Gibeon, spake unto me in the house of the LORD, in the presence of the priests and of all the people, saying, 2 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, I have broken the yoke of the king of Babylon. 3 Within two full years will I bring again into this place all the vessels of the LORD's house, that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took away from this place, and carried them to Babylon: 4 And I will bring again to this place Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, with all the captives of Judah, that went into Babylon, saith the LORD: for I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon. 5 Then the prophet Jeremiah said unto the prophet Hananiah in the presence of the priests, and in the presence of all the people that stood in the house of the LORD, 6 Even the prophet Jeremiah said, Amen: the LORD do so: the LORD perform thy words which thou hast prophesied, to bring again the vessels of the LORD's house, and all that is carried away captive, from Babylon into this place. 7 Nevertheless hear thou now this word that I speak in thine ears, and in the ears of all the people; 8 The prophets that have been before me and before thee of old prophesied both against many countries, and against great kingdoms, of war, and of evil, and of pestilence. 9 The prophet which prophesieth of peace, when the word of the prophet shall come to pass, then shall the prophet be known, that the LORD hath truly sent him.

This struggle between a true prophet and a false one is said here to have happened "in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah," and yet in the fourth year, for the first four years of his reign might well be called the beginning or former part of it, because during those years he reigned under the dominion of the king of Babylon, and as a tributary to him; whereas the rest of his reign, which might well be called the latter part of it, in distinction from that former part, he reigned in rebellion against the king of Babylon. In this fourth year of his reign he went in person to Babylon, as we find, ch. li. 59; and, it is probable, that gave the people some hope that his negotiation in person would put a good end to the war, in which hope the false prophets encouraged them, this Hananiah particularly, who was of Gibeon, a priests' city, and therefore probably himself a priest, as well as Jeremiah. Now here we have,

First. The prediction which Hananiah delivered publicly, solemnly, "in the house of the Lord," and in the name of the Lord, in an august assembly, "in the presence of the priests, and of all the people," who probably were expecting to have some message from heaven. In delivering this prophecy he faced Jeremiah, he spoke it to him, ver. 1; designing to confront and contradict him, as much as to say, Jeremiah, thou liest. Now his prediction is, that the king of Babylon's power, at least his power over Judah and Jerusalem, should be speedily broken. That within two full years the vessels of the temple should be brought back, and Jeconiah and all the captives that were carried away with him should return; whereas Jeremiah had foretold that the yoke of the king of Babylon should be bound on yet faster, and that the vessels and captives should not return for seventy years, ver. 2—4. Now upon the reading of this sham prophecy, and comparing it with the messages that God sent by the true prophets, we may observe what a vast difference there is between them. Here is nothing of that spirit and life, that majesty of style, and sublimeness of expression, that appears in the discourses of God's prophets, nothing of that Divine flame and flatus. But that which is especially wanting here, is an air of piety; he speaks with a great deal of confidence of the return of their prosperity, but here is not a word of good counsel given them to repent and reform, and return to God, to pray and seek his face, that they might be prepared for those favours God had in reserve for them. He promiseth them temporal mercies in God's name, but makes no mention of those spiritual mercies which God always promised should go along with them, as ch. xxiv. 7, "I will give them a heart to know me." By all which it appears that, whatever he pretended, he had only the spirit of the world, not the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. xii.; that he aimed to please, not to profit.

Secondly. Jeremiah's reply to this pretended prophecy.

1. He heartily wisheth it might prove true. Such an affection has he for his country, and so truly desirous is he of the welfare of it, that he would be content to lie under the imputation of a false prophet, so that their ruin might be prevented. He said, "Amen, the Lord do so, the Lord perform thy words," ver. 5, 6. This was not the first time that Jeremiah had prayed for his people, though he had prophesied against them, and deprecated the judgments which yet he certainly knew would come; as Christ prayed, "Father, if it be possible, let the cup pass from me," when yet he knew it must not pass from him. Though as a faithful prophet he foresaw and foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, yet as a faithful Israelite he prayed earnestly for the preservation of it, in obedience to that command, "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Though the will of God's purpose is the rule of prophecy and patience, the will of his precept is the rule of prayer and practice. God himself, though he has determined, yet doth not desire, the death of sinners, but would have all men to be saved. Jeremiah often interceded for his people, ch. xviii. 20. The false prophets thought to ingratiate themselves with the people by promising them peace; now the prophet shews that he bore them as great a good-will as their prophets did that they were so fond of; and, though he had no warrant from God to promise them peace, yet he earnestly desired it, and prayed for it. How strangely were they besotted who caressed those who did them the greatest wrong imaginable by flattering them; and persecuted him who did them the greatest service imaginable by interceding for them! see ch. xxvii. 18.

2. He appeals to the event to prove it false, ver. 7—9. The false prophets reflected upon Jeremiah, as Ahab upon Micaiah, because he never prophesied good concerning them, but evil; now he pleads that this had been the purport of the prophecies that other prophets had delivered, so that it ought not to be looked upon as a strange thing, or as rendering his mission doubtful; for prophets of old prophesied against many countries and great kingdoms, so bold were they in delivering the messages which God sent by them; and so far from fearing men, or seeking to please them, as Hananiah did, they made no difficulty, no more than Jeremiah did, of threatening war, famine, and pestilence, and what they said was regarded as coming from God. Why then should Jeremiah be run down as a pestilent fellow, and a sower of sedition, who preached no otherwise than God's prophets had always done before him? Other prophets had foretold destruction, and sometimes the destruction did not come, which yet did not disprove their Divine mission, as in the case of Jonah; for God is gracious, and ready to turn away his wrath from those that turn away from their sins. But the prophet that prophesied of peace and prosperity, especially as Hananiah did, absolutely and unconditionally, without adding that necessary proviso, that they do not by wilful sin put a bar in their own door, and stop the current of God's favours, will be proved a true prophet only by the accomplishment of his prediction; if it come to pass, then it shall be known that the Lord hath sent him; but if not, he will appear to be a cheat and an impostor.

10 Then Hananiah the prophet took the yoke from off the prophet Jeremiah's neck, and brake it. 11 And Hananiah spake in the presence of all the people, saying, Thus saith the LORD; Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years. And the prophet Jeremiah went his way. 12 Then the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the prophet, after that Hananiah the prophet had broken the yoke from off the neck of the prophet Jeremiah, saying, 13 Go and tell Hananiah, saying, Thus saith the LORD; Thou hast broken the yokes of wood; but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron. 14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; I have put a yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations, that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon; and they shall serve him; and I have given him the beasts of the field also. 15 Then said the prophet Jeremiah unto Hananiah the prophet, Hear now, Hananiah; The LORD hath not sent thee; but thou makest this people to trust in a lie. 16 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will cast thee from off the face of the earth: this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against the LORD. 17 So Hananiah the prophet died the same year in the seventh month.

We have here an instance,

First. Of the insolence of the false prophet. To complete the affront he designed Jeremiah, he took the yoke from off his neck, which he carried as a memorial of what he had prophesied concerning the enslaving of the nations to Nebuchadnezzar, and he broke it, that he might give a sign of the accomplishment of his prophecy, as Jeremiah had given of his, and might seem to have conquered him, and to have defeated the intention of his prophecy. See how the lying spirit in the mouth of this false prophet mimics the language of the Spirit of truth; "Thus saith the Lord, so will I break the yoke of the king of Babylon, not only from the neck of this nation, but from the neck of all nations, within two full years." Whether by the force of a heated imagination Hananiah had persuaded himself to believe this, or whether he knew it to be false, and only persuaded them to believe it, doth not appear. But it is plain he speaks with abundance of assurance. It is no new thing for lies to be fathered upon the God of truth.

Secondly. Of the patience of the true prophet. Jeremiah quietly went his way, and when he was reviled he reviled not again, and would not contend with one that was in the height of his fury, and in the midst of the priests and people that were violently set against him. The reason why he went his way was not because he had nothing to answer; but because he was willing to stay till God was pleased to furnish him a direct and immediate answer, which as yet he had not received. He expected God would send a special message to Hananiah, and he would say nothing till he had received that. "I, as a deaf man, heard not, for thou wilt hear." And thou shalt answer, Lord, for me. It may sometimes be our wisdom rather to retreat than to contend. Currenti cede furori, —'Give place unto wrath.'

Thirdly. Of the justice of God in giving judgment between Jeremiah and his adversary. Jeremiah went his way as a man in whose mouth there was no rebuke; but God soon put a word into his mouth, for he will appear for those who silently commit their cause to him.

1. The word of God in the mouth of Jeremiah is ratified and confirmed. Let not Jeremiah himself distrust the truth of what he had delivered in God's name, because it met with such a daring opposition and contradiction. If what we have spoken be the truth of God, we must not unsay it, because men gainsay it; for great is the truth, and will prevail. It will stand; let us therefore stand to it, and not fear that men's unbelief or blasphemy will make it of no effect. Hananiah hath broken the yokes of wood, but Jeremiah must make for them yokes of iron that cannot be broken, ver. 13; for, saith God, "I have put a yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations," which shall lie heavier and bind harder upon them, ver. 14, that they may serve the king of Babylon, and not be able to shake off the yoke, however they may struggle, for they shall serve him whether they will or no; and who is he that can contend with God's counsel? What was said before is repeated again, "I have given him the beasts of the field also," as if there were something significant in that. Men had by their wickedness made themselves like the beasts that perish, and therefore deserved to be ruled by an arbitrary power, as beasts are ruled, and such a power Nebuchadnezzar ruled with; for whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive.

2. Hananiah is sentenced to die for contradicting it, and Jeremiah, when he has received commission from God, boldly tells him so to his face; though before he received that commission he went away and said nothing. 1st. The crimes of which Hananiah stands convicted are, cheating the people and affronting God. "Thou makest this people to trust in a lie," encouraging them to hope they shall have peace, which will make their destruction the more terrible to them when it comes; yet this was not the worst, "thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord," that is, thou hast taught them to despise all the good counsel given them in God's name by the true prophets, and rendered it ineffectual. Those have a great deal to answer for who, by telling sinners they shall have peace, though they go on, harden their hearts in a contempt of the reproofs and admonitions of the word, and the means and methods God takes to bring them to repentance. 2nd. The judgment given against him is, "I will cast thee off from the face of the earth," as unworthy to live upon it; thou shalt be buried in it. "This year thou shalt die," and die as a rebel against the Lord, to whom death would come with a sting and a curse. This sentence was executed, ver. 17. Hananiah died the same year, within two months; for his prophecy is dated the fifth month, ver. 1, and his death the seventh. Good men may perhaps be suddenly taken off by death, in the midst of their days, and in mercy to them, as Josiah was; but this being foretold, as the punishment of his sin, and coming to pass accordingly, it may safely be construed as a testimony from heaven against him, and a confirmation of Jeremiah's mission. And if the people's hearts had not been wretchedly hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, it would have prevented their being farther hardened by the deceitfulness of their prophets.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The contests between Jeremiah and the false prophets were carried on before by preaching, here by writing: there we had sermon against sermon, here we have letter against letter; for some of the false prophets are now carried away into captivity in Babylon, while Jeremiah remains in his own country. Now here is, I. A letter which Jeremiah wrote to the captives in Babylon, against their prophets that they had there, ver. 1—3. In which letter, 1. He endeavours to reconcile them to their captivity, to be easy under it, and make the best of it, ver. 4—7; 2. He cautions them not to give any credit to their false prophets, that fed them with the hopes of a speedy release, ver. 8, 9; 3. He assures them that God would restore them in mercy to their own land again at the end of seventy years, ver. 10—14; 4. He foretells the destruction of those who yet continued, and that they should be persecuted with one judgment after another, and sent at last into captivity, ver. 15—19; 5. He prophesies the destruction of two of their false prophets that they had in Babylon, that both soothed them up in their sins and set them ill examples, ver. 20—23; and this is the purport of Jeremiah's letter. II. Here is a letter which Shemaiah a false prophet in Babylon wrote to the priests at Jerusalem, to stir them up to persecute Jeremiah, ver. 24—29; and a denunciation of God's wrath against him for writing such a letter, ver. 30—32; such struggles as these have there always been between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent.

NOW these are the words of the letter that Jeremiah the prophet sent from Jerusalem unto the residue of the elders which were carried away captives, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the people whom Nebuchadnezzar had carried away captive from Jerusalem to Babylon; 2 (After that Jeconiah the king, and the queen, and the eunuchs, the princes of Judah and Jerusalem, and the carpenters, and the smiths, were departed from Jerusalem;) 3 By the hand of Elasah the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah the son of Hilkiah, (whom Zedekiah king of Judah sent unto Babylon to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon) saying, 4 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, unto all that are carried away captives, whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon;

5 Build ye houses, and dwell in them;
And plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them;
6 Take ye wives, and beget sons and daughters;
And take wives for your sons,
And give your daughters to husbands,
That they may bear sons and daughters;
That ye may be increased there, and not diminished.
7 And seek the peace of the city
Whither I have caused you to be carried away captives,
And pray unto the LORD for it;
For in the peace thereof shall ye have peace.

We are here told,

First. That Jeremiah did write to the captives in Babylon in the name of the Lord. Jeconiah had surrendered himself a prisoner, with the queen his mother, the chamberlains of his household, called here the eunuchs, many of "the princes of Judah and Jerusalem," that were at that time the most active men; the carpenters and smiths likewise being demanded, were yielded up, that those which remained might not have any proper hands to fortify their city, or furnish themselves with weapons of war. By this tame submission it was hoped Nebuchadnezzar would be pacified; Satis est prostrasse leoni,—'It suffices the lion to have laid his antagonist prostrate.' But the imperious conqueror grows upon their concessions, like Benhadad upon Ahab's, 1 Kin. x. 5, 6. And not content with this, when these were departed from Jerusalem, he comes again and fetcheth away many more of the elders, the priests, the prophets, and people, ver. 1, such as he thought fit, or such as his soldiers could lay hands on, and carries them to Babylon. The case of these captives was very melancholy, the rather, because they being thus distinguished from the rest of their brethren who continued in their own land, looked as if they were greater sinners than all men that dwelt at Jerusalem. Jeremiah therefore writes a letter to them to comfort them, assuring them that they had no reason either to despair of succour themselves or to envy their brethren that were left behind. Note, 1. The word of God written is as truly given by inspiration of God as his word spoken was; and this was the proper way of spreading the knowledge of God's will among his children scattered abroad. 2. We may serve God and do good by writing to our friends at a distance pious letters of seasonable comforts and wholesome counsel. Whom we cannot speak to we may write to; that which is written remains. This letter of Jeremiah's was sent to the captives in Babylon by the hands of the ambassadors whom king Zedekiah sent to Nebuchadnezzar, probably to pay him his tribute and renew his submission to him, or to treat of peace with him, in which treaty the captives might perhaps hope that they should be included, ver. 3. By such messengers Jeremiah chose to send this message, to put an honour upon it, because it was a message from God. Or perhaps, because there was no settled way of sending letters to Babylon, but as such an occasion as this offered. And then it made the condition of the captives there the more melancholy, that they could rarely hear from their friends and relations they had left behind, which is some reviving and satisfaction to those that are separated from one another.

Secondly. We are here told what he wrote. A copy of the letter at large follows, ver. 24. In these verses,

1. He assures them that he wrote in the name of the "Lord of hosts, the God of Israel," who indited the letter. Jeremiah was but the scribe, or amanuensis. It would be comfortable to them in their captivity to hear that God is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts, and is therefore able to help and deliver them; and that he is the God of Israel, still a God in covenant with his people, though he contend with them, and their enemies for the present are too hard for them. This would likewise be an admonition to them to stand upon their guard against all temptations to the idolatry of Babylon, because the God of Israel, the God whom they served, is Lord of hosts. God's sending to them in this letter might be an encouragement to them in their captivity, as it was an evidence that he had not cast them off, had not abandoned them and disinherited them, though he was displeased with them and corrected them; for if the Lord had been pleased to kill them he would not have written to them.

2. God, by him, owns the hand he had in their captivity; I have caused you to be carried away, ver. 4; and again, ver. 7. All the force of the king of Babylon could not have done it, if God had not ordered it; nor could he have any power against them, but what was given him from above. If God caused them to be carried captives, they might be sure he neither did them any wrong nor meant them any hurt. Note, It will help very much to reconcile us to our troubles, and to make us patient under them, to consider that they are what God has appointed us to: "I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it."

3. He bids them to think of no other but of settling there, and therefore let them resolve to make the best of it; ver. 5, 6, "Build ye houses, and dwell in them," &c. By all this it is intimated to them, 1st. That they must not feed themselves with hopes of a speedy return out of their captivity, for that would keep them still unsettled, and consequently uneasy. They would apply themselves to no business, take no comfort, but be always tiring themselves and provoking their conquerors with the expectations of relief, and their disappointment at last would sink them into despair, and make their condition much more miserable than otherwise it would be; let them, therefore, count upon a continuance there, and accommodate themselves to it as well as they can. Let them build, and plant, and marry, and dispose of their children there, as if they were at home in their own land; let them take a pleasure in seeing their families built up and multiplied; for, though they must expect themselves to die in captivity, yet their children may live to see better days. If they live in the fear of God, what should hinder them but they may live comfortably in Babylon? They cannot but weep sometimes when they remember Zion; but let not weeping hinder sowing, let them not sorrow as those that have no hope, no joy, for they have both. Note, In all conditions of life it is our wisdom and duty to make the best of that which is, and not to throw away the comfort of what we may have, because we have not all we would have. We have a natural affection for our native country, it strangely draws our mind; but it is with a nescio qua dulcedine,—'we can give no good account of the sweet attraction,' and therefore if Providence remove us to some other country, we must resolve to live easy there, to bring our mind to our condition, when our condition is not in every thing to our mind; if the earth be the Lord's, then, wherever a child of God goes, he doth not go off his Father's ground. Patria est ubicunque bene est,—'That place is our country in which we are well off.' If things be not as they have been, instead of fretting at that, we must live in hopes that they will be better than they are. Non si male nunc, et olim sic erit,—'Though we suffer now we shall not always.' 2nd. That they must not disquiet themselves with fears of intolerable hardships in their captivity. They might be ready to suggest—as persons in trouble are always apt to make the worst of things—that it would be in vain to build houses, for their lords and masters would not suffer them to dwell in them when they had built them, nor to eat the fruit of the vineyards they planted. Never fear, saith God, if you live peaceable with them, you shall find them civil to you. Meek and quiet people, that work and mind their own business, have often found much better treatment, even with strangers and enemies, than they expected; and God has made his people to be pitied of those that carried them captives, Ps. cvi. 46, and pity it is but that those who have built houses should dwell in them. Nay,

4. He directs them to seek the good of the country where they were captives, ver. 7, to pray for it, to endeavour it. This forbids them to attempt any thing against the public peace, while they were subjects to the king of Babylon. Though he was a heathen, an idolater, an oppressor, and an enemy to God and his church, yet while he gave them protection they must pay him allegiance, and live quiet and peaceable lives under him, in all godliness and honesty; not plotting to shake off his yoke, but patiently leaving it to God in due time to work deliverance for them. Nay, they must pray to God for the peace of the places where they were, that they might oblige them to continue their kindness to them, and disprove the character that had been given their nation, that they were hurtful to kings and provinces, and moved sedition, Ezr. iv. 15. Both the wisdom of the serpent and the innocency of the dove required them to be true to the government they lived under; for, "In the peace thereof shall ye have peace." Should the country be embroiled in war, they would have the greatest share in the calamitous effects of it. Thus the primitive Christians, according to the temper of their holy religion, prayed for the powers that were, though they were persecuting powers. And if they were to pray for, and seek the peace of, the land of their captivity, much more reason have we to pray for the welfare of the land of our nativity, where we are a free people under a good government, that in the peace thereof we and ours may have peace. Every passenger is concerned in the safety of the ship.

8 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Let not your prophets and your diviners,
That be in the midst of you, deceive you,
Neither hearken to your dreams
Which ye cause to be dreamed.
9 For they prophesy falsely unto you in my name:
I have not sent them, saith the LORD.
10 For thus saith the LORD,
That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon
I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you,
In causing you to return to this place.
11 For I know the thoughts that I think toward you, saith the LORD,
Thoughts of peace, and not of evil,
To give you an expected end.
12 Then shall ye call upon me,
And ye shall go and pray unto me,
And I will hearken unto you.
13 And ye shall seek me, and find me,
When ye shall search for me with all your heart.
14 And I will be found of you, saith the LORD:
And I will turn away your captivity,
And I will gather you from all the nations,
And from all the places whither I have driven you, saith the LORD;

And I will bring you again into the place
Whence I caused you to be carried away captive.

To make the people quiet and easy in their captivity,

First. God takes them off from building upon the false bottom which their pretended prophets laid, ver. 8, 9. They told them their captivity should be short, and therefore they must not think of taking root in Babylon, but be upon the wing to go back. Now herein they deceive you, saith God; they prophesy a lie to you, though they prophesy in my name. But let them not deceive you, suffer not yourselves to be deluded by them. As long as we have the word of truth to try the spirits by, it is our own fault if we be deceived, for by it we may be undeceived. "Hearken not to your dreams, which ye cause to be dreamed." He means either the dreams or fancies which the people pleased themselves with, and with which they filled their own heads, (by thinking and speaking of nothing else but a speedy enlargement when they were awake, they caused themselves to dream of it when they were asleep; and then took that for a good omen, and with it strengthened themselves in their vain expectations,) or the dreams which the prophets dreamed, and grounded their prophecies upon. God tells the people, They are your dreams, because they pleased them, were the dreams that they desired and wished for; they caused them to be dreamed, for they hearkened to them, and encouraged the prophets to put such shams upon them, desiring them to prophesy nothing but smooth things, Isa. xxx. 10. They were dreams of their own bespeaking. False prophets would not flatter people in their sins, but that they love to be flattered, and speak their prophets fair to speak them fair.

Secondly. He gives them a good bottom to build their hopes upon. We would not persuade people to pull down the house they have built upon the sand, but that there is a rock ready for them to rebuild upon. God here promiseth them that, though they should not return quickly, they should return at length; "after seventy years be accomplished." By this it appears, that the seventy years of the captivity are not to be reckoned from the last captivity, but the first. Note, Though the deliverance of the church do not come in our time, it is sufficient that it will come in God's time, and we are sure that is the time. The promise is, that God will visit them in mercy; though he had long seemed to be strange to them he will come among them, and appear for them, and put honour upon them, as great men do upon their inferiors, by coming to visit them. He will put an end to their captivity, and turn away all the calamities of it. Though they are dispersed, some in one country and some in another, he will gather them from all the places whither they are driven, will set up a standard for them all to resort to, and incorporate them again in one body. And though they are at a great distance, they shall be brought again to their own land, to the place whence they were carried captive, ver. 14. Now,

1. This shall be the performance of God's promise to them; ver. 10, "I will perform my good words toward you." Let not the failing of those predictions, which are delivered as from God, lessen the reputation of those that really are from him. That which is indeed God's word is a good word, and therefore it will be made good, and not one iota or tittle of it shall fall to the ground. Hath he said, and shall he not do it? This will make their return out of captivity very comfortable, that it will be the performance of God's good word to them, the product of a gracious promise.

2. This shall be in pursuance of God's purposes concerning them; ver. 11, "I know the thoughts that I think towards you." Known unto God are all his works, for known unto him are all his thoughts, Acts xv. 18; and his works agree exactly with his thoughts; he doth all according to the counsel of his will. We often do not know our own thoughts, not know our mind, but God is never at any uncertainty within himself. We are sometimes ready to fear that God's designs concerning us are all against us. But he knows the contrary concerning his own people, that they are thoughts of good and not of evil; even that which seems evil is designed for good. His thoughts are all working towards the expected end, which he will give in due time. The end they expect will come, though perhaps not when they expect it. Let them have patience till the fruit is ripe, and then they shall have it. He will give them an end, and expectation; so it is in the original. 1st. He will give them to see the end, that is, the comfortable period of their trouble. Though it last long it shall not last always; the time to favour Zion, yea, the set time, will come; when things are at the worst they will begin to mend. And he will give them to see the glorious perfection of their deliverance; for, as for God, his work is perfect. He that in the beginning finished the heavens and the earth, and all the hosts of both, will finish all the blessings of both to his people. When he begins in ways of mercy, he will make an end; God doth nothing by the halves. 2nd. He will give them to see the expectation, that end which they desire and hope for, and have been long waiting for. He will give them not the expectations of their fears, or the expectations of their fancies, but the expectations of their faith; the end which he has promised, and which will turn for the best to them.

3. This shall be an answer to their prayers and supplications to God, ver. 12—14. 1st. God stirs them up to pray; "Then shall ye call upon me, and ye shall go and pray unto me." Note, When God is about to give his people the expected good, he pours out a spirit of prayer, and it is a good sign he is coming towards them in mercy. Then when you see the expected end approaching, then ye shall call upon me. Note, Promises are given not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, prayer; and when deliverance is coming we must by prayer go forth to meet it. When Daniel understood that the seventy years were near expiring, then he set his face with more fervency than ever to seek the Lord, Dan. ix. 2, 3. 2nd. He will then stir up himself to come and save them, Ps. lxxx. 2, "I will hearken unto you, and I will be found of you." God hath said it, and we may depend upon it, Seek, and ye shall find. We have a general rule laid down; ver. 13, "Ye shall find me, when ye shall search for me with all your heart." In seeking God, we must search for him, accomplish a diligent search, search for directions in seeking him, and encouragements to our faith and hope; we must continue seeking, and take pains in seeking, as those that search, and this we must do with our heart; that is, in sincerity and uprightness, and with our whole hearts; that is, with vigour and fervency, putting forth all that is within us in prayer; and those who thus seek God shall find him, and shall find him their bountiful rewarder, Heb. xi. 6. He never said to such, Seek ye me in vain.

15 Because ye have said, The LORD hath raised us up prophets in Babylon;
16 Know that thus saith the LORD
Of the king that sitteth upon the throne of David,
And of all the people that dwelleth in this city,
And of your brethren that are not gone forth with you into captivity;
17 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Behold, I will send upon them the sword, the famine, and the pestilence,
And will make them like vile figs, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil.
18 And I will persecute them with the sword, with the famine, and with the pestilence,
And will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth, [a reproach,
To be a curse, and an astonishment, and an hissing, and
Among all the nations whither I have driven them:
19 Because they have not hearkened to my words, saith the LORD,
Which I sent unto them by my servants the prophets,
Rising up early and sending them;
But ye would not hear, saith the LORD.
20 Hear ye therefore the word of the LORD, all ye of the captivity, whom I have sent from Jerusalem to Babylon: 21 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, of Ahab the son of Kolaiah, and of Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, which prophesy a lie unto you in my name; Behold, I will deliver them into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon; and he shall slay them before your eyes; 22 And of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The LORD make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire; 23 Because they have committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives, and have spoken lying words in my name, which I have not commanded them; even I know, and am a witness, saith the LORD.

Jeremiah, having given great encouragement to those among the captives whom he knew to be serious and well-affected, assuring them that God had very kind and favourable intentions concerning them, here turns to those among them who slighted the counsels and comforts that Jeremiah ministered to them, and depended upon what the false prophets flattered them with. When this letter came from Jeremiah, they would be ready to say, What needs he make himself so busy, and take upon him to advise us; "the Lord hath raised us up prophets in Babylon," ver. 15. We are satisfied with those prophets, and can depend upon them, and have no occasion to hear from any prophets in Jerusalem. See the impudent wickedness of this people; as the prophets, when they prophesied lies, said they had them from God, so the people when they invited those prophets thus to flatter them, fathered it upon God, and said it was the Lord that raised them up those prophets. Whereas those that harden people in their sins, and deceive them with false and groundless hopes of God's mercy, we may be sure are no prophets of God's raising up. These prophets of their own told them, that no more should be carried captive, but those that were in captivity should shortly return. Now in answer to this,

First. The prophet here foretells the utter destruction of those who remained still at Jerusalem, notwithstanding what those false prophets said to the contrary. As for the king and people that dwell in the city, who, you think, will be ready to bid you welcome when you return, you are deceived; they shall be followed with one judgment after another,—sword, famine, and pestilence, which shall cut off multitudes; and the poor and miserable remains shall be removed into all kingdoms of the earth, ver. 16—18. And thus God will make them, or rather deal with them, like vile figs. They have made themselves so by their wickedness, and God will use them accordingly, as the salt that has lost its savour, which being good for nothing is cast to the dunghill; and so are rotten figs. This refers to the vision, and the prophecy upon it, which we had ch. xxiv. And the reason given for these proceedings against them is the same that has often been given, and will justify God in the eternal ruin of impenitent sinners; ver. 19, "Because they have not hearkened to my words." "I called, but they refused."

Secondly. He foretells the judgment of God upon the false prophets in Babylon, who deceived the people of God there. He calls upon all the children of the captivity, who boasted of them as prophets of God's raising up, ver. 20, Stand still, and hear the doom of the prophets you are so fond of. The two prophets are named here, Ahab and Zedekiah, ver. 21. Observe,

1. The crimes charged upon them, impiety and immorality. They prophesied lies in God's name, ver. 21; and again, ver. 23, They have spoken lying words in my name. Lying was bad, lying to the people of God, to delude them into a false hope, was worse, but fathering their lies upon the God of truth was worst of all. As they had the face to do that, no marvel if they could allow themselves in the gratification of those vile affections to which God in a way of righteous judgment gave them up. They have done villany in Israel, for "they have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives." Adultery is villany, and it is an aggravation of it, if it be villany in Israel, and in such as pretend to be prophets, who by such wickednesses manifestly disprove their own pretensions. God never sent such profligate wretches on his errands; he is the Lord God of the holy prophets, not of such impure ones. Here it appears why they flatter others in their sin, because they could not reprove them without condemning themselves. These lewd practices of theirs they knew how to conceal from the eye of the world, that they might preserve their credit; but, I know it, "and am a witness, saith the Lord." The most secret sins are known to God; he can see the villany that is covered with the thickest cloak of hypocrisy; and there is a day coming when he will bring to light all these hidden works of darkness, and every man will appear in his own colours.

2. The judgments threatened against them. The king of Babylon shall "slay them before your eyes," nay, he shall put to a miserable death, roast them in the fire, ver. 22. We may suppose it was not for their impiety and immorality that Nebuchadnezzar punished them thus severely; but sedition, and some attempts of their turbulent spirits upon the public peace, and stirring up the people to revolt and rebel. So much of their wickedness shall then be detected, and in such a wretched manner they shall end their days, that their names shall be a curse among the captives in Babylon, ver. 22. When men would imprecate the greatest evil upon one they hated, they would think they could not load them with a heavier curse in fewer words than to say, "The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab!" Thus were they made ashamed of the prophets they had been proud of, and convinced at last of their folly in hearkening to them. God's faithful prophets were sometimes charged with being the troublers of the land, and such were tortured and slain. But their names were a blessing when they were gone, and their memory sweet, not as these here. As malefactors are attended with infamy and disgrace, so martyrs with glory and honour.

24 Thus shalt thou also speak to Shemaiah the Nehelamite, saying, 25 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, Because thou hast sent letters in thy name unto all the people that are at Jerusalem, and to Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest, and to all the priests, saying, 26 The LORD hath made thee priest in the stead of Jehoiada the priest, that ye should be officers in the house of the LORD, for every man that is mad, and maketh himself a prophet, that thou shouldest put him in prison, and in the stocks. 27 Now therefore why hast thou not reproved Jeremiah of Anathoth, which maketh himself a prophet to you? 28 For therefore he sent unto us in Babylon, saying, This captivity is long: build ye houses, and dwell in them; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them. 29 And Zephaniah the priest read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah the prophet. 30 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, 31 Send to all them of the captivity, saying, Thus saith the LORD concerning Shemaiah the Nehelamite; Because that Shemaiah hath prophesied unto you, and I sent him not, and he caused you to trust in a lie: 32 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will punish Shemaiah the Nehelamite, and his seed: he shall not have a man to dwell among this people; neither shall he behold the good that I will do for my people, saith the LORD; because he hath taught rebellion against the LORD.

We have perused the contents of Jeremiah's letter to the captives in Babylon, who had reason, with a great deal of thanks to God and him, to acknowledge the receipt of it, and lay it up among their treasures. But we cannot wonder if the false prophets they had among them were enraged at it; for it gave them their true character. Now here we are told concerning one of them,

First. How he discovered his malice against Jeremiah. This busy fellow is called Shemaiah the Nehelamite, the dreamer, so the margin reads it; because all his prophecies he pretended to have received from God in a dream. He had got a copy of Jeremiah's letter to the captives, or had heard it read, or information was given to him concerning it, and it nettled him exceedingly; and he will take pen in hand and answer it, yea, that he will; but how? He doth not write to Jeremiah in justification of his own mission, nor offer any rational arguments for the support of his prophecies concerning the speedy return of the captives; but he writes to the priests, those faithful patrons of the false prophets, and instigates them to persecute Jeremiah. He writes in his own name, not so much as pretending to have the people's consent to it; but, as if he must be dictator to all mankind, he sends a circular letter (as should seem) among the priests at Jerusalem, and the rest of the people, probably by the same messengers that brought the letter from Jeremiah. But it is chiefly directed to Zephaniah, who was either the immediate son of Maaseiah, or of the twenty-fourth course of the priests, of which Maaseiah was the father and the head. He was not the high priest, but sagan or suffragan to the high priest, or in some other considerable post of command in the temple, as Pashur, ch. xx. 1. Perhaps he was chairman of that committee of priests that was appointed in a particular manner to take cognizance of those that pretended to be prophets, of which there were very many at this time, and to give judgment concerning them. Now,

1. He puts him and the other priests in mind of the duty of their place; ver. 26, "The Lord hath made thee priest in the stead of Jehoiada the priest." Some think he refers to the famous Jehoiada, that great reformer in the days of Joash; and (saith Mr. Gataker) he would insinuate that this Zephaniah is, for spirit and zeal, such another as he, and raised up as he was, for the glory of God, and the good of the church, and therefore it was expected from him that he should proceed against Jeremiah. Thus (saith he) there is no act so injurious or impious but that wicked wretches and false prophets will not only attempt it, but colour it also with some specious pretence of piety, and zeal of God's glory, Isa. lxvi. 5; Jno. xvi. 2. Or, rather, it was some other Jehoiada, his immediate predecessor in this office, who perhaps was carried to Babylon among the priests, ver. 1. Zephaniah is advanced sooner than he expected, to this place of trust and power; and Shemaiah would have him think Providence had preferred him, that he might persecute God's prophets; that he was come to this government for such a time as this, and he was unjust and ungrateful if he did not thus improve his power, or rather abuse it. Their hearts are wretchedly hardened who can justify the doing of mischief, by having a power to do it. These priests' business was to examine "every man that is mad, and maketh himself a prophet." God's faithful prophets are here represented as prophets of their own making, usurpers of the office, and lay intruders; and as men that were mad, acted by some demon, and not divinely inspired; or, as distracted men, and men in a frenzy. Thus the characters of the false prophets are thrown upon the true ones; and if this had been indeed their character, they ought to be bound as madmen, and punished as pretenders; and therefore he concludes Jeremiah must be so done to. He doth not bid them examine whether Jeremiah could produce any proofs of his mission, and could make it appear he was not mad; no, that is taken for granted, and when once he is put into an ill name, he must be run down, of course.

2. He informs them of the letter which Jeremiah had written to the captives, ver. 28. He sent unto us in Babylon with the authority of a prophet, saying, "This captivity is long," and therefore resolve to make the best of it. And what harm was there in this, that it should be objected to him as a crime? The false prophets had formerly said, the captivity would never come, ch. xiv. 13. Jeremiah had said it would come, and the event had already proved him in the right, which obliged them to give credit to him who now said it would be long, rather than to those who said it would be short, but had once before been found liars.

3. He demands judgment against him, taking it for granted that he is "mad, and maketh himself a prophet." He expects they should order him to be put in prison, and in the stocks, ver. 26; that they should thus punish him, and by putting him to disgrace possess the people with prejudices against him, ruin his reputation, and so prevent the giving of any credit to his prophecies at Jerusalem, hoping, if they could gain that point, neither would the captives of Babylon be influenced by him. Nay, he takes upon him to chide Zephaniah for his neglect, ver. 27. Why hast thou not rebuked and restrained Jeremiah of Anathoth? See how insolent and imperious these false prophets were grown, that, though they were in captivity, they would give law to the priests that were not only at liberty, but in power. It is common for those that pretend to more knowledge than their neighbours to be so. Now here is a remarkable instance of the hardness of the hearts of sinners, and it is enough to make us all fear, lest our hearts be at any time hardened. For here we find, 1st. That these sinners would not be convinced by the clearest evidence. God had confirmed his word in the mouth of Jeremiah, it had taken hold of them, Zec. i. 6; and yet, because he doth not prophesy to them the smooth things they desired, they are resolved to look upon him as not duly called to the office of a prophet. None so blind as those that will not see. 2nd. That they would not be reclaimed and reformed by the most severe chastisment. They were now sent into a miserable thraldom for mocking the messengers of the Lord, and misusing his prophets; this was the sin for which God now contended with them, and yet in their distress they trespass yet more against the Lord, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. This very sin they are notoriously guilty of in their captivity; which shews that afflictions will not of themselves cure men of their sins, unless the grace of God work with them; but will rather exasperate the corruptions they are intended to mortify. So true is that of Solomon, Pr. xxvii. 22, "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him."

Secondly. How Jeremiah came to the knowledge of this; ver. 29, "Zephaniah read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah." He did not design to do as Shemaiah would have him, but, as it should seem, had a respect for Jeremiah; for we find him employed in messages to him as a prophet, ch. xxi. 1, xxxvii. 3, and therefore protected him. He that continued in his dignity and power stood more in awe of God and his judgments than he that was now a captive. Nay, he made Jeremiah acquainted with the contents of the letter, that he might see what enemies he had even among the captives. Note, It is kindness to our friends to let them know their foes.

Thirdly. What was the sentence passed upon Shemaiah for writing this letter. God sent him an answer; for to him Jeremiah committed his cause. It was ordered to be sent not to him, but to them of the captivity, who encouraged and countenanced him as if he had been a prophet of God's raising up, ver. 31, 32. Let them know,

1. That Shemaiah has made fools of them. He promised them peace in God's name, but God did not send him. He forged a commission, and counterfeited the broad seal of heaven to it, and made the people to trust in a lie, and, by preaching false comfort to them, deprived them of true comfort. Nay, he had not only made fools of them, but, which was worse, he had made traitors of them, he had "taught rebellion against the Lord," as Hananiah had done, ch. xxviii. 16. And if vengeance shall be taken on them that rebel, much more on them that teach rebellion, by their doctrine or example.

2. That at his end he also shall be a fool, as the expression is, ch. xvii. 11. His name and family shall be extinct, and shall be buried in oblivion. He shall leave no issue behind him to bear up his name, his pedigree shall end in him; "He shall not have a man to dwell among this people," and neither he nor any that come from him shall "behold the good that I will do for my people." Note, Those are unworthy to share in God's favours to his church, that are not willing to stay his time for them. Shemaiah was angry at Jeremiah's advice to the captives, to see to the building up of their families in Babylon, that they might be increased and not diminished; and therefore justly is he written childless there. Those that slight the blessings of God's word deserve to lose the benefit of them: see Am. vii. 16, 17.

CHAPTER XXX.

The sermon which we have in this and the following chapter, is of a very different complexion from all those before: the prophet doth indeed, by direction from God, change his voice. Most he had said hitherto was by way of reproof and threatening: but these two chapters are wholly taken up with precious promises of a return out of captivity, and that typical of the glorious things reserved for the church in the days of the Messiah. The prophet is bidden not only to preach this, but to write it; because it is intended for the comfort of the generations to come, ver. 1—3. It is here promised, 1. That they should hereafter have a joyful restoration; 1. Though they were now in a great deal of pain and terror, ver. 4—7; 2. Though their oppressors were very strong, ver. 8—10; 3. Though a full end was made of other nations, and they were not restored, ver. 11; 4. Though all means of their deliverance seemed to fail, and be cut off, ver. 12—14; 5. Though God himself had sent them into captivity, and justly, for their sins, ver. 15, 16; 6. Though all about them looked upon their case as desperate, ver. 17. II. That after their joyful restoration they should have a happy settlement; that their city should be rebuilt, ver. 18, their numbers increased, ver. 19, 20, their government established, ver. 21, God's covenant with them renewed, ver. 22, and their enemies destroyed and cut off, ver. 23, 24.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Thus speaketh the LORD God of Israel, saying, Write thee all the words that I have spoken unto thee in a book. 3 For, lo, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, saith the LORD: and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it. 4 And these are the words that the LORD spake concerning Israel and concerning Judah.

5 For thus saith the LORD;
We have heard a voice of trembling,
Of fear, and not of peace.
6 Ask ye now, and see
Whether a man doth travail with child?
Wherefore do I see every man
With his hands on his loins, as a woman in travail,
And all faces are turned into paleness?
7 Alas! for that day is great,
So that none is like it:
It is even the time of Jacob's trouble;
But he shall be saved out of it. [hosts,
8 For it shall come to pass in that day, saith the LORD of
That I will break his yoke from off thy neck,
And will burst thy bonds,
And strangers shall no more serve themselves of him:
9 But they shall serve the LORD their God,
And David their king, whom I will raise up unto them.

Here, First. Jeremiah is directed to write what God had spoken to him; which perhaps refers to all the foregoing prophecies. He must write them, and publish them, in hopes that they who had not profited by it upon once hearing it, might take more notice of it when in reading it they had leisure for a more considerate review. Or, rather, it refers to the promises of their enlargement, which had been often mixed with his other discourses. He must collect them and put them together, and God will now add unto them many like words. He must write them for the generations to come, who should see them accomplished, and thereby have their faith in the prophecy confirmed. He must write it not in a letter, as that in the chapter before to the captives, but in a book, to be carefully preserved in the archives, or among the public rolls or registers of the state. Daniel understood by these books when the captivity was about coming to an end, Dan. ix. 2. He must write it in a book, not in loose papers; for the days come, and are yet at a great distance, when I will bring again the captivity of Israel and Judah, great numbers of the ten tribes, with those of the two, ver. 3. And it must be written that it may be read then also, that so it may appear how exactly the accomplishment answers the prediction, which is one end of the writing of prophecies. It is intimated that they shall be beloved for their fathers' sake, Rom. xi. 28, for therefore God will bring them again to Canaan, because it was the land that he gave to their fathers, which therefore they shall possess.

Secondly. He is directed what to write. The very words are such as the Holy Ghost teacheth, ver. 4. These are the words which God ordered to be written; and those promises which are written by his order are as truly his word as the ten commandments which were written with his finger.

1. He must write a description of the fright and consternation which the people were now in, and were likely to be still in, upon every attack that the Chaldeans made upon them, which will much magnify both the wonder and the welcomeness of their deliverance; ver. 5, "We have heard a voice of trembling," the shrieks of terror echoing to the alarms of danger. The false prophets told them they should have peace; but there is fear, and not peace, so the margin reads it. And no marvel that, when "without are fightings, within are fears." The men, even the men of war, shall be quite overwhelmed with the calamities of their nation, shall sink under them, and yield to them, and shall look like women in labour, whose pains come upon them in great extremity, and they know they cannot escape them, ver. 6. You never heard of a man travailing with child, and yet here you find not here and there a timorous man, but "every man with his hands on his loins," in the utmost anguish and agony, as a woman in travail, when they see their cities burnt, and their countries laid waste. But this pain is compared to that of a woman in travail, not to that of a death-bed; because it shall end in joy at last, and the pain, like that of a travailing woman, shall be forgotten. All faces shall be turned into paleness. The word signifies not only such paleness as arises from a sudden fright, but that which is the effect of an ill habit of body, the jaundice, or green-sickness. The prophet laments the calamity upon the foresight of it; ver. 7, "Alas! for that day is great," a day of judgment, which is called the great day, the "great and terrible day of the Lord," Joel ii. 31; Jude 6. Great, so that there has been none like it. The last destruction of Jerusalem is thus spoken of by our Saviour, as unparalleled, Mat. xxiv. 21. "It is even the time of Jacob's trouble," a sad time, when God's professing people shall be in distress above other people. The whole time of the captivity was a time of Jacob's trouble, and such times ought to be greatly lamented by all that are concerned for the welfare of Jacob, and the honour of the God of Jacob.

2. He must write the assurances which God had given that a happy end should at length be put to these calamities. 1st. Jacob's troubles shall cease, "he shall be saved out of them." Though the afflictions of the church may last long, they shall not last always. Salvation belongs to the Lord, and shall be wrought for his church. 2nd. Jacob's troublers shall be disabled to do him any farther mischief, and shall be reckoned with for the mischief they have done him; ver. 8, the Lord of hosts, who has all power in his hand, undertakes to do it, "I will break his yoke from off thy neck," which has long lain so heavy, and hath so sorely galled thee; "I will burst thy bonds," and restore thee to liberty and ease, and thou shalt no more be at the beck and command of strangers, shalt no more serve them, nor shall they any more serve themselves of thee, shall no more enrich themselves either by thy possessions or by thy labours. And, 3rd. That which crowns and completes the mercy is, that they shall be restored to the free exercise of their religion again, ver. 9. They shall be delivered from serving their enemies, not that they may live at large, and do what they please, but that they may "serve the Lord their God, and David their king," that they may come again into order under the established government both in church and state. Therefore they were brought into trouble, and made to serve their enemies, because they had not served the Lord their God as they ought to have done, "with joyfulness and gladness of heart," Deu. xxviii. 47. But when the time is come that they should be saved out of their trouble, God will prepare and qualify them for it, by giving them a heart to serve him; and will make it doubly comfortable, by giving them opportunity to serve him. Therefore we are delivered out of the hands of our enemies, that we may serve God, Lu. i. 74, 75. And then deliverances out of temporal calamities are mercies indeed to us, when by them we find ourselves engaged to, and enlarged in, the service of God. They shall serve their own God, and neither be inclined, as they had been of old in the day of their apostacy, nor compelled as they had been of late in the day of their captivity, to serve other gods. They shall serve David their king, such governors as God should from time to time set over them, of the line of David, as Zerubbabel; or at least sitting on the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David, as Nehemiah. But certainly this has a farther meaning. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, 'They shall obey or hearken to the Messiah, or Christ, the Son of David, their king.' To him the Jewish interpreters apply it. That dispensation which commenced at their return out of captivity brought them to the Messiah. He is called David their king, because he was the Son of David, Mat. xxii. 42; and he answered to the name, Mat. xx. 31, 32. David was an illustrious type of him, both in his humiliation and his exaltation. The covenant of royalty made with David had principal reference to him, and in him the promises of that covenant had their full accomplishment. God gave him the throne of his father David, he raised him up unto them, set him upon the holy hill of Zion. God is often in the New Testament said to have raised up Jesus, raised him up as a king, Acts iii. 26; xiii. 23, 33. Observe, First. Those that serve the Lord as their God must also serve David their king, must give up themselves to Jesus Christ, to be ruled by him; for all men must honour the Son as they honour the Father, and come into the service and worship of God by him as Mediator. Secondly. Those that are delivered out of spiritual bondage must make it to appear that they are so by giving up themselves to the service of Christ. They to whom he gives rest must take his yoke upon them.

10 Therefore fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, saith the Neither be dismayed, O Israel: [LORD;
For, lo, I will save thee from afar,
And thy seed from the land of their captivity;
And Jacob shall return,
And shall be in rest, and be quiet,
And none shall make him afraid.
11 For I am with thee, saith the LORD, to save thee:
Though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee,
Yet will I not make a full end of thee:
But I will correct thee in measure,
And will not leave thee altogether unpunished.
12 For thus saith the LORD,
Thy bruise is incurable,
And thy wound is grievous. [bound up:
13 There is none to plead thy cause, that thou mayest be
Thou hast no healing medicines.
14 All thy lovers have forgotten thee;
They seek thee not;
For I have wounded thee with the wound of an enemy,
With the chastisement of a cruel one,
For the multitude of thine iniquity;
Because thy sins were increased.
15 Why criest thou for thine affliction?
Thy sorrow is incurable for the multitude of thine iniquity:
Because thy sins were increased, I have done these things unto thee.
16 Therefore all they that devour thee shall be devoured;
And all thine adversaries, every one of them, shall go into captivity;
And they that spoil thee shall be a spoil,
And all that prey upon thee will I give for a prey.

17 For I will restore health unto thee,
And I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the LORD;
Because they called thee an Outcast, saying,
This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after.

In these verses, as in the foregoing, the deplorable case of the Jews in captivity is set forth; but many precious promises given them, that in due time they should be relieved, and a glorious salvation should be wrought for them.

First. God himself appeared against them; he scattered them, ver. 11; he did all these things unto them, ver. 15. All their calamities came from his hands; whoever were the instruments, he was the principal agent. And this made their case very sad, that God, even their own God, spoke concerning them, to pull down and to destroy. Now, 1. This was intended by him as a fatherly chastisement, and no other; ver. 11, "I will correct thee in measure," or, according to judgment; with discretion, no more than thou deservest, nay, no more than thou canst well bear. What God does against his people is in a way of correction; and that correction is always moderated, and always proceeds from love. "I will not leave thee altogether unpunished," as thou art ready to think I should, because of thy relation to me. Note, A profession of religion, though never so plausible, will be far from securing to us impunity in sin. God is no respecter of persons, but will shew his hatred of sin wherever he finds it; and that he hates it most in those that are nearest to him. God here corrects his people for the multitude of their iniquity, and because their sins were increased, ver. 14, 15. Are our sorrows multiplied at any time, and do they increase? We must acknowledge it is because our sins have been multiplied, and they have increased. Iniquities grow in us, and therefore troubles grow upon us. But, 2. What God intended as a fatherly chastisement they and others interpreted as an act of hostility. They looked upon him as having "wounded him with the wound of an enemy," and "with the chastisement of a cruel one," ver. 14, as if he had designed their ruin, and neither mitigated the correction nor had any mercy in reserve for them. It did indeed seem as if God had dealt thus severely with them, as if he had turned to be their enemy, and had fought against them, Isa. lxiii. 10. Job complains that God was become cruel to him, and multiplied his wounds. When troubles are great and long we have need carefully to watch over our own hearts, that we entertain not such hard thoughts as these of God, and his providence. His are the chastisements of a merciful one, not of a cruel one, however they may appear.

Secondly. Their friends forsook them, and were shy of them. None of those who had courted them in their prosperity would take notice of them now in their distress, ver. 13. It is commonly thus when families go to decay; those hang off from them that had been their hangers-on. In two cases we are glad of the assistance of our friends, and need their service. 1. If we be impeached, accused, or reproached, our friends we expect should appear in vindication of us, should speak a good word for us when we cannot put on a face to speak for ourselves. But here there is none to plead thy cause, none to stand up in thy defence, none to intercede for thee with thine oppressors. Therefore God will plead their cause; for he might well wonder there was none to uphold a people that had been so much the favourites of heaven, Isa. lxiii. 5. 2. If we be sick, or sore, or wounded, we expect our friends should attend us, advise us, sympathize with us, and if occasion be, lend a hand for the applying of healing medicines. But here there is none to do that, none to bind up thy wounds, and by counsels and comforts to make proper applications to thy case. Nay, ver. 14, "All thy lovers have forgotten thee;" out of sight out of mind; instead of seeking thee, they forsake thee. Such as this has often been the case of religion, and serious godliness in the world. Those that from their education, profession, and hopeful beginnings, one might have expected should have been its friends and lovers, its patrons and protectors, desert it, forget it, and have nothing to say in its defence; nor will do any thing towards the healing of its wounds. Observe, "thy lovers have forgotten thee, for I have wounded thee." When God is against a people, who will be for them? Who can be for them so as to do them any kindness? see Job xxx. 11. Now upon this account their case seemed desperate, and past relief; ver. 12, "Thy bruise is incurable, and thy wound is grievous;" and ver. 15, "Thy sorrow is incurable," that is, the condition of the Jews in captivity was such as no human power could redress the grievance of. There they were like a valley full of dead and dry bones, which nothing less than Omnipotence can put life into. Who could imagine that a people so diminished, so impoverished, should ever be restored to their own land, and re-established there? So many were the aggravations of their calamity, that their sorrow would not admit of any alleviation; but they seemed to be hardened in it, and their souls refused to be comforted, till Divine consolations proved strong ones, too strong to be borne down, even by the floods of grief that overwhelmed them. "Thy sorrow is incurable;" because thy sins, instead of being repented of, and forsaken, were increased. Note, Incurable griefs are owing to incurable lusts. Now, in this deplorable condition they were looked upon with disdain; ver. 17, "They called thee an outcast," abandoned by all, abandoned to ruin; they said, "This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after." When they looked on the place where the city and temple had been built, they called that an outcast; now all was in ruins, there was no resort to it, no residence in it, none asked the way to Zion, as formerly, no man seeketh after it. When they looked on the people that formerly dwelt in Zion, but were now in captivity, (and we read of Zion dwelling with the daughter of Babylon, Zec. ii. 7,) they called them outcasts; these are they who belong to Zion, and use to talk much of it, and weep at the remembrance of it, but no man seeketh after them, or inquires concerning them. Note, It is often the lot of Zion to be deserted and despised by those about her.

Thirdly. For all this God will work deliverance and salvation for them in due time. Though no other hand, nay, because no other hand, can cure their wound, his will and shall. 1. Though he seemed to stand at a distance from them, yet he assures them of his presence with them, his powerful and gracious presence. "I will save thee," ver. 10; "I am with thee to save thee," ver. 11. When they are in their troubles he is with them to save them from sinking under them. When the time is come for their deliverance he is with them, to be ready upon the first opportunity to save them out of their trouble. 2. Though they were at a distance, remote from their own land, afar off in the land of their captivity, yet there shall salvation find them out, thence shall it fetch them, them and their seed; for they also shall be known among the Gentiles, and distinguished from them, that they may return, ver. 10. 3. Though they were now full of fears, and continually alarmed, yet the time shall come when they shall be in rest and quiet, safe and easy, and none shall make them afraid, ver. 10. 4. Though the nations into which they were dispersed should be brought to ruin, yet they should be preserved from that ruin; ver. 11, "Though I make a full end of the nations whither I have scattered thee," and there might be danger of thy being lost among them, yet "I will not make a full end of thee." It was promised that in the peace of these nations they should have peace, ch. xxix. 7; and yet in the destruction of these nations they should escape destruction. God's church may sometimes be brought very low, but he will not make a full end of it, ch. v. 10, 18. 5. Though God correct them, and justly, for their sins, their manifold transgressions, and mighty sins, yet he will return in mercy to them, and even their sin shall not prevent their deliverance, when God's time is come. 6. Though their adversaries were mighty, God will bring them down, and break their power; ver. 16, "All that devour thee shall be devoured;" and thus Zion's cause will be pleaded, and will be made to appear to all the world a righteous cause. Thus Zion's deliverance will be brought about by the destruction of her oppressors. And thus her enemies will be recompensed for all the injury they have done her. For there is a God that judgeth in the earth, a God to whom vengeance belongs; they shall every one of them, without exception, go into captivity, and they that now spoil thee, the day will come when they shall be a spoil. They that lead into captivity shall go into captivity, Rev. xiii. 10. This might serve to oblige the present conquerors to use their captives well; because the wheel would turn round, and the day would come when they also should be captives; and let them do now as they would be done by. 7. Though the wound seem incurable, God will make a cure of it; ver. 17, "I will restore health unto thee." Be the disease never so dangerous, the patient is safe if God undertake the cure.

Fourthly. Upon the whole matter they are cautioned against inordinate fear and grief; for in these precious promises there is enough to silence both. 1. They must not tremble, as those that have no hope, in the apprehension of future farther troubles that might threaten them; ver. 10, "Fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, neither be dismayed." Note, Those that are God's servants must not give way to disquieting fears, whatever difficulties and dangers may be before them. 2. They must not sorrow as those that have no hope, for the troubles which at present they lie under; ver. 15, "Why criest thou for thine affliction?" It is true thy carnal confidences fail thee; creatures are physicians of no value, but I will heal thy wound, and therefore, Why criest thou? Why dost thou fret and complain thus? It is for thy sin, ver. 14, 15; and therefore instead of repining thou shouldest be repenting: Wherefore should a man complain for the punishment of his sin? The issue will be good at last, and therefore rejoice in hope.

18 Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will bring again the captivity of Jacob's tents,
And have mercy on his dwellingplaces;
And the city shall be builded upon her own heap,
And the palace shall remain after the manner thereof.
19 And out of them shall proceed thanksgiving
And the voice of them that make merry:
And I will multiply them, and they shall not be few;
I will also glorify them, and they shall not be small.
20 Their children also shall be as aforetime,
And their congregation shall be established before me,
And I will punish all that oppress them.
21 And their nobles shall be of themselves,
And their governor shall proceed from the midst of them;
And I will cause him to draw near, and he shall approach unto me:
For who is this that engaged his heart to approach unto me?
Saith the LORD.
22 And ye shall be my people,
And I will be your God.
23 Behold, the whirlwind of the LORD goeth forth with fury,
A continuing whirlwind: it shall fall with pain upon the head of the wicked.
24 The fierce anger of the LORD shall not return, until he have done it,
And until he have performed the intents of his heart:
In the latter days ye shall consider it.

We have here farther intimations of the favour God had in reserve for them, after the days of their calamity were over. It is promised,

First. That the city and temple should be rebuilt, ver. 18. Jacob's tents and his dwelling-place felt the effects of the captivity; for they lay in ruins when the inhabitants were carried away captives. But when they are returned the habitations shall be repaired, and raised up out of their ruins; and therein God will have mercy upon their dwelling-places that had been monuments of his justice. "Then the city" of Jerusalem "shall be built upon her own heap," her own hill, though it be no better than a ruinous heap. The situation was unexceptionable, and therefore it shall be rebuilt upon the same spot of ground. He that can make of a city a heap, Isa. xxv. 1, can when he pleaseth make of a heap a city again. The palace, that is, the temple, God's palace, "shall remain after the manner thereof;" it shall be built after the old model; and the service of God shall be constantly kept up there, and attended as formerly.

Secondly. That the sacred feasts should again be solemnized, ver. 19. Out of the city, and the temple, and all the dwelling-places of Jacob, "shall proceed thanksgiving, and the voice of them that make merry." They shall go with expressions of joy to the temple service, and with the like shall return from it. Observe, The voice of thanksgiving is the same with the voice of them that make merry; for whatever is the matter of our joy should be the matter of our praise. "Is any merry? let him sing psalms." What makes us cheerful, let it make us thankful; serve the Lord with gladness.

Thirdly. That the people should be multiplied and increased, and made considerable; "They shall not be few—they shall not be small," but shall become numerous and illustrious, and make a figure among the nations, for I will multiply them, and I will glorify them; it is for the honour of the church to have many added to it that shall be saved. This would make them to be of some weight among their neighbours. Let a people be never so much diminished and despised, God can multiply and glorify them. They shall be restored to their former honour; their children shall be as aforetime, playing in the streets, Zec. viii. 5; they shall inherit their parents' estates and honour, as formerly. And their congregation shall, both in civil and sacred things, be established before me. There shall be a constant succession of faithful magistrates in the congregation of the elders to establish that, and of faithful worshippers in the congregation of the saints. As one generation passeth away another shall be raised up, and so the congregation shall be established before God.

Fourthly. That they shall be blessed with a good government, ver. 21. Their nobles and judges shall be of themselves, of their own nation, and they shall no longer be ruled by strangers and enemies; "Their governor shall proceed from the midst of them," shall be one that has been a sharer with them in the afflictions of their captive state. And this has reference to Christ our governor, David our king, ver. 9. He is of ourselves, in all things made like unto his brethren; "and I will cause him to draw near." This may be understood either, 1. Of the people, Jacob and Israel. I will cause them to draw near to me in the temple service, as formerly; to come into covenant with me, as my people, ver. 22; to approach to me in communion; for who hath engaged his heart, made a covenant with it, and brought it into bonds, to approach unto me? How few are there that do so! None can do it but by the special grace of God, causing them to draw near. Note, Whenever we approach to God in any holy ordinance we must engage our hearts to do it; the heart must be prepared for the duty, employed in it, and kept close to it. The heart is the main thing that God looks at and requires; but it is deceitful, and will start aside, if a great deal of care and pains be not taken to engage it, to bind this sacrifice with cords. Or, 2. It may be understood of the governor; for it is a single person that is spoken of. Their governor shall be duly called to his office, shall draw near to God, to consult him upon all occasions. God will cause him to approach to him, for otherwise who would engage to take care of so weak a people, and let this ruin come under their hand? But when God has work to do, though attended with many discouragements, he will raise up instruments to do it. But it looks farther to Christ; to him as Mediator. Note, 1st. The proper work and office of Christ, as Mediator, is to draw near and approach unto God; not for himself only, but for us, and in our name and stead, as the high priest of our profession. The priests are said to draw nigh to God, Lev. x. 3; xxi. 17. Moses drew near, Ex. xx. 21. 2nd. God the Father did cause Jesus Christ thus to draw near and approach to him as Mediator. He commanded and appointed him to do it; he sanctified and sealed him, anointed him for this purpose, and accepted of him, and declared himself well pleased in him. 3rd. Jesus Christ, being caused by the Father to approach unto him as Mediator, did engage his heart to do it, that is, he bound and obliged himself to it, undertook for his heart, so some read it, for his soul, that in the fulness of time it should be made an offering for sin. His own voluntary susception in compliance with his Father's will, and in compassion to fallen man, engaged him, and then his own honour kept him to it. It also intimates that he was hearty and resolute, free and cheerful in it, and made nothing of the difficulties that lay in his way, Isa. lxiii. 3—5. 4th. Jesus Christ was in all this truly wonderful. We may well ask with admiration, Who is this that thus engageth his heart to such an undertaking?

Fifthly. That they shall be taken again into covenant with God, according to the covenant made with their fathers; ver. 22, "Ye shall be my people;" and it is God's good work in us that makes us to him a people, a people for his name, Acts xv. 14; "And I will be your God," and it is his good will to us that is the summary of that part of the covenant.

Sixthly. That their enemies shall be reckoned with and brought down; ver. 20, "I will punish all that oppress them;" so that it shall appear to all a dangerous thing to touch God's anointed, Ps. cv. 15. The last two verses come under this head, "The whirlwind of the Lord shall fall with pain upon the head of the wicked." These two verses we had before, ch. xxiii. 19, 20; there they were a denunciation of God's wrath against the wicked hypocrites in Israel; here, against the wicked oppressors of Israel. The expressions exactly agreeing speak the same with that, Isa. li. 22, 23, "I will take the cup of trembling out of thy hand, and put it into the hand of them that afflict thee." The wrath of God against the wicked is here represented to be, 1. Very terrible, like a whirlwind, surprising, and irresistible. 2. Very grievous; it shall fall with pain upon their heads, they shall be as ill hurt as frightened. 3. It shall pursue them. Whirlwinds use to be short, but this shall be a continuing whirlwind. 4. It shall accomplish that for which it is sent; "the anger of the Lord shall not return till he have done it." The purposes of his wrath, as well as the purposes of his love, will all be fulfilled. He will perform the intents of his heart. And, 5. Those that will not lay this to heart now will then be unable to put off the thoughts of it; "In the latter days ye shall consider it," when it will be too late to prevent it.

CHAPTER XXXI.
